Mr. BOUTWELL. I wish to state that this bill was prepared by a person who is well acquainted with the business, and it may be a contribution to the information in the possession of the Senate. I move that it lie on the table and be printed, not as indorsing the character of the bill, but for information.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PRATT (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1062) authorizing the commissioners of claims, appointed under the act of Congress of March 3, 1871, or any one of them, to take testimony in cases over $10,000; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOHNSTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1063) to amend and re-enact section 44 of an act to reduce internal taxes, &c., approved June 6, 1872; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HITCHCOCK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1064) for the disposal of the Fort Kearney military reservation in the State of Nebraska; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MITCHELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1065) for the relief of J. W. Drew, late additional paymaster United States Army; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

PENSIONS TO SOLDIERS OF INDIAN WAR OF 1811.

Mr. PRATT submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pensions be instructed to inquire into the propriety of reporting a bill placing on the pension-roll at the rate of eight dollars per month the surviving soldiers of the Indian war of 1811; also the widows of such as are dead, who were married before the 1st day January, 1825.

LIGHT-HOUSE BOARD.

Mr. SARGENT submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations be instructed to inquire whether the Light-House Board, as organized by law, is in the best form to promote its efficiency and harmonious action; and whether the supervision of the Secretary of the Treasury over the proceedings of said board is as clearly defined by law as is necessary for the responsibility of said board and the interests of the public service.

GEORGE S. WAGNER.

Mr. SARGENT submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the Senate to the mother of George S. Wagner, deceased, the late librarian of the Senate, $150 for his funeral expenses, and a further allowance equal to three months' pay of his annual salary.

SPECIE PAYMENTS.

Mr. SHERMAN. If there be no further morning business, I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1044) to provide for the resumption of specie payments. It is a bill I reported yesterday morning from the Committee on Finance.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I ask if that bill was reported to-day, with a view of making an objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It was reported yesterday.

Mr. SPRAGUE. An objection, then, would not prevail against taking it up?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It would not. The question is on the motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SCHURZ. Does the Senator from Ohio intend to have this bill discussed and disposed of to-day?

Mr. SHERMAN. I suppose the bill will be discussed to-day, but I have no power to dispose of it. I think the subject has been thoroughly discussed in the Senate heretofore, and a long discussion ought not to be necessary at this time. At any rate I intend to press this bill to its passage from this hour forward at the earliest moment practicable.

Mr. SCHURZ. I think there is nobody more anxious for the passage of a bill to provide for the resumption of specie payments than I am; but I must say that I found this bill on my table to-day for the first time, and have not even had time to read it and to inform myself intelligently of its contents. We may all be agreed in regard to the general object, but the Senator from Ohio will admit that simply to resolve to resume specie payments would not accomplish that object; that some method of preparation for that event must be adopted, which, as everybody knows, is a very delicate and important matter. It should therefore be maturely considered. We ought at least to be permitted to know, before discussing it, what there is in this bill. To be sure, the general subject has been discussed enough; but here are, as I understand, some new propositions. I repeat I have not had the time even to read, much less to consider them, having just this moment found the bill on my table. I should be obliged to the Senator if he would not press this measure to final action at once.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator will have ample time. It is a short bill, only three pages long. He will see what there is in it on reading it, and I think in the course of an hour or so he will be able to make up his mind entirely as to whether he will be able to support the bill or not. I think for the interest of business men, for the interest of the whole country, it is important that this Congress should inform them what it purposes to do in regard to this important subject. I think if this bill can be passed to-day promptly, quickly, and sent to the House of Representatives as an indication that Congress will do thus much, if no more, in the direction pointed out by the bill, it would be of great benefit to the country. The Senator I think will agree to that.

Mr. SCHURZ. I am sure the Senator from Ohio is convinced that I am in perfect accord with him as to the general object of resuming specie payments. I shall certainly, therefore, have no objection at all to his explaining the bill to us to-day, telling us what there is in it, how the method which is proposed here is likely to operate, and so on. But I think it is asking a little too much that upon a measure of such importance, involving such intricate details, we should be required to pass in a hurry.

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] remarks that the Senator from Ohio proposes only to take it up. But the Senator from Ohio tells us that he wants to have it passed to-day, to send it forthwith to the House of Representatives.

Mr. SHERMAN. If it is taken up, we can debate it; and if the Senate are not ready to vote on it, they will put it over. I insist on my motion to take up the bill.

Mr. BAYARD. I would ask the Senator from Ohio whether, in taking this bill up, he proposes to press it to a vote now?

Mr. SHERMAN. I propose to press it if the Senator will sustain it. I trust to have early action upon it.

Mr. BAYARD. I am satisfied that there are few maxims more wise than those that bid us to make haste slowly. This bill has for me a very attractive title. The resumption of specie payments is a matter greatly to be desired; its importance can scarcely be overrated, but I do think it important that the proposition should be very thoroughly and fully canvassed, and that not simply the minds of Senators should be brought with great deliberation to bear upon the subject before the adoption of any measure, but I confess I would like aid from outside this Chamber, to hear something of the probable practical workings of this measure from the people of the country, from the business men of the country, whose interests are in the first place instantly to be affected by the measure which we may adopt. I say this because, while I have no objection whatever to the bill being taken up now, and the sooner the better, the more full the discussion the better, time must be given to form opinions and final opinions in regard to the value of the measure. Therefore I shall vote to take up the bill, but I shall also feel myself at liberty to vote for its lying over for consideration, and a consideration which I do not believe will be reached until after the recess, which I trust Congress is about to take. I do not consider that in to-day and to-morrow time can be obtained for the consideration of this bill which it deserves prior to its being pressed to a final vote in the Senate.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, under ordinary circumstances I should vote to take up this bill; but under the circumstances that exist, with the declaration of my colleague that he proposes to press this bill to a passage to-day or to-morrow, I cannot vote to take it up. This bill certainly requires consideration. It is a new measure; the like of it has not been seen in the Senate before. When I say this, I am expressing no opinion for or against the bill. I wish to understand it before I express any opinion about it. I wish to understand what will be its effect if it become a law. I wish to understand what are the opinions of men capable of judging as to what will be its effect before I am called to vote upon it.

Now, if the bill were to be taken up and to remain on the Calendar and be discussed and finally acted upon after the recess, if we take one, or ten days or two weeks hence, I should have no objection to its being taken up now; but we have been informed by the newspapers, and I suppose it to be the truth, that this bill has been considered by a majority of this Senate in caucus. I find no fault with that. I do not mention it to find any fault; but this bill has been considered, we have been informed, and the majority of this Senate have determined to pass it. The newspapers state that there were only four dissenting voices. What were the reasons that commended this bill to a majority of the Senate and induced them to come to the resolution to pass the bill, we of the minority here have no knowledge whatsoever. Those reasons may have been good public reasons, such as will justify the majority, or they may have been insufficient reasons. We have not had the benefit of any discussion that took place over this bill in that secret place called the caucus. A law upon so great a subject as this, a subject that is to affect all the people of the United States, which is not a party question at all and cannot be made so—in that secret caucus, it seems, this great financial measure to restore a sound currency to the country has been matured and the vote taken to put it through the Senate!

If that be the case, if this bill is to be taken up, then the statement of my colleague, the chairman of the committee, that he desires to put the bill through to-day or to-morrow is a statement of extreme significance. It is not simply a statement of a desire, but it is a statement of what is to be and of what has been resolved upon and what the majority of this Senate have determined shall take place. Now, I do not think that is right. As I said before, upon this subject, as we all know, there is a difference of opinion, a difference of opinion among the republicans of the country, a difference of opinion among the democrats of the country. There is a very great difference of opinion. It is a most important thing that any measure which we shall adopt shall stand on the statute-book; and that measure is most likely to stand on the statute-book which shall command the approval of the judgment of the largest possible body of the members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives.

I believe that it is possible to frame a measure which will command the support of almost everybody in this Senate. Whether this is the measure or not I am not prepared to say at this time; but certain it is that an effort ought to be made to harmonize views on this subject so that when the bill shall become a law everybody will understand, the whole country will understand, that the policy of the Government on this subject is settled; for what we most need is that a policy shall be settled, that business shall not be deranged by an uncertainty in men's minds as to what shall be the legislation of Congress. And, therefore, I submit to my friend who has reported this bill that it is the part of wisdom to let this bill lie over until after the recess, so that it may be fully considered, so that we may see whether we can support it or not; and I think I may say for my friends on my left that there is no disposition to anything like factious opposition to any reasonable measure on this subject. I am quite sure there is none. I am quite sure that what we desire, as much as what the friends of this bill desire, is that a good, sound measure shall be adopted; and if upon consideration and reflection this bill, which I have not had time to read, shall prove to be such a measure, I think it will find support on this side of the Chamber as well as the other. I make no pledges whatsoever. I have not read the bill; I have not had time to converse with any one who has read the bill; but this I do say, that it is not a subject upon which we can make up our minds here while the business of the Senate is being transacted and in the short space of twenty-four hours. I hope, therefore, my colleague, if he insists on calling up the bill now, will not insist upon pressing it to a vote but will let it go over. He can lose nothing by it.

At the last session of Congress he allowed his financial measures to undergo debate here for months until the whole country and all of us were sick of it. I do not want that repeated; but there was good reason for it. It was not simply to get the opinions of the members of the Senate that he allowed that debate to "drag its slow length along" for two months and more, but it was that the intelligent minds of the country should be enabled to criticise the measures which were proposed and express their opinion on them. Well, sir, if there was reason for that course then, there is an equal reason for it now when a new measure is introduced, one not recommended by the Executive, a different one from that recommended by the Executive, and which has been considered by the country, which has been reviewed and criticised, approved and condemned, but an entirely new measure. When I say such a measure as this is brought into the Senate, it is but right and proper and prudent that it should lie over, at least so long as to enable the intelligent minds of the country to let us know what they think about it, not to govern us absolutely, but to aid us in coming to a correct conclusion.

I hope, therefore, that it will be agreed that this bill shall lie over until some day in January. I will agree to fix any day whatsoever, as early a day as my colleague will ask for its consideration. If he asks to take it up with the understanding that it will be laid over to an early day—he may fix it the first day after the recess for aught I care—then I will vote with him to take it up and vote with him to give it precedence over other matters; but if he asks to take it up with a view to putting it through the Senate to-day or to-morrow, I am compelled to oppose his motion and vote against it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it is premature to discuss various topics which my colleague has drawn into the debate, and I think it is out of order, a violation of the rules, because he has discussed several matters that are not properly before the Senate at this moment. The only question is whether the Senate desires to proceed to the consideration of this bill. As I understand him, he is willing to proceed with the consideration of the bill, but does not want to dispose of it. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof," or "the good thereof." When we take it up, as a matter of course the majority of the Senate can lay it aside. My purpose, however, is to seek to prevent any business being interposed before this bill, and to have the action of the Senate on the bill at as early a day and as early an hour as possible. As a matter of course, it is in the power of the Senate to postpone it and take up anything else.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 1044.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STEVENSON. I hope the Senator from Ohio will not press this motion. This is the short session of Congress, and we all know the value of time. I am quite satisfied that he will save time by allowing the bill go over to a day certain after the recess. The Senators then will have an opportunity of knowing what the business sentiment of the country is upon the great subject of the finances of the country. The long debate that we had last year shows how business men differ in regard to what the exact needs of the country are in relation to a system of finance.

I myself cannot vote now knowingly on this bill; and if you were to force me to vote to-day I should not exactly know how to vote. I have not had time either to consider it or to know its probable operation, and I doubt whether the business men of the country in the great centers of this wide domain can themselves tell what its precise operation will be. If the honorable Senator who has charge of this bill really desires a quick disposal of the measure, it seems to me it would be the part of wisdom to let it go over until after the Senators generally go home and return. The country will then have time to study in detail the particular operations of the bill; and we should derive more light in that way than we should by a discussion of three or four hours here. Therefore, as a mere matter of the saving of time, it seems to me that the honorable Senator, if he will reflect, will agree to let the bill go over.

Mr. MERRIMON. I beg, sir, to express the hope that the Senator from Ohio will not press this bill to an immediate consideration, or at all events not press it to an immediate determination. It is one in which I feel a very deep and anxious interest. One of greater moment cannot come before the Senate or the country at this time. It involves the highest and most complicated interests, and requires the most serious and I might add the most solemn consideration. I have not seen the bill until this morning; I have not had time to read it, much less to study it, which I desire very much to do before I cast my vote upon it. I am very sure that I am anxious to cast a judicious vote. If the measure is wise, after I have given it my deliberate judgment, I shall support it with great pleasure; but I desire time to make up a judicious opinion. I have not had that time, nor will this day suffice for that purpose, nor even to-morrow in addition. I should be very much gratified before the holidays take place to have an exposition of it by the Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, so that we might have the advantage of that exposition in considering it during the holidays; but to take it up and dispose of it by to-morrow evening I think would be doing wrong.

Mr. SCHURZ. I confess to a good deal of embarrassment in voting on the question whether this bill shall be taken up now or not. I suppose neither the Senator from Ohio nor any other Senator on this floor will doubt the sincerity of my desire to pass a bill to provide for the resumption of specie payments at the earliest possible moment; and if I were prepared to recognize in this bill a practicable method to accomplish that end, I should say, let us pass it to-day.

I will say also to the Senator from Ohio that if I can convince myself that the details of this bill will work so as to bring us to a condition in which we can resume specie payments, I shall give it my hearty support. Therefore as to our agreement with regard to the objects of the bill there can be no question whatever. I have just now hastily glanced over the bill, and found some details in it upon which I myself am not clear, and I suppose the same is the case with a good many Senators around me.

Now, if we start to-day in a debate, there will undoubtedly be a great deal of random talk; we shall uselessly consume much time which otherwise we might employ better. As an instance, let me mention that the first section of the bill provides for the redemption of the fractional currency in silver. That is one of those things in which I heartily agree with the Senator from Ohio. It ought to be done. I do not mean to discuss the merits of the bill; but I merely want to illustrate why I think it is impracticable to go on with this bill to-day, and why it will cause much of random discussion. The matter which I want to consider so as to give an intelligent vote is whether under present circumstances we can issue silver and keep it in circulation, or whether the circumstances surrounding us to-day or liable to surround us to-morrow are not such as will make it probable that silver put out will be melted into bullion and sent abroad.

There are several other things in this bill of a similar kind. Let me repeat to the Senator from Ohio that I surely would be the very last man in this body to obstruct the passage of this bill; but I do not think his object can be furthered by plunging us now into a discussion which must necessarily be a very desultory one.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will say to the Senator that he is discussing the merits of the bill, and I would not be at liberty even to reply to him. The very point he now suggests has been fully considered and can be met when the bill is taken up; but I do not feel at liberty to trespass on the rules.

Mr. SCHURZ. I did not mean to discuss the merits of the bill, but merely to indicate what points there are in the bill that will raise serious doubts in the minds of those who are most earnestly and sincerely in favor of passing a bill that will bring us to specie payments. I say I confess to serious embarrassment in voting on taking up this bill now, because I do not want even to appear as one who obstructs or delays the discussion of such a measure as this. I am most earnestly in favor of taking it up, but I should like to have it taken up under circumstances in which we can intelligently proceed to its discussion at once. I do not know but that I may be among those who will aid the Senator from Ohio in passing it. Possibly I may, although my present impression is that I shall feel compelled to introduce some amendments, not to embarrass the bill, but to make its provisions conducive to the end the bill professes to serve.

I would therefore entreat the Senator from Ohio if he insists upon taking it up to-day to confine himself to an explanation of the provisions of the bill and then let it go over for future discussion; and if that is his intention I shall cheerfully vote to take it up; but I cannot so vote if it is his intention to press it to a vote to-day, because I am not prepared to vote upon the details of the bill, although with the general object we are heartily in accord.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not intend to be drawn into any discussion at this stage of the question upon the merits of the bill. The title is all that we can now comment upon. All Senators agree that there is no subject in the world more pressing or more important than the subject contained in this bill. Whether the committee have reported the right bill is a question for the Senate to decide, and no doubt amendments will be offered from time to time that will present every question of detail and every question of difficulty; and we cannot engage in that kind of discussion or comparison of views too soon. Indeed it would be a happy Christmas gift to the people of the United States if we could give them some bill that would assure the business men of the country that stable times were coming.

Mr. SCHURZ. Does the Senator really expect that this bill will pass both Houses of Congress before Christmas?

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir; but I think the passage of it in the Senate might give some assurance that it would pass the other House.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio to take up the bill for consideration, and upon that question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. BAYARD. This bill is laid for the first time in a printed form upon the desks of Senators this morning; for about one hour ago this measure appeared for the first time on the desks of Senators that they might know its contents; and the honorable Senator from Ohio distinctly places his motion upon the ground and couples it with the intent that a vote to take up the bill is a vote to proceed to its final consideration before the day closes.

I agree fully with the honorable Senator from Missouri [Mr. SCHURZ] that there is not in the Chamber any member whose fidelity to a return to honest money is more unquestioned than his own; and I claim to be equally direct and faithful to that end myself, and I think my votes in this Chamber have been much more in that direction than those of the honorable Senator from Ohio who has introduced this bill. While I wish that, it seems to me to be an insensible method of legislation to take up a measure so fraught with consequences either good or evil as this without the fullest opportunity to know that when we do act we act wisely. It may be that the debate which is, I suppose, to come upon the Senate on this bill may relieve me of all doubts. I may find the measure excellent for the design which it expresses by its preamble, or I may find that it is a delusion and a snare, and that so far from being a bill to facilitate the return of the conversion of paper money at will into money of value, it is directly the reverse; and therefore we must await the developments of time. But I say upon the threshold we stand here upon what is the eve of a recess of Congress for two weeks, within which reasonable time an opportunity is best given to the intelligent business sense of the country to learn what the proposed measure is, and not only to learn what it is, but learning now that it has been, as my friend from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] says, a measure that has been predetermined by a party majority, and therefore is to become a law, that they make some accommodation of their affairs to the result. I therefore shall vote against taking up the measure, coupled as the motion is with the expressed object and intent to force the bill to a vote now. I would gladly vote to take up this measure if it was for the purpose of explanation, which we all so much need and none more than I, and with the intention to allow a bill of this importance to rest for a time of reflection in the minds of those who are to take the responsibility of voting for or against it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I desire to say in reference to this motion that if on examination I shall come to the conclusion that the bill is what it purports to be, a measure to provide for a return to specie payments, I shall give it my cordial support. But I have not had the time to examine it. None of us who have not been admitted to the discussion that has taken place in private on the subject are prepared to express any opinion on the measure. I am very well satisfied that for one I have no such financial intuition as enables me to come to a conclusion in reference to the merits of a measure of this kind simply by having it placed on my desk, and I apprehend that the judgment of the country is that there are as good financiers outside the Senate as in it. We should therefore, I think, for our own enlightenment avail ourselves of any judgment on this measure which the country may form upon an examination of the subject.

I do not know, so far as I am concerned, but that the title of this bill, instead of a bill to provide for the resumption of specie payment, ought to be a bill to delay a return to specie payments; but if the measure after due examination is such that I believe it will bring about the result, however remote it may be, I will give my cordial support. I think we ought to take some time to examine this measure before we take it up for the purpose of disposing of it. If the object is simply to draw attention to its provisions, so as to enable gentlemen to form conclusions in reference to its merits, then I have no objection to its being done, and I would vote for the motion with that understanding; but if the intention is to now take it up with the view of putting it on its final passage at a very early day, I must vote against it, because I want to vote intelligently when I am called on to vote upon a question of this character.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 39, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Boreman, Boutwell, Cameron, Carpenter, Chandler, Clayton, Cragin, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Lewis, Logan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Sargent, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Washburn, West, Windom, and Wright—39.

NAYS—Messrs. Bogy, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Goldthwaite, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Johnston, Kelly, McCreery, Merrimon, Norwood, Ransom, Saulsbury, Sprague, Stevenson, Thurman, and Tipton—18.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Brownlow, Buckingham, Conkling, Conover, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Gilbert, Gordon, Jones, Robertson, Schurz, Stewart, Stockton, and Wadleigh—16.

So the motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 1044) to provide for the resumption of specie payments was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was read at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and required, as rapidly as practicable, to cause to be coined at the mints of the United States silver coins of the denominations of ten, twenty-five, and fifty cents, of standard value, and to issue them in redemption of an equal number and amount of fractional currency of similar denominations, or, at his discretion, he may issue such silver coins through the mints, the sub-treasuries, public depositaries, and post-offices of the United States; and, upon such issue, he is hereby authorized and required to redeem an equal amount of such fractional currency, until the whole amount of such fractional currency outstanding shall be redeemed.

SEC. 2. That so much of section 3524 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as provides for a charge of 1-5 of 1 per cent. for converting standard gold bullion into coin is hereby repealed, and hereafter no charge shall be made for that service.

SEC. 3. That section 5177 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, limiting the aggregate amount of circulating notes of national banking associations, be, and is hereby, repealed; and each existing banking association may increase its circulating notes in accordance with existing law without respect to said aggregate limit; and new banking associations may be organized in accordance with existing law without respect to said aggregate limit; and the provisions of law for the withdrawal and redistribution of national-bank currency among the several States and Territories are hereby repealed. And whenever and so often as circulating notes shall be issued to any such banking association, so increasing its capital or circulating notes, or so newly organized as aforesaid, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to redeem the legal-tender United States notes in excess only of $300,000,000 to the amount of 80 per cent. of the sum of national-bank notes so issued to any such banking association as aforesaid, and to continue such redemption as such circulating notes are issued until there shall be outstanding the sum of $300,000,000 of such legal-tender United States notes, and no more. And on and after the 1st day of January, A. D., 1879, the Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem in coin the United States legal-tender notes then outstanding on their presentation for redemption at the office of the assistant treasurer of the United States in the city of New York, in sums of not less than fifty dollars. And to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to prepare and provide for the redemptions in this act authorized or required, he is authorized to use any surplus revenues, from time to time, in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and to issue, sell, and dispose of, at not less than par, in coin, either of the descriptions of bonds of the United States described in the act of Congress approved July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," with like qualities, privileges, and exemptions, to the extent necessary to carry this act into full effect, and to use the proceeds thereof for the purposes aforesaid. And all provisions of law inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) The morning hour has expired, and the bill for the better government of the District of Columbia is now before the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move——

Mr. MERRIMON. I am entitled to the floor, sir, I believe.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina is entitled to the floor on the District bill. Does he yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. MERRIMON. I will not yield the floor permanently. I will yield the floor with great pleasure for a temporary purpose.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to move to postpone the bill——

Mr. MERRIMON. I will not yield to that.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator can go on with his speech, if he desires, of course, but I give notice that when he is through I will seek the floor for the purpose of moving to postpone the District bill and go on with the bill which was taken up on my motion. I will inquire of the Chair—for the Senator's right to the floor depends on that—whether the morning hour ends at the end of the morning business or at one o'clock?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. At one o'clock.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator is entitled to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina is entitled to the floor, according to the rules, on the District bill, if he insists upon it.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLINTON LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. No. 926) referring the case of Joseph Wilson to the Court of Claims;

A bill (S. No. 1054) reserving for the use of Congress one hundred and fifty copies of the Revised Statutes authorized to be printed by the act of June 20, 1874; and

A bill (S. No. 974) to enable the supreme court of the District of Columbia to proceed with its jury business.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (S. No. 1043) suspending so much of an act entitled "An act organizing the several staff corps of the Army," approved April 23, 1874, as applies to contract surgeons, with an amendment; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

GOVERNMENT OF THE DISTRICT.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 963) for the better government of the District of Columbia, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. MORTON to strike out in section 3, commencing in line 3, the following words:

To be severally appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to be known as the board of commissioners of the District of Columbia; and the members first to be appointed shall be nominated and confirmed, respectively, to and for the terms following, in the order of their appointment, namely.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

To be elected by the qualified voters of said District.

So as to make the section read:

There shall be at the head of said Department a board of commissioners, to consist of three members, to be elected by the qualified voters of said District, &c.

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire to ask the Chair whether the steamboat bill was not made the special order for to-day?

Mr. EDMUNDS. The unfinished business takes precedence.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senate refused by a vote to make that bill the special order for to-day.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The unfinished business would take precedence if it were the special order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. So the Chair rules.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, it is no part of my purpose to enter into a discussion of the general merits of the bill now under consideration. I propose to confine my remarks mainly to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON.] I regard it as one of great importance. It is fundamental in its character, and involves very serious considerations and interests, not only to the people of the District of Columbia but to the people of the nation at large. The scope, purpose, and strength of the proposition of that Senator, if I understand it correctly, is this: He insists that, under the Constitution, Congress has the power to confer upon the people of the city of Washington the right to elect, by the popular vote, certain important officers who are essential for their good government, and that in pursuance of the genius, the spirit, and policy of our political institutions, it is our duty to confer such right on them. If he is correct in this proposition, I for one should feel very considerable embarrassment in refusing to give his proposed amendment the sanction of my vote; but in my judgment he is inadvertently mistaken as to the powers of Congress and as to the policy of our political system in this respect.

The Government of the United States is one, not of original powers. It is a government whose powers are conferred, and they are conferred with express limitations and for limited purposes. This is not only so, but very wisely and on purpose they have been conferred by a written Constitution, to the end that the national powers, whether executive, legislative, or judicial, shall not be transcended by those exercising them. If Congress shall undertake to exercise a power not so conferred, or in the exercise of powers so conferred, to transcend them and incorporate a power not conferred with measures that purport to be in exercise of a power conferred, just to the extent of the excess of the exercise of power on the part of Congress such acts would be absolutely null and void.

The point that I wish to impress on the Senate now is, that Congress has limited powers, it has limited legislative jurisdiction, and it is bound by those limits absolutely. It cannot by any possibility transcend them. And I wish to strengthen what I have said by reading a like exposition of the powers of Congress by one of the greatest judges, if not the greatest, that ever presided in this or any country. I read an extract from the opinion of Chief Justice Marshall, delivered in the case of Marbury vs. Madison. In delivering the opinion in that case—a case that grew out of litigation in the District of Columbia—the Chief Justice, in discussing the question to which I am now adverting, uses this language:

> This original and supreme will—
> That is, the will of the nation—
> organizes the government, and assigns to different departments their respective powers. It may either stop here or establish certain limits not to be transcended by those departments.
> The Government of the United States is of the latter description. The powers of the legislature are defined and limited; and that those limits may not be mistaken or forgotten the Constitution is written. To what purpose are powers limited, and to what purpose is that limitation committed to writing, if these limits may at any time be passed by those intended to be restrained? The distinction between a government with limited and unlimited powers is abolished, if those limits do not confine the persons on whom they are imposed, and if acts prohibited and acts allowed are of equal obligation. It is a proposition too plain to be contested that the Constitution controls any legislative act repugnant to it, or that the legislature may alter the Constitution by an ordinary act.

My purpose here is, in support of the argument I propose to make, to draw to the attention of the Senate and of the country the fact, and a very material one—that Congress can only exercise legislative power as that power has been conferred, limited, and defined by the Constitution; and that no policy can be derived from the powers conferred upon the National Government or carried into practical effect unless it shall have the sanction of the Constitution under such limitations.

The proposition contained in the bill to which the amendment is offered, is to appoint three regents or commissioners to govern the District of Columbia, these regents to be nominated by the President of the United States in the ordinary way and his nomination to receive the approval or confirmation of the Senate. These are very high officers; they are charged with very high and important duties in the execution of the proposed law of Congress. The terms of their office are fixed. They are to have a salary. They are to take an oath of office. In all respects, I take it, it will not be denied that they are officers in contemplation of law. The proposed amendment provides for electing these officers by the popular vote.

Now, in my judgment Congress has no power to authorize the people of this District to elect these officers, or indeed any officers. I say so, for the reason, that upon looking into the Constitution, from which all the powers of Congress are derived, there is no provision which confers upon Congress the authority to confer suffrage upon anybody. No citizen of the United States by virtue of such citizenship has any right whatsoever to suffrage. I go further and say, that there is no provision in the Constitution, there is no power reasonably inferable from it, which authorizes Congress to confer suffrage upon a single human being. The truth is, Mr. President, that the Government of the United States was not framed, was not organized, was not carried into practical effect for the purpose of conferring suffrage upon anybody for any purpose. Wherever the subject of suffrage is touched upon in the Constitution, it is touched upon as a right that belongs to a citizen of the United States as the citizen of a State. It refers to him as a voting citizen of the State in which he lives.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MERRIMON. With pleasure.

Mr. MORTON. I understand that my friend says that Congress has no power to confer suffrage upon anybody. I ask how it got the power to confer it in the Territories in the organization of territorial governments?

Mr. MERRIMON. As an original power, I undertake to say that Congress had no authority to confer suffrage even in the Territories upon the people of the Territories as citizens of the United States, and I challenge any one who will say otherwise to point me to a single provision of the Constitution that confers it. I repeat what I said a moment ago, and if any one shall deny it I challenge him, with all respect, to cite any clause of the Constitution which does authorize such a construction as that Congress or the Federal Government can confer suffrage upon any one for any purpose whatsoever; and I repeat that the citizen of the United States as such has no right to suffrage. Nowhere is there any provision in the Constitution which confers upon Congress or any department of the Federal Government the right to confer suffrage upon any citizen of the United States. The right of suffrage is not a right that belongs to a citizen of the United States as such citizen. The Government of the United States was not framed for the purpose of conferring the right of suffrage. The right of suffrage does not appertain to the Government of the United States at all, nor was it intended that citizens of the United States should exercise that right as such. The Government was not framed for any such purpose, but for certain general purposes defined and prescribed by the Constitution; and the officers of the Government which were to exercise these powers, whether executive, legislative, or judicial, should be elected and appointed under the Constitution by the people of the United States as citizens of the States.

In furtherance and in support of this idea I beg now to call the attention of the Senate to article 2, section 2, paragraph 2, of the Constitution. In prescribing and defining the powers of the President, it is provided in the paragraph to which I refer, in these words:

> He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint embassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law: but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments.

With the exception of electors of President and Vice-President and members of Congress, this clause embraces all officers of the United States; and any officer of the United States, except President and Vice-President and members of Congress, must be appointed as provided in the clause of the Constitution which I have just read. I am warranted in saying so, because this clause of the Constitution is absolute; because there are no words of qualification there; and because, with the exception I have mentioned, there are no clauses whatever in the Constitution placing any limitation upon the power conferred by this clause.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. MERRIMON. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORTON. I ask the Senator whether a territorial officer, or an officer of the District of Columbia, is an officer of the United States, in the purview of this provision of the Constitution?

Mr. MERRIMON. I answer the Senator and say yes; and I will advert to that more in detail by and by.

So that it appears, Mr. President, by this clause—so absolute and so exclusive in its character—that all officers of the United States except those which I have specified, and which are specified in the Constitution, must be appointed by the President, or by some head of Department, or by the court in the exercise of power conferred by Congress.

When we come to examine the clause of the Constitution which confers power upon Congress touching the District of Columbia, we find there no provision which limits or changes or enlarges the clause of the Constitution which I have read conferring power upon the President. It does not purport to put any limitation upon that clause or upon any other clause in the Constitution. The clause in reference to the District of Columbia is a clause forming part and parcel of the Constitution, subject to and governed by the other clauses of the Constitution as much as any other clause. It is not independent of the balance of the Constitution. It does not override the Constitution in other respects, in the absence of any language showing such a purpose. Can it be reasonably contended that this clause of the Constitution confers absolute power; that this section is not subject to the limitations of the Constitution just as are other sections and clauses?

I beg now to cite the clause in reference to the District of Columbia. I read from article 1, section 8, paragraph 17, of the Constitution:

> Congress shall have power to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever, over such District (not exceeding ten miles square) as may, by cession of particular States and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of the Government of the United States, and to exercise like authority over all places purchased by the consent of the Legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock-yards, and other needful buildings.

That clause embraces every provision in the Constitution touching the District of Columbia, and that it confers all the power that Congress can exercise in reference to the District of Columbia.

Now, sir, will any one pretend, will any lawyer pretend, will any reasonable man pretend, that that clause of the Constitution overrides, absorbs, and swallows up all the balance of the Constitution; or is it not more reasonable and just and wise to say that it is put there as part and parcel of the Constitution in connection with the balance of it, and to be construed in reference to the other clauses of the Constitution, and subject to the limitations contained in the Constitution as a whole? If that is so, and it seems to me there can be no doubt that that is the just view, then I put it to every reasonable mind to say how it is that Congress can provide an officer of the United States to discharge his duties in the District of Columbia and allow the people to elect him in the face of the clause which confers upon the President exclusive power to appoint all officers. It seems to me unreasonable and absurd to so contend, and that the very statement of the proposition is sufficient to show the correctness of my view. To legislate does not imply or confer power to appoint or elect an officer; to legislate is to make a law that has to be executed by an officer or some one. To do as the Senator proposes to do, we not only legislate for the District of Columbia; but he proposes that we shall go further and confer upon—delegate to—the people of the District of Columbia the right to elect certain officers which Congress in its judgment deems necessary for the good administration of the law in this District. I put this view of it: Suppose the proposition made by the Senator was to allow Congress to elect the regents and other officers provided for in this bill, will any one pretend that could be done? Why, sir, it would shock the mind of every Senator present; it would especially shock the legal mind, the constitutional mind. Congress has no power to elect an officer, and why? Because this clause of the Constitution does not confer any such power; because there is no clause of the Constitution anywhere that confers any such power; because the clause of the Constitution conferring power upon the President is exclusive, and provides in terms that he shall appoint officers to execute the laws of the United States everywhere and as well in the District of Columbia as elsewhere.

Now, sir, I am not inadvertent to the ground upon which it is said Congress has power to confer the right upon the people of the District of Columbia to elect the officers to govern them. It goes upon the ground that Congress has the right, like the several State Legislatures, to create municipal corporations for the government of cities and for other purposes. That, sir, I deny. I do not deny that Congress for certain purposes and in certain ways might create a municipal corporation. There is no doubt about that; but it must exercise the power to create a municipal corporation for some purpose authorized by the Constitution, and it must create that municipal corporation in pursuance of the powers conferred by, and the limitations contained in, the Constitution. So I am willing to concede, for the purpose of this argument, that Congress might make the city of Washington a municipal corporation; but how? Manifestly according to the powers conferred by, and the limitations contained in, the Constitution. They may provide that the city of Washington shall be governed by a mayor, or regents, or any other officers which Congress may be pleased to designate and provide for; but they cannot provide that the people of the District of Columbia shall elect those officers; and why? Because the right of suffrage is not known to the Government of the United States; because the Constitution provides that in the appointment of all officers of the United States of every grade and condition they shall be appointed by the President, except in the cases which I have repeatedly pointed out. Therefore it is that Congress cannot authorize the people of the District to elect these officers, and this seems to me perfectly plain. Congress can create an office, the office of regent, the office of mayor, the office of commissioner, any office Congress may see fit, for the District of Columbia; but Congress cannot elect that officer; Congress cannot empower the people to elect him. The President, by virtue of the power conferred upon him, must appoint that officer, and his nomination must be approved by the Senate. I go upon the ground that this clause of the Constitution is limited by every other clause of the Constitution according to its proper force and effect as a Constitution.

I go further, and say that Congress has no power to confer upon the people of the District of Columbia the right to elect a legislative assembly, and I put that proposition upon this ground: that, by the terms of the Constitution, Congress shall have the exclusive right to legislate for the District of Columbia, and there is no power which authorizes Congress to submit to anybody else the right to legislate. Suppose that Congress creates a legislative body, such a one as existed here lately. Such a body would go on and make laws, laws of the greatest moment, laws affecting the people of the District, their liberties, their property, their lives, and the property of the people of the United States—thousands of people and property worth millions of dollars. I maintain that Congress has no power to confer or delegate that power, because such power cannot be delegated. Legislative power must be exercised only by the body upon whom it is conferred by the Constitution. Congress cannot delegate this power to legislate, nor can Congress derogate from the right of the Executive to make the appointments. In support of that view I beg to read from a very high authority. I read from Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, at page 114:

> The authority that makes the laws has large discretion in determining the means through which they shall be executed; and the performance of many duties which they may provide for by law they may refer either to the chief executive of the State, or, at their option, to any other executive or ministerial officer, or even to a person specially named for the duty. What can be definitely said on this subject is this: That such powers as are specially conferred by the constitution upon the governor, or upon any other specified officer, the legislature cannot require or authorize to be performed by any other officer or authority; and from those duties which the constitution requires of him he cannot be excused by law.

Thus it appears by this high legal authority that where a power of appointment or any other power is conferred by the Constitution on the executive or ministerial officer, that power cannot be derogated from; it cannot be delegated; it must be exercised by that officer; and not only exercised by him to the exclusion of everybody else, but he cannot be excused from a proper and lawful exercise of it. And so in reference to the exercise of legislative power; it cannot be delegated. The same law-writer says:

> One of the settled maxims in constitutional law is that the power conferred upon the Legislature to make laws cannot be delegated by that department to any other body or authority. Where the sovereign power of the State has located the authority, there it must remain; and by the constitutional agency alone the laws must be made until the Constitution itself is changed. The power to whose judgment, wisdom, and patriotism this high prerogative has been intrusted cannot relieve itself of the responsibility by choosing other agencies upon which the power shall be devolved, nor can it substitute the judgment, wisdom, and patriotism of any other body for those to which alone the people have seen fit to confide this sovereign trust.

Now, sir, by the terms of the Constitution, the American people conferred upon Congress the exclusive power and right to legislate for the District of Columbia. By that Constitution they conferred upon the President of the United States power to appoint all officers provided for administering the laws which apply to that District; and therefore I say it is by the terms of the Constitution, by its spirit, by its policy, manifest that Congress cannot authorize the people to elect these officers; nor can Congress delegate to the people of the District of Columbia the right to legislate for themselves.

But it not only so appears by the Constitution and by legal construction of that instrument that Congress has no such power, but when we come to consider the purposes for which the District of Columbia was ceded to the United States, for which the Constitution authorized it to be taken and held by the United States, it seems to me it must be manifest that the purpose of the framers of the Constitution was that Congress alone should legislate for the government of this people. What was the object in acquiring the territory of the District of Columbia? Not commercial purposes, not manufacturing purposes, not agricultural purposes, but the purpose is mentioned in the clause of the Constitution which I have read; it was to have a place for the seat of Government, a place where the Capitol could stand unmolested by anybody, where the power of the nation would be unlimited except by the Constitution, where the President could execute the powers of his office without interference by State or other power, where Congress would legislate for the District without the interference of any other legislative body, where the judiciary would sit and expound those laws uninfluenced by State authority or any other authority whatsoever. I do not believe it was contemplated that a great city should spring up here. In my judgment a great capital city is not necessary or desirable. On the contrary, it seems to me that it is not wise to have one. There are considerations which would forbid the propriety of having a great capital city at Washington, or situated in the District of Columbia. Suppose the capital situated here were to-day as large as the city of London, or Paris, or New York; what influence would such a city in its own interest have over Congress, and over the judiciary, and over the Executive? What power might some designing and ambitious man through the mob exercise over Congress and over all the Departments of the Government? It might be such as to require the keeping of a standing army here. Can it be contended that that was ever contemplated; that Congress had the unlimited power contended for by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON?] Will he pretend that Congress can make any law without any limitation? If he is correct, then there is no limitation upon the power of Congress in the District of Columbia. It may do what it pleases; it might establish any orders of authority or of honor or rank or dignity. It might go on and provide special privileges. It might, if Congress can exercise the high powers contended for under this clause of the Constitution, pass laws which would violate every bill of rights in the Union, violate every clause of the Constitution established for the protection of the American people and their property at home and abroad; for in that respect, as he contends, Congress is absolute.

The Senator probably would not admit that. He would say to me, "I do not claim such power for Congress." Then if you do not claim such absolute power as that, pray, I ask, where is the limitation on the power of Congress; and if there is a limitation, where does the limitation come from, when and where does it begin and when and where end? If there is a limitation it must manifestly be a limitation imposed by the Constitution. If one limitation in the Constitution applies to Congress, does not another limitation apply? Does not every limitation apply, and does not the limitation which confers upon the President power to appoint these officers apply? And that other limitation which confers upon Congress the power to legislate, does not that apply? And if the limitations of the Constitution apply, then, sir, it is manifest that the policy of the framers of the Constitution was that Congress should have absolute control of every foot of the territory of the District of Columbia, the city of Washington and all; and they so provided in the Constitution—they left nothing to doubt—there is no evidence anywhere going to show that by construction Congress might delegate power to elect officers or to legislate.

But, sir, there are other reasons tending to show the policy of the Constitution in this respect. Washington City—the District of Columbia—is the common meeting-place of the American people. It belongs to them in one sense. If it is not so now, I trust the day is not distant when it will be, when the American people will come here to interchange thoughts and courtesy, to interchange congratulations, to learn common channels of thought, to establish an American policy, an American system of thought, an American system of effort, an American system of industry, an American system of commerce, an American system of agriculture, an American system of manufactures, and to learn republican dignity and American simplicity and honesty. For one, I do not desire to see a great city here like Paris or London. I do not desire to see a kingly city established here. I want to see a city established here that conforms to a republican form of government; one that harmonizes with the spirit of the Constitution and the genius of the American people. I trust in God the day will never come when kingly personages and persons who follow the trains of kingly personages will have control or a potent voice in the capital of this nation.

So that I say upon every consideration it seems to me that the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana ought not to prevail, and indeed that it would be void if it should be questioned in the courts as part of a statute.

Here, sir, I might close what I have to say in reference to this amendment; but I deem it worth while to make some allusion to an insinuation—no, I will take that back, the word is a little offensive—I will say an intimation made by the honorable Senator from Indiana, and also by the honorable Senator from California, that my opposition and the opposition of other gentlemen to this amendment proceeds from opposition to the right of the colored people of this District and of the Union to exercise the right of suffrage. Sir, for my own part, I deny that I am moved by any such consideration. I insist that the question of negro suffrage does not enter into this discussion legitimately. It seems to me that it is improperly thrust into this debate, and it has the effect, whether it was so intended or not, to engender a feeling that ought not to prevail in discussing a matter of so much moment.

Why, sir, who is hostile to the colored people of the District of Columbia? Nobody. Who is hostile to the colored people of the South, to whom allusion was made yesterday in the debate, though it was not germane? Nobody. Are the people whom I represent hostile to negro suffrage and the colored people? Are the white people of any portion of the South hostile to the colored people and to negro suffrage? Why, sir, as an original proposition I have no doubt that thousands upon thousands were opposed to it. They did not desire to see it established, and there is no question about the fact that thousands upon thousands of republicans and northern people doubted the propriety of conferring on that race, immediately on their liberation, in their ignorance, the right of suffrage, and through it to control the lives, the liberties, and the property of the people; not because they had any hostile feeling to the colored people of the South or anywhere else, but because they believed and knew they were not prepared for the exercise of the right of suffrage.

But, sir, whatever opinion may have existed in the outset touching negro suffrage, it has been established by, I undertake to say, revolutionary force, and by that act of revolution it has been put upon the country; and the people of the whole country, and particularly of the South, have accepted negro suffrage as an accomplished fact, and it has become a part of the settled policy of this country; and, sir, no respectable number of white people of the South desire to interfere with the subject of negro suffrage; no respectable number of people there desire to deprive the colored race of the right to vote. I believe I am a representative man of the white people of the South, and while I did not desire negro suffrage, I am sure that I have no such purpose. I never entertained any such purpose. I not only make this declaration, but I insist that I am sustained in it by the action of the southern people everywhere, even in those States where we have lately witnessed political disturbances which were attributed to opposition to negro suffrage.

Why do I say so? I say so for the reason, that in many of the States of the South the white people have had the power to cut the negro off from suffrage in a great measure. They could have established qualifications other than that of color, race, or previous condition of servitude; an educational qualification, a property qualification, other qualifications might have been provided by the white people where they had a majority; but in no single instance have they done it, nor have they intimated any purpose to do so. Take my own State for instance. There the democrats have control, and they are the men who it is suggested are not to be trusted on this subject. What have they done there? Every colored man there over twenty-one years of age has the right to vote, every one has the right to hold office if he can get votes enough to elect him. Every colored man in the State is protected just like every white man. Every colored woman is protected just like every white woman. There is no distinction politically before the law there. There is perfect harmony, there is peace, quiet, and stability of government there. And all this is done with the free, voluntary will of the people of North Carolina. Go to the State of Georgia, and we find a like state of things. Go to the State of Alabama, and it is the same way. Go to the State of Texas, and it is the same there. Go to the State of Tennessee, and you will find political rights established there for all races and colors. These States are democratic. The disturbances that have been adverted to so repeatedly, and that are paraded before the country for intended political effect, have not proceeded from any controversy growing out of the question of suffrage. They have proceeded invariably in every case—and I challenge any one to show to the contrary—out of misrule inflicted by negro suffrage, the negroes being prompted and misled and deceived by wicked and irresponsible men, who have sought their own personal gain and supposed aggrandizement, and who would not have had the power or authority which enabled them to perpetrate such wrongs if they had not been sustained and encouraged by the republican party of the nation. Such a state of things would not have happened if a republican administration had left the white people of the South and the negroes of the South alone to manage their own affairs and consult their own best interests.

In further corroboration of what I have said, it affords me pleasure to turn to the case of the people of Arkansas recently in this very matter. A state of misrule and usurpation that produced almost general anarchy, resulted in the call of a convention in that State very recently for the purpose of amending the State constitution. The delegates were elected by an overwhelming majority of the people of that State, as the election records show. The convention assembled. The democrats, if you please to call them such, the white men, if you please to call them such, were in a very large majority, and they had absolute control of the convention, and power to make the new constitution as they pleased, subject only to the Constitution of the United States. Now, let us see what they did. While they had the power to deprive the negro of the right to vote because he happens to be ignorant and cannot read or for other considerations—for they might adopt any qualifications as to the right to vote other than race, color, or previous condition of servitude—what did those men do? They made a constitution in many respects a model for any people. They made an organic law which illustrates a high sense of popular right and civilization. This constitution was made only a few weeks ago, and I will read a few of its most striking provisions pertinent to be read here at this time. I read from the bill of rights, which provides, among other things:

SECTION 1. All political power is inherent in the people, and government is instituted for their protection, security, and benefit; and they have the right to alter, reform, or abolish the same in such manner as they may think proper.

SEC. 2. All men are created equally free and independent, and have certain inherent and inalienable rights; among which are those of enjoying and defending life and liberty, of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property and reputation, and of pursuing their own happiness. To secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed.

SEC. 3.—

This is important, as showing their animus especially toward the colored people of that State—

The equality of all persons before the law is recognized and shall ever remain inviolate; nor shall any citizen ever be deprived of any right, privilege, or immunity, nor exempted from any burden or duty on account of race, color, or previous condition.

Where, sir, is there a friend of the colored race in this country who will ask for a higher protection than that, a nobler declaration of right and liberty! Now, we come to the subject of suffrage, which they might have qualified, and what do they say? They provide as follows:

SECTION 1. Every male citizen of the United States, or male person who has declared his intention of becoming a citizen of the same, of the age of twenty-one years, who has resided in the State twelve months, and in the county six months, and in the voting precinct or ward one month, next preceding any election where he may propose to vote, shall be entitled to vote at all elections by the people.

SEC. 2. Elections shall be free and equal. No power, civil or military, shall ever interfere to prevent the free exercise of the right of suffrage; nor shall any law be enacted whereby the right to vote at any election shall be made to depend upon any previous registration of the elector's name, or whereby such right shall be impaired or forfeited, except for the commission of a felony at common law, upon lawful conviction thereof.

Can any State in the Union show a more liberal provision, one that is more catholic, more generous toward the colored race?

Then on the subject of the right to hold office, under the Constitution of the United States, it was competent for this convention to have provided that a negro should not hold office because he was a negro; and yet such a provision was not suggested. No limitation of that sort was suggested, much less adopted; nor, I venture to say, are there a hundred men in that State who would desire to prohibit the negro from holding office if he desired it and could be elected.

Take, again, the subject of education and see what provision is made in that respect. I read from the article on education. Article 14, sections 1 and 2, provide as follows:

SEC. 1. Intelligence and virtue being the safeguards of liberty and the bulwark of a free and good government, the State shall ever maintain a general, suitable, and efficient system of free schools, whereby all persons in the State, between the ages of six and twenty-one years, may receive gratuitous instruction.

SEC. 2. No money or property belonging to the public-school fund or to this State, for the benefit of schools or universities, shall ever be used for any other than for the respective purposes to which it belongs.

I read, Mr. President, these extracts to show the Senate and the country that there is no hostile feeling on the part of the southern white people against the southern black people. They are naturally friends. Naturally the whites and blacks there have a common interest. They have a common interest in many controlling respects. I venture the assertion that if the proposition was submitted to the southern white people to-morrow, and they had the means to do it, to deport every negro in the South from this country, they would vote against it by an overwhelming majority. Why? Because the negro is an essential part of our population. They are essential there as laborers; they are essential as domestics; and there is no country on earth where they can go on in the pursuit of peace and happiness and general prosperity as they can there.

Mr. CLAYTON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. MERRIMON. I will.

Mr. CLAYTON. He has called up the case of Arkansas. Does the Senator know that under the new constitution of Arkansas the tax is so limited for school purposes that a greater amount cannot be raised by taxation than thirty-five cents to the head of the children of the State? Thirty-five cents is the greatest amount that can be raised by taxation under that constitution for the education of the children of that State. Now, I should like to ask him whether thirty-five cents a head will educate the children of this country. As a matter of fact to-day under that government, with Congress watching it and with the constant fear that Congress will interfere with it, every school in the State is closed for the first time since reconstruction.

Not only that, Mr. President, but while it is true that they have made a very fair constitution, if you will examine all its features you will find that it is applicable only while they are under the surveillance of Congress. When they find themselves well seated, they have provided very convenient machinery for changing it almost as speedily as they put it into execution.

Mr. MERRIMON. I regret, Mr. President, that I am not familiar with the value of the property of the State of Arkansas and the pecuniary condition of that people, so as to answer so well as I should like to do the question propounded to me by the Senator. But, sir, if his people are as poor as we are given by him to understand they are, so that they can pay but thirty-five cents on the head toward education, it argues a hopeless state for that people, and it naturally suggests the idea that we should inquire how they came into that unhappy condition. It suggests that the loud and long complaints of misrule and outrage were well grounded. And who perpetrated that? The country knows.

Mr. CLAYTON. If the Senator will allow me further, I ask whether he does not know that the Legislature of Arkansas, under this new government, has impoverished the school fund by allowing titles to school lands to be made upon the payment of confederate money and confederate war bonds?

Mr. MERRIMON. I do not.

Mr. CLAYTON. Then he does not know what is the fact. No wonder, then, the school fund is impoverished and that we are poor.

Mr. MERRIMON. But, Mr. President, without reference to the amount of their school fund, without reference to their condition of poverty, one thing is certain, that by their constitution and laws the two races, in their poverty and misfortunes, are on an exact political and civil equality, and that provided, too, by the true white men of the State. The Senator who represents the people of Arkansas—a gallant people, as the records of the past show; a people whose noble and heroic daring has been illustrated on more battle-fields and in more wars than one—intimates that they made this constitution because they were and are afraid of Congress, because they are afraid of the public sentiment at the North, because they are afraid of the President and Federal troops. I trust in God, I believe, I know—that he is mistaken about that. I trust that there is no people in the country afraid of Congress.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Even if they are wicked people who wish to overturn things?

Mr. CLAYTON. I trust there is.

Mr. MERRIMON. Yes; I would not even have wicked men afraid of Congress.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suppose so.

Mr. MERRIMON. I would not; for by the spirit of the Constitution and the laws of this country even a wicked man is protected, so that you shall not kill him like a dog without trial or hearing. There may be those in this country—I doubt not there are some such people—who would like to establish that doctrine; but when it shall be done, it can only be done by revolutionary force. By the Constitution and the laws of this country the most wicked man, the highest criminal, is entitled to be heard and tried according to the law of the land. But, sir, I maintain that the Senator from Arkansas misrepresents, perhaps inadvertently, his constituents. They are not cowards, nor are they afraid of Congress or anybody else, and their recent action shows it.

Mr. CLAYTON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. MERRIMON. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLAYTON. I do not think I represented the people of the State of Arkansas as cowards.

Mr. MERRIMON. You said they were acting under the surveillance of Congress. That implies fear.

Mr. CLAYTON. I say Congress has had them under surveillance, and I am glad of it. Since he has raised this Arkansas question, I say to him that I hope the whole question will come before Congress, not now when we have no time to discuss it, but at a time when the Congress of the United States and the whole people of this country may know just what has been done. When that is known, I venture to say you will find that those men have good cause to fear that their work may be overturned and kicked aside.

Mr. THURMAN. Go back four years and we will join with you.

Mr. CLAYTON. We will go back as far as you desire. Does the Senator from North Carolina know that measures are now pending before the two houses of that Legislature, one of which makes vagrancy a penitentiary offense, another of which provides for penitentiaries in every county of the State, another of which provides for the selling out of the services of vagrants? If he does, let him reflect what that means.

Mr. MERRIMON. I do not know that, and will not undertake to say how that is; but I apprehend from past experience that the people of Arkansas will know how to punish crime and outrage upon their rights.

They know the right, and dare the right maintain.

But, sir, what I want to get back to, and what I am not going to pass away from until I get through with it, is this, that the people of Arkansas have not been afraid of the surveillance of Congress. They have dared to act like American citizens and American freemen. False and violent political clamor has been started and kept up with the view of arousing the northern people and Congress against those down-trodden people and to make political capital. But in the face of all this they dared to suppress a tyrant and a usurper and cast him down and establish constitutional law, and they did it by a vote which shows that thousands and tens of thousands of republicans, black and white, supported them in that effort. These facts do not go to show that they are afraid—that they are a race or set of cowards.

But, sir, I cited that fact to support the position I took that there was naturally no controversy between the black and the white races, and let alone the two races would be friends and mutual supporters. Naturally they are friends. To whom are the colored people of the South to look for protection, for friendship, for employment, for all that makes life desirable to them, but to the white people of the South? Will any man pretend that the handful of political adventurers who have gone down there from the North will extend to them the protection and the encouragement and give them the labor that they would need, that they could or would educate them, that they have any means to educate them? Let the records in the South of the past eight years show what they can and will do for any race. Why, sir, it is absurd to talk about such a thing. I repeat, there is no controversy between the white and black race in the South, save on the subject of misrule, superinduced by wicked and designing men.

Look at my State, sir. Under republican rule there, under the bayonet, what was the condition of the negro? Almost intolerable. What was the condition of the white man? It was intolerable. The convention that assembled under the auspices of congressional reconstruction undertook to increase our debt millions. The first Legislature that was elected under it, together with the convention, undertook to increase it over $16,000,000. Those bonds were put upon the markets of the country, and of that vast sum less than $500,000 went into the public works of the State. This was mainly the handiwork of political adventurers from the North. Such things as that were the cause of political and protracted disturbance in the South. Wherever the white people have been let alone, wherever the black people have been let alone, there is peace and law and harmony, as witness my State, as witness the State of Georgia, as witness the State of Tennessee, as witness the State of Texas. Wherever you find that there are disturbances between the two races in the South, there you find misrule—intolerable misrule at that, and such as would be condemned by any honest man. I do not care whether he is a northern man or a southern man, whether he is a white man or whether he is a black man, it would be condemned by him if he were honest and just. What I have said of northern men only applies to mere political adventurers—agitators, seditious men—not those who have gone to the South to cast their fortunes with the southern people. These latter are welcome there, and the regret is that more have not gone.

When the two races are let alone in the South, if you will just withdraw the influences that ought not to exist there; if you will withdraw the Army; if you will discountenance and condemn that class of men who have led the colored race astray and stimulated these troubles, you will see peace and harmony all over the South. Wherever their baleful influences have passed away, there you see peace, harmony, and prosperity, and a spirit of friendly tolerance. In my State their reign, thank God, is over; and what do you witness as a consequence? The State is slowly recuperating, perfect harmony between the races, stable laws honestly and faithfully administered, and a suffering and impoverished people trying to make arrangements to pay their public debt. Go to the State of Georgia and you witness the same thing. Go to the State of Tennessee and you witness the same thing. Wherever those influences are withdrawn there you see harmony and returning prosperity and growing friendship between the two races; and I give my republican friends fair notice now that the negro vote, in my judgment, will never be given solidly again. How natural it was for the negro to support the republican party at first, because they understood that that party by one means or another and for one purpose or another had given them freedom!

Mr. EDMUNDS. That was true, was it not?

Mr. MERRIMON. That was natural; and I think that, but not that alone, together with other sinister causes to which I have alluded, brought about the unholy disturbances referred to. I think Mr. Jefferson Davis and his followers had a good deal to do, in conjunction with the republican party, in giving them their liberty. [Laughter.]

The republicans alone did not do it. Their freedom is a consequence of the war, and those who made the war in the end made them free.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is so. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. MERRIMON. But, sir, it seems that the republican party contemplated that they were to escape from one sort of slavery to pass into another. The slavery in the South before the war was little more than the political slavery that drives the negroes to the ballot-box where they have the power nowadays. What I ask, sir, is what the southern people ask, is that these untoward influences shall be withdrawn; let the white people of the South alone; let the black people of the South alone; let them go on in the pursuit of their true interests and happiness, and they may become prosperous, and you will hear of no more disturbances and riots in Mississippi, or Arkansas, or Louisiana, or Alabama, or anywhere else. Whenever the negro, as was contemplated by the amendments to the Constitution, shall exercise the right of suffrage according to those provisions of the Constitution and according to law, you will hear no more of trouble. Whenever that is done the negro question is settled and the conflict of races is over. The white race and the black race have a common interest. Too many of their interests are common, they are too much interested in each other to bring on a conflict. What they want and need is to be let alone. They want peace and quiet, and then harmony and stable government and happiness and prosperity will come as a natural and certain consequence, and they will not come till that day shall happen. The best thing that the President can do is to withdraw the troops, let the people alone, not interfere to sustain those who are fomenting and establishing discord, practicing misrule, and setting up usurpations there. Let the law take its course, and then we shall be free from controversy such as we have had unhappily in the last six or twelve months in certain localities.

Mr. SARGENT. What of Vicksburgh?

Mr. MERRIMON. The Senator cites Vicksburgh again. I had almost forgotten it, but I will pay my respects to Vicksburgh, and the Senator. I regret what happened there and that there was cause for it, but I put it to the Senator from California, I put it to every honorable and just minded man, to say whether, when a band of desperate people, such as those who were marching upon the city of Vicksburgh to slay and slaughter and rob and plunder the city, the people so set upon had not the right to defend themselves, and if need be to the extent of taking life? Will he say that there was provocation? No reasonable person will pretend that there was provocation that would warrant a movement of that kind to attack a city. The facts as published—and I get my facts as he does, from the newspapers—go to show that the misrule in that city and in the county where that city is located has become intolerable. Neither the lives nor the property of the people were safe, and they resolved to liberate themselves from an incompetent, dishonest, and irresponsible officer; and because they did that it is stated that with the sanction of the governor of Mississippi hundreds of black men marched upon that city to assault it. I say, in this high place to the American people, and I think they will sanction what I say, that those people had a right to defend themselves to the extent of taking life, if need be. But, sir, there is this striking fact: everybody who knows the colored race knows that they have a warm feeling for each other, and especially at this time. The facts show that the negroes in the city of Vicksburgh did not join the rioters who were marching on the city. That is a significant fact, and shows that the negroes of the city knew that the action of those who were marching upon it was improper and criminal, and that they were putting their lives, and justly so, too, in jeopardy. I direct attention to the Vicksburgh affair as showing, and most forcibly, the grave necessity for withdrawing from the South the untoward and pestiferous influences that have operated in certain states of the South to produce riot, usurpation, and bloodshed. Let the Administration stay its hand of force and the American people discountenance seditious adventurers and meddlers, and the whole country may anticipate the most peaceful and happy results.

Why, sir, if the people of Vicksburgh had honest rule, if that sheriff had had an honest bond, if he had been honest and responsible, does anybody believe there would have been any disturbance there? No one can really so believe. But, sir, go to New York or Massachusetts, and let a sheriff or tax-collector there have no bond, while he collects thousands and tens of thousands of dollars from the people and it is squandered and applied to no legitimate purposes, do you suppose the people of Massachusetts or New York would tamely submit to such outrage and crime against their rights? No, not for an hour would they; nor will they in Vicksburgh or anywhere else, nor ought they to do it. Sir, this misrule ought to be suppressed; and if the powers of the nation were used for that purpose, as they might legitimately be, I believe they would be suppressed and cease to exist.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator says that all that is necessary in the South is to allow the law to take its course. I understand what he means by the law taking its course to be not that the citizens should take arms and kill one hundred and fifty colored men, not one of themselves being hurt, except one by an accidental discharge of the gun of his own comrades, but that the law shall take such course as it would take in Massachusetts and other Northern States. The Senator ought to be sure of his facts. In reference to the Vicksburgh matter I would ask him how the law took its course? In the case of Coushatta Parish, in Louisiana, where the officers were compelled to resign, and they were not colored men either, and ordered to leave the State, were promised a safe escort out of the State and were murdered on their passage, there the law took its course, too!

Mr. MERRIMON. I do not know those facts. I have not seen them stated in any paper that I have read. But the Senator undertakes to assign me a false position. I cannot allow him to do that. I said, if the law should take its course there would be no trouble, no more misrule. If that negro sheriff had had an honest, faithful, and responsible bond, there would have been no difficulty. But as the Senator puts the Vicksburgh affair to me as complaint, I will take the liberty to ask him if he ever saw such an organization as a vigilance committee in his own State, or if he ever heard there that men were caught up by the dozen and hanged without trial of any sort, and that the state of affairs there made it absolutely necessary for society to invoke the aid and protection of such committees?

Mr. SARGENT. Allow me to answer the question. We had a vigilance committee in San Francisco which became a part of the history of the State; but the vigilance committee did not go out upon the highways and murder men by the hundred and bury fifty in a grave. Outside of all forms of law there was a trial and an opportunity for counsel to be heard on both sides and a jury impaneled, and I have no doubt as fair and impartial a hearing of the defendants as ever takes place before a court of justice. But I do not stand here to approve even that irregular method of administering what was really justice. Furthermore, there were not dozens of men hung up; there were only two or three, and they were generally admitted to be very desperate parties.

Mr. MERRIMON. Why, sir, it was better or worse than that. That vigilance committee virtually took control of the whole State, and I believe they arrested the chief justice of the State; and their power prevailed there for an indefinite period. What led to that but lawless misrule? And what led to the riotous conduct in Mississippi and in Louisiana and in Arkansas? Nothing but misrule, intolerable and without a parallel. Will the honorable Senator deny it? Does not the world know it? Thank Heaven, sir, the American people understand it now, and they have set the seal of their condemnation upon it; and I trust they will do it again and again until we have a new order of things. I think the time has passed by when honorable Senators ought to undertake to bring the suggested conflict of races into every debate. It will answer no practical party purposes; it will not answer any proper or just purpose. You will find the white people, the democrats, if you please, and the colored people harmonizing. They are harmonizing even among the troubles in Louisiana and in Mississippi and in Arkansas, as the late elections show. Thousands of colored people must have voted the democratic ticket, else the majorities that were unquestioned in many cases could not have been what they were.

So that, to close my remarks, and I did not intend to occupy the third of the time I have, I say to the honorable Senator from Indiana and to the Senator from California that the question of negro suffrage has nothing to do with this debate. When I come to vote upon this proposition I shall vote without reference to whether the vote is to be white or whether it is to be black. When it is necessary to defend the right of the colored people to vote or in any other respects, while I have life and strength I will be ready to defend their rights here and everywhere. But I am not willing to see the American people prejudiced, the District of Columbia prejudiced, my State prejudiced, any State prejudiced, by an everlasting appeal to this falsely-suggested conflict of races and the supposed desire on the part of somebody to deprive the negro of the right to vote. I stand here as thoroughly committed to their interest as the Senator from Indiana or anybody else. I represent a large constituency of negroes. I am ready to protect their rights at home and here and everywhere, and I have done it according to the measure of my ability; and because I and others like me have done it there is peace and quiet and prosperity and stable laws in my State, and an honest administration of the government. Withdraw unlawful force, cease this tyrannizing and despotic interference, and there will be peace and quiet and prosperity in Louisiana, in Mississippi, in Arkansas, in Texas, and everywhere. That is what the country wants, peace and quiet, and have the controversy about negro-suffrage and negro rule and white rule and democratic rule ended and settled to the satisfaction of everybody, and forever.

I trust, Mr. President, that if I have spoken warmly I will be pardoned for it. I, sir, and my constituents have a deep interest in this subject. The people whom I have the honor in part to represent on this floor have accepted the revolutionary reconstruction which has become part and parcel of the Constitution and policy of this country. They stand ready to protect it, to defend it, and to stand by the Union everywhere and under all circumstances; and when the Union shall have been allowed to be the Union of the Constitution, when Congress shall be a Congress in harmony with the spirit of the Union and not of a party and with the Constitution, when we have a Union under the Constitution, you will find no people more ready than the people of North Carolina, and I venture further to say, of the South, to stand by it and defend it to the last, to the extent of their lives and their property.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We have seen that.

Mr. MERRIMON. Yes, sir. The Senator from Vermont says he has seen that, and if I had the time and the occasion were opportune I could readily show how extremists North and South precipitated the civil war through which this country has passed. There was cause on both sides from the beginning. Jefferson Davis and the secessionists of the South were not alone responsible for the late war. There were agitators and extremists and disunionists who proclaimed the doctrine "Let the Union slide" who were as responsible for the war as the secessionists. I stand by the Union now; I shall stand by the Union forever; and when the state of things that I have suggested shall come about—and I trust it will come about before four years shall elapse—you will find the people of North Carolina, the people of the whole South, as faithful and devoted to the Union as the people of Massachusetts or New York.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I move that the pending bill be laid on the table for the present with a view to resume the consideration of the finance bill.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLINTON LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 4141) to make East Pascagoula, in the State of Mississippi, a port of delivery, in the district of Pearl River; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed a resolution for the printing of two hundred and thirty thousand copies of the annual report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the year 1872, and for the printing of one hundred and fifty-five thousand copies of the report for the year 1873; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

CONTRACT SURGEONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 1043) suspending so much of an act entitled "An act organizing the several staff corps of the Army," approved June 23, 1874, as applies to contract surgeons, which was in lines 4 and 5 to strike out "the 1st day of February, 1875," and insert in lieu thereof "otherwise provided by law."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let that be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SARGENT. Had it not better on the table? That may be a mere formal amendment; and if the bill is to be passed it should be passed soon.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well; let it lie on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will lie on the table for the present.

HOLIDAY RECESS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That when the two Houses adjourn on Wednesday, the 23d instant, they adjourn to meet again on Tuesday, the 5th day of January next, at twelve o'clock noon.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let that lie on the table.

Several SENATORS. O, let us agree to it.

Mr. SHERMAN. The regular order is before us. I object to the consideration of the resolution at present.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. One objection carries it over.

GOVERNMENT OF THE DISTRICT.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I was out a moment since while the District bill was under consideration. I understand the Senate have laid it on the table. I do not object to that disposition of it at the present time, but I would like to have the general consent of the Senate that that bill may be postponed until the first Wednesday in January.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suppose by common consent the Senator can move to take it up at that time.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If no gentleman feels disposed at the present time to object to that, I give notice that on that day I will call the bill up.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not object to the notice being given, Mr. President, but I object to everything else.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If the Senator means to serve notice that he will not consent to that, then I will take my chances to get it back another day.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLINTON LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (S. No. 926) referring the case of Joseph Wilson to the Court of Claims;

A bill (S. No. 974) to enable the supreme court of the District of Columbia to proceed with its jury business; and

A bill (S. No. 1054) reserving for the use of Congress one hundred and fifty copies of the Revised Statutes authorized to be printed by the act of June 20, 1874.

SPECIE PAYMENTS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I insist on the consideration of the regular order.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1044) to provide for the resumption of specie payments.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I do not intend to reopen the debate on financial topics of the last session. That debate was carried to such great length that it was not only exhaustive, but it was exhausting, not only mentally but physically. The Senate is composed of the same persons who shared in that debate, and it is utterly idle for us in this short session to reopen it and to invite the discussion of the various topics presented in that debate. The Senate is now within less than three months, a little more than two months, of its adjournment, and there is a general feeling throughout the country, shared by all classes of the people, that this Congress ought to give some definite notice to the people of this country as to their purpose in the important topics embraced in this bill; and I say to Senators on all sides of the house that this bill contains enough to accomplish the important object declared by the title of the bill, and this without reviving all the troublesome and difficult questions which were discussed at the last session. It contains a few simple propositions which may be separated from the mass of financial topics discussed at the last session. Its purpose is declared upon the title of the bill, "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments." Every word, every line, and every provision of this bill is in harmony with that title. It will tend to promote the resumption of specie payments. It may fall short in many particulars of the desire of some Senators; and it does go further in that direction than some Senators were willing to support at the last session. It is a bill which demands reasonable concession from every member of the Senate. If we undertake now to seek to carry out the individual views of any Senator we cannot accomplish the passage of any bill to promote this object, and therefore this bill has demanded of every one who has consented to it thus far a surrender of some portions of his opinions as to measures and means to accomplish the great purpose. I will consider my duty done so far as this bill is concerned by simply stating its provisions and calling attention to the character of these provisions, without entering into a single topic that gave rise to the long discussion at the last session.

The bill is intended to provide for the resumption of specie payments. The first section of the bill provides for the resumption of specie payments on the fractional currency. It is confined to that subject alone. It so happens that at this particular period of time the state of the money market, the state of the demand for silver bullion, and more especially the recent action of the German Empire, which has demonetized silver and thus cheapened that product, enables us now, without any loss of revenue, without any sacrifice, to enter the market for the purchase of bullion and resume specie payments on our fractional currency. The market price of bullion today will justify the Government of the United States, without any sacrifice, at a price about equivalent to or perhaps a trifle above our fractional currency—scarcely a shadow above our fractional currency—to purchase silver bullion in the money markets of the world, mostly of our own production, perhaps entirely of our own production. This bill simply directs that the Secretary of the Treasury shall purchase this bullion and shall coin silver coin and substitute that in the place of fractional currency. To that extent it is a resumption of specie payments upon the silver standard for the fractional currency. This section is recommended not only by the Secretary of the Treasury and the President of the United States, but I believe will meet the general concurrence of every member of the Senate, and we fortunately are enabled to embrace the present time to commence this operation without any loss to the Government, except perhaps the cost of the coinage of this silver may have to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States. That coinage may be done in the ordinary course of business without any increase of expenditures. The mints of the United States are now prepared, immediately upon the passage of this bill, to resume the coinage of silver coins of all the legal denominations. Therefore the committee have provided that the Secretary of the Treasury shall proceed to coin the silver coins and in one of several ways to issue them in the place of fractional currency.

I need not dwell further upon this section, because I believe it will meet with the general assent of the Senate. It provides for the immediate resumption of specie payments upon the fractional currency, or at least as immediate as possible; that is, as soon as the Government of the United States can in the mints of the United States coin the silver coin. That process may continue one, two, or three years, how long we cannot tell, depending entirely upon the force that may be employed in that direction. It takes a much longer time to coin these small coins than gold coins, and the operation will probably take more time than it would to coin any considerable amount of gold coin.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I would ask the Senator if there is authority to reissue that fractional currency?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will come to that in a moment.

The second section of this bill simply removes an inducement that now exists to export our gold bullion from the United States to Great Britain, where by the long-established laws of that country they coin money free of charge. This section involved the surrender of about $85,000 a year of revenue: that is, the Government of the United States received last year for coining gold coin $85,000, or ½ of 1 per cent. on forty-five millions of gold coined. The only sacrifice of revenue, therefore, by the second section of the bill is the sacrifice or surrender of $85,000, which heretofore has been levied upon those who produce gold bullion in order to convert it into coin. In the opinion of many men, among them the Secretary of the Treasury, the Director of the Mint, and perhaps a large number of Senators heretofore, this will tend, in a slight degree at any rate, to prevent the exportation of the gold of our own country into foreign parts, because when the Government of the United States undertakes to put gold bullion in the form of gold coin without additional charge the tendency will inevitably be for the gold bullion to flow into the mints for coinage, and being put into the form of American coin, it is thought by a great many people that this will tend to prevent its exportation. To the extent it does so it prepares us for specie payments. That is the whole of the second section.

The third section of the bill contains only two or three affirmative propositions. The first is that after the passage of this act banking shall be free. Perhaps there is no idea stronger in the minds of the American people than a feeling of hostility against a monopoly—a privilege that one man or set of men can enjoy which is denied to another man or set of men. Under the law as it now stands banking is substantially free in the Southern and some of the Western States; but banking is not free in the great commercial States, in the older States, where wealth has accumulated for ages. This may be a mere sentimental point, but it is well enough to meet it; and by the operation of this bill banking is made free, so that there will be no difficulty hereafter for any corporation organized as a national bank either to increase its circulation or for banks to be organized under the provisions of existing law to issue circulating notes to any extent within the limits and upon the terms and provisions of the banking law. This section, therefore, by making banking free, provides for an enlargement of the currency in case the business of the community demands it, and in case any bank in the United States may think it advisable or profitable to issue circulating medium in the form of bank notes under the conditions and limitations of the banking law. Coupled with that is a provision, an undertaking, on the part of the United States that as banks are organized or as circulating notes are issued, either by old or new banks, the Goverument of the United States undertakes to retire 80 per cent. of that amount of United States notes. In other words, it proposes to redeem the United States notes to the extent of 80 per cent. on the amount of bank notes that may be issued; and here is the first controverted question that arises on this bill and the first that is settled. It may be asked if we provide for the issue of circulating notes to banks, why not provide for the retirement of an equal amount of United States notes. The answer is that under the provisions of the banking act by the law as it now stands a bank cannot be organized and maintained in existence unless the reserve which is in that bank, or required for that bank in the ordinary course of business either on its deposits or circulation, is at least equal to 20 per cent. of the amount of its circulating notes, so that it was believed, according to the judgment of the best business men of the country, and I may say with the Comptroller of the Currency, that the retirement of 80 per cent. of the amount of bank notes is fully equivalent to keeping the amount of circulating medium in actual circulation on the same footing, so that this provision of the bill neither provides for a contraction nor expansion of the currency, but leaves the amount to be regulated by the business wants of the community, so that when notes are issued to a bank 80 per cent. of the amount in United States notes is redeemed, and this process continues until United States notes are reduced to three hundred millions.

Mr. SCHURZ. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question in reference to this section? When the 80 per cent. of greenbacks are retired will they be destroyed and never issued again?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will speak of that in a moment in connection with other sections.

Now, Mr. President, that is all there is in regard to banking in this bill and also in regard to the retirement of the United States notes until the time for the resumption of specie payments comes, when this bill provides for actual redemption in coin of all notes presented. It has always been a question in the minds of many people as to whether it is wise to fix a day for specie payments. That matter was discussed at the last session of Congress by many Senators, and the general opinion seemed to be that if we would provide the means by which specie payments would be resumed it might not be necessary to fix the day; but, on the other hand, it is important to have our laws in regard to the currency fix a probable time, or a certain time, when everybody may know that his contracts will be measured by the coin standard. We also know that by the example of other nations which have found themselves in the condition in which we are now placed, and by some of the States when specie payments were suspended, that they have adopted a specific day for the resumption of specie payments. In England, by the bank act of 1819, they provided for the resumption of specie payments in 1823, making four years. In our own State—in New York, in Ohio, in nearly all the States—when there has been a temporary suspension of specie payments a time has been fixed when the banks were compelled to resume, and this bill simply follows the example that has been set by the States, by England, and by other nations, when they have been involved in a like condition.

This bill also provides ample means to prepare for and to maintain resumption. I may say the whole credit and money of the United States is placed by this bill under the direction of the proper executive officers, not only to prepare for but to maintain resumption, and no man can doubt that if this bill stands the law of the land from this time until the 1st day of January, 1879, specie payments will be resumed, and that our United States notes will be converted at the will of the holder into gold and silver coin.

Mr. President, these are all the provisions contained in this bill. They are simple and easily understood, and every Senator can pass his judgment upon them readily.

Now I desire to approach a class of questions that are not embraced in this bill. Many such, and I could name fifty, are not included in this bill; and I may say this: that if there should be a successful effort by the Senate of the United States to ingraft any of this multitude of doubtful or contested questions upon the face of this bill it would inevitably tend to its defeat. I am free to say that if I were called upon to frame a bill to accomplish the purpose declared in the title of this bill, I would have provided some means of gradual redemption between this and the time fixed for final specie payments. All of these means are open to objection. There have been three different plans proposed to prepare for specie payments, and only three. They are all grouped in three classes. One is what is called the contraction plan. The simplest and most direct way to specie payments is undoubtedly the gradual withdrawal of United States notes or the contraction of the currency. Now, we know very well the feeling with which that idea is regarded not only in this Senate, but all through the country. It is believed to operate as a disturbing element in all the business relations of life; to add to the burden of the debtor by making scarce that article in which he is bound to pay his debts; and there has been an honest, sincere opposition to this theory of contraction. Therefore, although it may be the simplest and the best way to reach specie payments, it is entirely omitted from this bill. The second plan, that I have favored myself often, and would favor now if I had my own way and had no opinion to consult but my own, is the plan of converting United States notes into a bond that would gradually appreciate our notes to par in gold. That has always been a favorite idea of mine. There is nothing of that kind in this bill except those provisions which authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds to retire the greenbacks as bank notes are issued; and it also authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds to provide for and to maintain resumption. I therefore have been compelled to surrender my ideas on this bill in order to accomplish a good object without using these means that have been held objectionable by many Senators.

The third plan of resumption has been favored very extensively in this country, which is the plan of a graduated scale for resumption in coin or bullion; what I call the English plan. That is, that we provide now for the redemption at a fixed rate or scale of rates of so much gold for a specific sum of United States notes. At present rates we would give about $90 of gold for $100 of greenbacks, and then provide for a graduated scale by which we would approach specie payments constantly, and reach it at a fixed day. This may be called a gradual redemption. This, also, is objectionable to many persons, from the idea that it compels us to enter the money markets of the world to discount our own paper. It is an ideal objection, but a very strong objection; an objection that has force with a great many people. We have undertaken to redeem these notes in coin, and it is at least a question of doubtful ethics whether we ought to enter into the markets of the world and buy our own notes at a discount. Although that plan has been adopted in England and successfully carried into execution, yet there is a strong objection to it in this country, and therefore that mode is abandoned. Either of these plans I could readily support; but they have met and will meet with such opposition that we cannot hope to carry them or ingraft them in this bill without defeating it. We have then fallen back on these gradual steps: first, to retire the fractional currency; second, to reduce United States notes as bank notes are increased; and then to rest our plan of redemption upon the declaration made on the faith of the United States that at the time fixed by the bill we will resume the payment of the United States notes in coin at par. That is the whole of this bill.

Not only are all these plans of gradual redemption omitted from the bill, but there are also many troublesome questions omitted from the bill, among the rest the one suggested by the Senator from Maryland and the Senator from Missouri. If we undertake to define precisely what shall be done four years hence on the resumption of specie payments, to say whether the legal-tender act shall then be repealed, or whether it shall be repealed before or not, we enter upon a very difficult field, and will undoubtedly divide the Senate and divide the country. Is it not better to postpone until the time comes to meet them these questions which must then arise, rather than to engage in an attempt to settle them now, four years in advance?

Mr. SCHURZ. The question I asked the Senator does not relate to a time four years ahead, but it refers to the immediate operation of the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will answer that question. I did not intend to avoid it. The Senator sees the force of the argument that we ought not to put in this bill anything about the reissue of notes or the character of those notes when reissued after redemption shall come. He sees the force of that.

Mr. SCHURZ. Does the Senator say that I see the force of that argument?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the Senator ought to see it.

Mr. SCHURZ. Ah! Very well.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Senator does. If he was himself preparing a bill to resume he would probably take some other plan, but he may very well leave a difficult question to the time when that question commences to operate. We declare the time when specie payments shall be resumed in order to give fair notice, so that market values for the future may be adjusted and so that people will prepare themselves for resumption. Our people may then base their transactions upon that solemn declaration made by Congress.

In regard to the other point as to the reissue of the fractional currency, the Senator from Maryland will see that the first section is carefully worded to require an equal amount in number and denomination of the fractional currency to be redeemed, and that this process is to continue until the whole amount of the fractional currency outstanding shall be redeemed. But he says that perhaps after all this is done we cannot compel people who hold the fractional currency to present it for redemption. It must be remembered that we cannot coin sufficient money to redeem all the forty-seven millions now outstanding in less than three years. He wishes to raise the question as to whether at the end of the three years during which this process will go on we shall provide by peremptory law that the fractional currency shall not be reissued under any circumstances. We do not undertake to do it, and I simply say to him that we should leave this question just where the section leaves it. We have provided for the sure and certain redemption of this fractional currency in a course of time which cannot exceed three years, and therefore we do not propose to go further and decide whether it may be issued again or not. Until it is fully redeemed the currency cannot be reissued, and then it will be time enough to determine its issue or reissue.

In regard to the question put to me by the Senator from Missouri, I will say that in regard to the absolute cancellation of the legal-tender notes that may be redeemed under the operations of the free banking clause, that matter is also provided for in the same way:

> And whenever, and so often, as circulating notes shall be issued to any such banking association, so increasing its capital or circulating notes, or so newly organized as aforesaid, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to redeem the legal-tender United States notes in excess only of $300,000,000 to the amount of 80 per cent. of the sum of national-bank notes so issued to any such banking association as aforesaid, and to continue such redemption as such circulating notes are issued until there shall be outstanding the sum of $300,000,000 of such legal-tender United States notes, and no more.

How long will it take before this contingency shall arise upon which he puts to me the question? How long will it be before $100,000,000 of circulating notes will be issued to national banks? How long will it be before this process comes to such an end that his question is at all material? We know that no one can tell how fast these notes will be issued, how rapidly they will be called for. In the present condition of affairs none probably will be issued, but no doubt with the revival of industry, with the local demand for banks here and there, with the probable new wants of currency made necessary by the increase of business, banks will be organized, how rapidly no man can tell. At any rate the question he puts to me is not material until the whole amount of $82,000,000 is reduced, until the limit of $300,000,000 is reached. It is therefore scarcely necessary for us to ingraft in this bill provisions that will undoubtedly lead to controversy and dispute, in order to meet a question that will be provided for in the future.

Mr. SCHURZ. I think that the Senator from Ohio has probably not understood my question. What I meant to ask was whether whenever any greenbacks were retired by the Secretary of the Treasury or as the bill styles it are redeemed in consideration of so many thousands of dollars of bank notes having been issued, the greenbacks so retired shall be canceled and destroyed never be reissued again. The Senator will remember very well that we had a protracted struggle about a similar question once, and that the framing of a law gave rise to much controversy on that identical point. Now, what I am after is to understand whether the provisions of this bill will in their practical operation work in the direction of specie payments or not, and for that it is a very essential question whether the greenbacks so retired shall be destroyed never to be reissued again, or whether they shall be held as a reserve, as the forty-four millions were, certainly to be put into the market again.

Mr. SHERMAN. The honorable Senator from Missouri and I agreed perfectly some years ago when the question about the $44,000,000 reserve came up. I should rather put that question to him. At all events I say to him frankly that we do not propose to decide that question in this bill. I have no doubt that when the time arrives when the question becomes material, it will be met. Undoubtedly until the reduction of the United States notes to $300,000,000 they cannot be reissued. The process must go on pari passu until the amount of legal-tender notes is reduced to $300,000,000. Before that time will probably arrive in the course of human affairs, at least one or two Congresses will have met and disappeared, and we may leave to the future these questions that tend to divide us and distract us, rather than undertake to thrust them into this bill and thus divide us and prevent us from doing something in the direction at which we aim.

Mr. SCHURZ. I want to be satisfied on that point. The Senator then admits that the bill is open to the construction that the Secretary of the Treasury may gather up the 80 per cent. as a reserve and reissue the notes again, and that it is the intent of those who made the bill that it shall be open?

Mr. SHERMAN. I made no such admission. I leave that question to be decided upon the law as it stands. The case that is put of what I regarded as an illegal issue of notes probably may never arise, and certainly it cannot arise for a considerable period of time. But if there is any doubt upon that question, I leave every Senator to construe the law for himself; and if there is a doubt about it, I say it is not wise as practical men dealing with practical affairs, seeking to accomplish a result, to introduce into this bill a controversy which will prevent that unity that is necessary to carry the good that is contained in this bill.

Mr. SCHURZ. I will narrow my question, then, and ask the Senator whether in his own mind the bill is open to that construction?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not care to give my opinion now. I have given my opinion once or twice before in regard to these questions. For instance, I gave my opinion when a bill was originally before the Senate four or five years ago that the reserve which was provided in that bill could not be reissued, and yet that opinion did not control the Secretary of the Treasury for the time being. I prefer to leave that question where the law leaves it, and to the judgment of the Congresses that may come hereafter.

Mr. SCHURZ. I do not want to annoy the Senator at all; but I put it to him whether we should pass a bill on a subject like this, so delicate and so important, the meaning of which is so obscure that the champion of the bill has to admit himself that its construction will be left to the courts of the United States?

Mr. SHERMAN. In supporting a bill of this kind, I do not meet all possible questions that may arise in its construction, and no human mind could do it. I know this, and upon this rock I stand: that this bill has provisions in it which tend to accomplish the purpose which the Senator and I have so diligently sought, and I will not seek to obstruct the passage of this bill or defeat it by thrusting into it doubtful questions of law or public policy which may tend to the defeat of the bill. I take this bill not as the bill that I should propose myself, a bill which itself surrenders many of my convictions as to the means to be employed to accomplish the particular purpose designed, but I take it because I see that every provision in it tends to the object that the Senator and I seek, and I will not weaken it by putting in questions of grammar or construction which may tend to weaken and destroy it.

Mr. SCHURZ. I think I shall not want to annoy the Senator or obstruct the bill, but I submit that we are not interpreting financial legislation here, but that we are making financial legislation, and we want to make it as clear as it possibly can be made. The Senator knows from his own experience that if the least loop-hole is left, he cannot foretell what the Treasury will do; whether it will not under the pressure of public opinion some time or other issue twenty or thirty or forty millions again of that which was accumulated, as he says redeemed, but possibly accumulated only as reserve. The thing was done before, and it may be done again. He knows very well also that that may defeat the whole scheme of returning to specie payments.

But leaving that aside for the moment, he says the principal object is to frame a bill which will contain machinery enough to lead us to specie payments. I agree with him there perfectly. I do not want to stick at trifles merely. I want to have a bill that is clear in its object and operative in its machinery. I should like him now to point out to me what provisions there are in this bill that will provide for the necessary preparation for the resumption of specie payments. I do not want to go into an argument, but merely to clear up my own mind.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator, I am sure, has not heard the bill read or he has not read it himself. It seems to me the language is very strong and the provisions ample and potent:

> And to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to prepare and provide for the redemption in this act authorized or required, he is authorized to use any surplus revenues, from time to time, in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and to issue, sell, and dispose of, at not less than par, in coin, either of the descriptions of bonds of the United States described in the act of Congress approved July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," with like qualities, privileges, and exemptions, to the extent necessary to carry this act into full effect, and to use the proceeds thereof for the purposes aforesaid.

In other words, to prepare for and maintain redemption, he may issue either a 4 or a 4½ or a 5 per cent. bond, the lowest that he can sell at par in coin. We place in his hands the surplus revenue of the Government. More than that, we here by law declare our purpose, the purpose of a Government and a people that have never violated their obligations when distinctly made, that at this time and date we will do these things which amount to a resumption of specie payments.

Now, sir, the great weakness of our currency is that we have undertaken to pay our notes in coin and do not fulfill our promise. No man denies that obligation. It is so written upon the statute-books now six years old. But from the fact that we have not said when we will do it, at what time we will do it, the question is still open to rest upon the construction which each Senator and Member may give to the words "as early as practicable;" an indefinite phrase at least, and one that applies to all future ages. The object of this bill and the objective point of this bill is to fix a time within which the honor of the United States is pledged to redeem these notes in coin; and that pledge, if made by Congress, and I trust it may be made by the whole of Congress of all parties and made by the whole people—that pledge, if made, will be redeemed. It is true a subsequent Congress may repeal it, and anything we can do may be repealed by a subsequent Congress. All we can do is in our time to pledge the faith of the United States to do this in the future, and if the people in their power and might, through agents hereafter elected, violate this promise, there is no power in our Government to prevent it. We only know that they probably will not do it; that a pledge thus specific, made as to a definite day and time, with ample powers given to an executive officer to execute it, will be maintained.

I desire to say to the Senator one word more, that this pledge is made knowing the full extent of the obligation imposed by this law, and I believe that every Senator who votes for this bill is personally pledged and all his influence is pledged, all his political influence is pledged to maintain that declaration just as our fathers felt themselves bound by their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor to maintain the pledges they made in the Declaration of American Independence.

Mr. SCHURZ. Mr. President, I do not want to go into an argument upon this bill now, because I confess I am not sufficiently informed about the meaning of the provisions of the bill; and in order to inform myself I should like to put some questions to the Senator from Ohio.

I see a pledge in this bill to resume specie payments on the 1st of January, 1879. So far, so well. Better late than never. We shall, voting for this bill, consider ourselves honorably bound to fulfill that pledge, and I expect we personally intend to do so. That is worth something. But the question is whether the machinery provided for by the bill is such as to bring about a condition of things which will render the performance of that pledge possible; and in order to clear up this important point I asked the Senator what were the provisions of the bill calculated to give us the necessary preparation for the resumption of specie payments. Aside from this pledge, I find in the bill two things: first, free banking; secondly, the retirement of legal-tenders amounting to 80 per cent. "of the sum of national-bank notes so issued to any such banking association." That is as far as I can see all the provision that is made to prepare the way for specie payments. I would ask the Senator from Ohio whether he thinks that free banking—that is to say, the removal of all the restrictions which at present surround the organization of banks and the issuing of bank currency, and coupled with that the withdrawal of 80 per cent. in greenbacks of the amount of national-bank notes so issued—is all that in his opinion is required? I must confess that to my mind it is by no means clear that these provisions are sufficient to render the resumption of specie payments on the 1st of January, 1879, possible. The question I was asking the Senator is whether he thinks they are so sufficient, and how they are to operate?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will answer.

Mr. SCHURZ. If the Senator will permit me to make it perfectly clear, does he think that the removal of all the restrictions surrounding our banking system will result in the establishment of many more national banks and in the issuing of large quantities of additional currency? and does he think that in consequence thereof the quantity of greenbacks will be materially reduced? Or does he think that free banking will result in the establishment of but few new banks, and so on? In one word, what does he think that the practical effect of this measure will be in paving the way for the resumption of specie payments?

Mr. SHERMAN. As to whether more banks will be organized or whether old banks will issue more circulating notes with the certainty that they must in four years redeem them in coin, every Senator must form his opinion. I have no doubt some banks will be organized here and there; I have no doubt existing banks will increase their circulation; but to what extent I will not undertake to say; no man can undertake to say. If this be not done, we are no worse off; but if it be done, we retire 80 per cent. of that amount in United States notes, and that does not only lead us toward specie payment, but lessens the volume which we are bound to redeem when the time comes for final redemption.

Mr. MERRIMON. I wish to ask a question for information.

Mr. SHERMAN. If I am to be catechized here as a witness on the stand I will take these questions, carefully note them, and give them my thoughtful examination and answer them in time.

Mr. MERRIMON. I thought I had a right to propound a respectful question to the chairman of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have a right to take my own time to answer. If I am to be put under cross-examination I may be embarrassed, and would prefer to take a little time to examine and answer a great many questions that are put, especially on this difficult subject.

Mr. MERRIMON. I will put the questions, and the honorable Senator can answer or not at his pleasure. It is whether, when the Secretary of the Treasury, after the 1st day of January, 1879, shall redeem Treasury notes in coin, he will have the right to reissue such notes?

Mr. SHERMAN. That question I said distinctly that I left to the future. I answered that a moment ago, and stated that this bill did not propose to answer that question, but would leave it to be determined by the future between this and the time when the redemption is to take place.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, of course it it not my purpose, if I can avoid it, to speak at much length of a bill like this, that I saw for the first time less than three hours ago; for although it is a short bill, and it might seem a very simple one, yet every ones knows that on a subject of this nature many unforeseen results may follow the adoption of an apparently simple measure, and therefore the utmost care and consideration are necessary in enacting a law upon it. But surely enough has already taken place in the Senate to require us to call a halt on this bill, as it seems to me.

First, let me say that as to the first and second sections of the bill, I do not suppose there is a Senator here who does not approve them. As to the first section, which proposes to substitute silver money for the fractional currency, we all know, from what has been stated by the chairman of the committee, and from the report of the Director of the Mint made a year ago, that that may be done without any loss whatsoever to the Government, and certainly with advantage to the people.

As to the second section of the bill, which abolishes the coinage charge, I have always been in favor of that ever since I looked into the subject; and as early as the session of 1869-'70 a committee to which I belonged reported a large amount of testimony showing that that coinage charge ought to be abrogated.

The first two sections, so far as my opinion is concerned, are perfectly right; but now we come to the third and last section, and what is it? But, first, let me premise that the first two sections do very little toward the resumption of specie payments, for when you shall have paid the fractional currency in silver, you will have paid it in something that is no more valuable than the greenbacks in which it is now redeemable. So that is but a very slight step toward the resumption of specie payment. And when you shall have done away with the coinage charge, as provided in the second section, you will have done a little, it is true, toward increasing the amount of gold coinage and that is all—an almost infinitesimal step toward specie payments. Therefore, if there is anything in this bill that looks toward specie payments, it must be in the third section. Now let us look at that.

My friend from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] smiles, and well he may, because after hearing the statement by the chairman of the committee of the omissions from the bill, it is very difficult to find what there is in it. We know that there is a great deal of omission, but the least possible amount of commission that ever I have seen in a great public measure. Let us see what this section proposes to do. It proposes that there shall be free banking, and then for every $100 of bank notes that shall be issued there shall be redeemed $80 of legal-tenders, and that that process shall go on until the amount of legal-tenders outstanding shall be three hundred millions and no more. If that were all there was in this section, and it were fairly and distinctly stated that the legal-tenders thus redeemed were not to be reissued but were to be canceled, one could very well understand what the section is, and it would only be a question of time when the effect of the section would be to reduce the legal-tenders to $300,000,000; but that is not all that is in the section by any means. It goes further, and provides that after the 1st day of January, 1879, there shall be full and complete resumption of specie payments by the Government on the legal-tenders, and that means full and complete resumption by the banks, because the banks by their charters are bound to redeem either in legal-tenders or in coin; and if legal-tenders are redeemed by the Government in coin, it is equivalent to declaring that the banks shall also redeem in coin. Therefore, this bill provides that from and after the 1st of January, 1879, four years hence, there shall be complete resumption of specie payments in the United States. Put that provision in the bill, coupled with the other provision for retiring 80 per cent. of greenbacks for every additional dollar of national-bank issue under this bill, and see how they work.

Does my friend, the chairman of this committee, believe that there will be in the next four years $100,000,000 of additional national-bank currency issued? What warrant has he to believe any such thing as that? But without the issue of $100,000,000 more national-bank currency he cannot retire $80,000,000 of greenbacks and bring them down to $300,000,000. What warrant has he for supposing that? Is it in the experience of the Government for the last year? Pray how much increase has there been in national-bank currency under the law which you passed last session? About a million or $1,400,000, if my recollection is right, as the very outside. Now, it was said that there was a great demand for money, that a great deal of money was needed. Well, in more than twenty States of this Union there has been perfect freedom to issue paper money by starting national banks for the last eight months, and the result of it all is that the increase in the currency is less than a million and a half of dollars. How, then, will it be in the next four years? What reason have you to suppose that in the next four years you will have banks started or existing banks asking for an increase of circulation, so that $100,000,000 will be put out and you will thereby retire $80,000,000 of the legal-tenders? No man can believe any such thing. Pass this bill to-day, and I venture the assertion that the increase of national-bank currency under it in the next four years will not be $10,000,000; and the retiring of greenbacks therefore under it will not amount to more than $8,000,000 at the very outside. That is the truth about it, sir. You will have no increased banking under this bill, if you pass it, until business begins to revive; and when will business begin to revive? All that is necessary is for a man to open his eyes and read the history of his country to know when it will revive. At intervals of about twenty years we have one of those things called a panic, followed by stagnation in business, the result of overtrading, overproduction, of extravagance of all sorts and descriptions, extravagance in individuals, extravagance in corporations, extravagance in governments large and small, until at last the bubble bursts, and then comes a season of retrenchment, of economy; and how long does that last? How long is it before debts are liquidated and a surplus is accumulated, so that there begins to be an upward tide in the business of the country? Never has it been less than four years in the United States.

One of the first things that I can recollect when I was a very small boy, not higher than this desk, was the condition of monetary affairs in 1819. How long did that stagnation last? It lasted until 1823. Then business began to revive throughout the country and a period of great prosperity followed. Then came the panic and suspension of 1837 and the great stagnation in business that followed. How long did that last before business revived and the country began to be prosperous again? Five years. Then came 1857, at an interval of twenty years, and business had not revived when the war broke out and changed the whole face of affairs. And now comes this stagnation of 1873, and nothing but time, economy, honesty, and retrenchment will liquidate indebtedness and accumulate a surplus which will set business in motion again and make the country prosper once more. It cannot be done by legislative tinkering; it cannot be done by bills that omit everything valuable, that contain nothing important.

Now, Mr. President, one word more on the subject of this section of the bill. My colleague says that this bill will have one great and good effect: it will let the country know what is to be our policy, and then business will go on steadily, because people will know what they have to expect. Why, sir, if it would have that effect it would be in that particular most beneficial, for that is an effect most ardently to be desired. Yet my colleague says to the people—for what he says here goes to them—this bill, which is to inform you what is to be the policy of the Government, does not inform you whether these $80,000,000 of retired greenbacks are to be poured out again at the pleasure of a Secretary of the Treasury! Why, sir, if this bill could have operation, if there would be issued $100,000,000 of national-bank notes and then you retired $80,000,000 of greenbacks, it becomes the most material thing in the world for the capitalists and business men of the country to know whether these greenbacks are to be reissued again; for if they be reissued, the effect would be an inflation of the currency of $100,000,000. If they are to be canceled, then the inflation is only $20,000,000, and may not be even so much as that on account of the reserve that the banks are required to keep against their deposits; but if they are to be reissued, then there is unmitigated inflation to the amount of $100,000,000, and the business men of the country are told by the chairman of the Committee on Finance "I will not give you any light on this subject at all; I will not tell you; I will not even express my own opinion, whether or not you are to go on doing your business without knowing at all whether there is to be an inflation of $100,000,000 in the next four years or whether there is to be an inflation of only $20,000,000, or no inflation at all." That will not do, sir. Pass the bill in its present shape, and instead of settling you will unsettle, instead of fixing you will unfix, the minds of the people.

I felt this morning a little like complaining that our republican friends should mature such a measure as this, if they did do it as the newspapers say in secret caucus, without allowing their fellows of the Senate on this side of the Chamber to know anything about it; but that is a most venial offense, if offense it was, a most trifling thing compared to this studied ambiguity of the bill and keeping from the people the knowledge whether it means inflation or whether it does not.

Mr. President, when you consider it practically, when you come to consider that under this third section of the bill, in all human probability, not more than $10,000,000, if so much as that, of national-bank notes will be issued during the next four years, I ask what kind of provision is that for bringing us to resumption of specie payments in 1879? That is all. The redemption of fractional currency in silver I have said is an infinitesimal thing. The removal of the coinage charge is infinitesimal. Then what else is there in the bill to bring us to a resumption of specie payments in 1879? The provision for withdrawing 80 per cent. of greenbacks; and that provision the chairman does not tell us is to have any effect at all, for he will not say that the Secretary of the Treasury may not, at his own discretion, reissue these notes as soon as he pleases; take them in one day and reissue them the next. But not only that, if I am right in my idea that not $10,000,000 of national-bank notes would be issued under this bill in the next four years, then you would have but $8,000,000 of greenbacks retired; and, pray, what kind of an efficient matter would that be? what kind of efficiency would that have in preparing the country for a resumption of specie payments?

I think my colleague is entirely right in saying that this is a bill from which all questions that have divided the financial people of this country and the parties of the country and the different sections of the different parties, have been carefully omitted. But there is one thing upon which my colleague places great reliance, and that is the declaration that we will resume at the time named. Sir, I do not believe that a mere verbal declaration will satisfy the country or produce much effect. I have heard my colleague stand in his place here and with an eloquence that I admired, and felt proud of, speak of how this Government had failed to redeem its pledge in regard to these very greenbacks; how it had repealed the law, which was contemporary with them, that made them convertible into bonds of the United States; how it had broken that pledge. And now after he has held up to the country these broken pledges of the Government, it will not do for him to say to the business men of the country "you can shape your business in perfect safety and rely on the pledge of the Government that from the 1st of January, 1879, we will have a specie currency." That will not do. That is entirely too small a foundation on which to build any such superstructure as the resumption of specie payments.

Mr. President, these ideas have occurred to me in the very hasty and imperfect consideration I have been able to give to this bill; and now I propose to send up to the Chair an amendment. It is a very slight thing, perhaps, but the bill is a very slight thing, and the amendment will therefore be in perfect harmony with it. In my humble judgment, the amendment I shall propose is worth all that is in the bill. I think, if it be adopted, it will do more to approximate greenbacks to specie, and thereby bring about a resumption of specie payments, than any provisions that are in this bill. I may be entirely mistaken about it, but that is my judgment. I thought so at the last session. I offered it to the bill then pending. It received a very respectable support in the Senate, and many Senators said they would have voted for it but that they were afraid it would kill their bill, and therefore they voted against it. Now, I offer it to give them another chance to vote upon what I believe to be a practical proposition, and that will have some tendency toward specie payments, for I would like this bill to have a little tendency that way before it receives the vote of the Senate for its passage.

Mr. SARGENT. They feared it would kill their bill before, the Senator says, and they may vote against it for the same reason, that it may kill this bill.

Mr. THURMAN. Let the Senate hear what it is.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add as a new section:

SEC. 4. That from and after June 30, 1875, one-twentieth part of the customs duties shall be payable in United States legal-tender notes, or in national-bank notes, and after June 30, 1876, one-tenth, and after June 30, 1877, one-fifth part thereof may be so paid.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays on that amendment. I want to make my friend from Ohio perpetual on that vote.

Mr. THURMAN. I am perfectly willing, nay, desirous, to go on the record in favor of it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, is the amendment of the Senator from Ohio subject to amendment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Certainly it is.

Mr. BOGY. I desire to move an amendment to his amendment, to strike out all after the word "that" and insert:

On and after the 1st day of July, 1875, duties on imports may be paid in legal-tender notes or coin, at the option of the importer.

With the permission of the Senate, Mr. President, I ask indulgence for a few moments while I explain my amendment.

I am now, as I have been from the first day that I took my seat in this Chamber, in favor of the resumption of specie payments under proper conditions and with safety to the business of the country. My purpose in offering this amendment is to facilitate the object aimed to be accomplished by this bill; that is, as soon as possible, consistent with the interests of the country, to return to specie payments, and upon that subject my mind has undergone no change.

During the last session of Congress, while this subject was being discussed, on two occasions I addressed the Senate and avowed the sentiment I entertain now in favor of a resumption of specie payments whenever that can be effected without disturbing the commercial relations of the country. I was opposed to contraction as a means of resumption. I am opposed to contraction now. I believed then, as I believe now, that if contraction had been adopted as the policy to effect the object of resumption, it would have paralyzed the country so completely as to defeat the object intended to be accomplished; and time and experience have confirmed me in the views I maintained then. Under the existing circumstances, with the system of finance inaugurated by the republican party, and which system they were determined should be enforced, I believed then, as I do now, that instead of contraction being adopted as the means to accomplish resumption, an increase of currency was needed, at least in the West, so as to stimulate industry and commerce and relieve the debtor class. To this I was driven by the system imposed on us, but which I did not approve; but as I could not change it, I was anxious to obtain from it what good there was in it. It was as a necessity, to relieve the country, and particularly the West, suffering more than the East. Therefore, under the law then existing, and yet existing, which has given birth to legal-tender paper and to national-bank notes, I favored, and would favor now under proper circumstances, an augmentation of the currency; never, however, admitting that paper money was equal to gold or silver; and paper money never can be equal to gold and silver unless it observes one law, and that law must be obeyed at all hazards and under all circumstances, and without any doubt attending it, and is its convertibility into coin on demand. Whenever paper money is conveniently convertible into coin at all places, it is then for all purposes of commerce infinitely more convenient and better than coin; but it is only as a representative of coin, and because it can be converted into gold or silver. But under the law as it is now our paper money is not convertible, and we use no coin at all excepting for one purpose, and that is to pay duties on importations. Hence this paper money, good or bad, was the only means of exchange for the entire country. It being the only means of exchange, I believed then, as I believe now, that the way to get to specie payments was by issuing a reasonable amount of this paper money, so as to establish a healthy prosperity throughout the country.

Now, sir, to make paper money equal to coin, I said awhile ago it must at all times be convertible. The fundamental law of its existence is its convertibility under all circumstances and with great facility. When the greenbacks were originally issued, they were convertible into 6 per cent. bonds. The object was to give them a positive value. Those bonds were coin bonds. If you could convert legal-tender notes into bonds payable in coin, you were giving to that paper money a value very nearly equal to specie. That law, in my estimation, was a wise one, but it was soon repealed.

Legal-tender notes were issued also upon another condition, that they should be received by the Government in payment of all debts, of every nature and description whatsoever; not only that they should be legal-tenders as between A and B in ordinary transactions, but they were to be such for debts due to the Government. It is so printed upon the back of every one of them. Although that was the promise to the ear it was not carried out to the hope, because in point of fact no individual in the nation owes the Government any money except two classes of persons, the importers and the defaulters, and these latter do not pay in greenbacks or anything else. The Government does not credit anybody. It pays in cash or in paper money for all that it buys, and there is in point of fact no debt due the Government excepting as already stated.

The great debt due to the Government by any class of individuals is by the importers. That amounted under our large importations some years back to $200,000,000, and I believe one year to $206,000,000. This year the amount of duties, according to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, is $163,000,000. That is a debt which is being contracted from day to day by the class of individuals called importers, and it is the only debt that individuals owe to the Government except the debt that may be due by defaulters.

Yet by the very contract this debt due by importers is excepted. This excepts everything, and the legal-tender notes stand exactly in the attitude of a note issued by an individual payable in goods that may be in his store, excepting, however, brown sheetings, while keeping in said store nothing but brown sheetings. On its face it is a very handsome note, payable on presentation in merchandise at his store. Although it is a promise, the exception defeats the very promise. So in this case. What has been the result? From the very beginning the demand for gold to pay duties has been so great as to continually depreciate the legal-tenders. This demand during the period of a year exceeds the supply of gold. The demand for gold has been two hundred millions; it is now one hundred and sixty-three millions; and according to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury the amount of coin in the United States is only $166,000,000, so that the demand for coin at this day to pay duties is equal to the whole amount of gold in the country.

The result is therefore a very high premium on coin, and it amounts now to 10, 11, or 12 per cent.; and yet we have been heretofore so habituated to large premiums that we have got to think that 10 per cent. premium is a very small thing; but in point of fact it is destructive to the prosperity of the people. It is an enormous premium, and no commercial people can prosper when all the money that is used in the exchanges of commerce is at a discount of 10 or 12 per cent.

Now, sir, in order to resume specie payments, the first step is to give value to this paper. I was opposed to contraction, because to contract was ruin to the country. There being but $166,000,000 of gold, to contract the paper money to that figure so as to effect resumption would have brought universal commercial distress throughout the land, in the East as well as in the West, but I think more particularly in the West. But if you wish to resume, you first have got to give a value to your paper money, not by contraction. That would give it value beyond all doubt, but in giving it value you would produce great distress and ruin over the land. But if you will give to your paper money a value without diminishing its amount, you will have taken a great step toward resumption; and so soon as you make paper by legislation equal to gold, as it is more convenient in all the commercial transactions of the world than specie, gold will not be wanted.

If the legal-tenders are made receivable for duties, you at once give to them a positive value. You at once take away the only demand for gold. At the present day gold is not used for any purpose whatever in this country except to pay duties on imports. It is to-day an article of commerce as much so as iron or lead or dry-goods or sugar or coffee. It is not used at the present time as a medium of exchange. It remains a measure of value, because it is so recognized by the entire commerce of the world. But as a means of exchange it is not used only as an article of commerce, and is sold from day to day in Wall street; and for what purpose? Only for one: to enable importers to pay duties amounting to from five to eight hundred thousand dollars a day. Do away with the demand, and what will be the result? There being no demand for gold, as the national-bank notes are redeemable in legal-tenders, and these are not yet redeemable in gold, the effect would be that the gold of this country, amounting to $160,000,000, would at once flow into the channels of trade, and you would really have an expansion of coin of that large amount. The $160,000,000 now used as an article of merchandise would immediately go into the channels of business. It could not be used for any other purpose. If my friend from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] had $100,000 in gold and was a broker in Wall street, and there was no demand for it, what could he do with it? He would lend it to some one, say to my friend from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY,] and he, having borrowed it, would use it as a necessity for legitimate business purposes, and in that way one hundred and sixty millions would be carried into the channels of trade and be used only as gold should be, as a medium of exchange in addition to being a measure of value.

Mr. THURMAN. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BOGY. Certainly.

Mr. THURMAN. I should be inclined to favor the amendment of the Senator from Missouri but for one thing, to which I wish to call his attention; and that is the pledge of Congress that so much of the customs duties as shall be necessary are pledged for the payment of interest on the public debt and the creation of a sinking fund, and that interest is payable in gold. I have made my calculation in my amendment so as to leave an ample amount to meet that pledge; but the amendment of the Senator from Missouri would destroy the pledge altogether.

I wish to say further in reference to that, that the bill as reported and now before us disregards that pledge quite as much and more, a great deal, than can be said of my amendment, for mine does not disregard it at all. This bill allows the Secretary of the Treasury to use all the gold that may be received from customs duties to carry out the purpose of the bill, and in fact disregards the pledge totally.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Ohio will pardon me if I suggest to him that he has not read the statutes of 1862 or stated it exactly as it is. The act of 1862 does not say so much as shall be necessary, (as he stated it,) leaving it to the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall be collected in coin. It says that all duties on imports shall be collected in coin, and the public faith is pledged to it.

Mr. THURMAN. I know it says that all duties shall be payable in coin; but the true interpretation of that statute, so far as it is a pledge, does not pledge us to collect any more in coin than is necessary to answer the purpose for which gold is necessary. I do not wish to go into that argument; I argued it at the last session; and if my friend will do me the honor to look at what I said then, he will see what I think about it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That must be perfectly apparent, that "all" means a part; everybody can see that, of course; so that when the statute says "all," it only means a part!

Mr. THURMAN. Well, that is not exactly as broad a view of the legal question as my friend generally takes. Whenever it is necessary, I will do ample justice to that point.

Mr. BOGY. I had intended before I closed my remarks to notice that point, and I shall do so; and I think that there are two answers to the objection raised by the Senator from Ohio, either of which is sufficient.

I was on another branch of my argument, and that is as to the means of resuming specie payments; but I am coming to that other point after awhile, to ascertain whether we are by any present law deprived of using all the legitimate means proper, and which a nation can use without derogating from its standing and character and reputation—whether we are deprived of using such means as we think are wise and proper to enable us to resume specie payments. Now, sir, I say that to resume specie payments you have to give value to your legal-tender notes. I contend that by making these legal-tender notes what the words authorizing their issue justify, that is, making them receivable for all debts due the Government of any description whatsoever, without excepting duties on imports, you will give to your legal-tenders a value equal to gold, and that will do away with the demand for it, and by doing away with this demand it will nevertheless continue to exist to the extent of $160,000,000 now in the country, and not being used any longer as an article of merchandise, it will be employed in its legitimate function as a means of exchange. In that way, instead of bringing about an inflation of paper money, you would in point of fact have an inflation of gold to the amount of $160,000,000, because at once it would be added to the circulation.

As I stated awhile ago, but being disturbed in my line of argument I will restate it, the amount of duties is equal to the gold in the country. That being so, there is a constant and pressing demand which brings about this large premium of 10 to 11 and 12 per cent., which, as I have already said, we now consider very low, because we have had heretofore a higher rate of premium, but nevertheless it is high enough to be destructive of the trade of the country. The demand to pay duties will equal one-half the total issue, because, although our income from duties this year is only $163,000,000, on a revival of trade it will again be some $200,000,000, which is fully one-half the total amount of legal-tenders authorized by law. Creating a demand then for fully one-half the total amount of the issue will give to them a positive, fixed value, and make them as good as gold. This being so, there would be no necessity to buy gold to pay the interest on our bonds or for anything else, as there is no demand for gold in this country for any purpose whatever excepting to pay duties on imports and interest.

Now, I am met by the argument advanced by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] that this would conflict with the law of 1862, which requires all duties to be paid in gold; not a part, not nineteen-twentieths, but the whole twenty-twentieths; all must be paid in coin. The object of the law beyond a doubt was to create a gold fund to pay the interest upon the gold bonds. But what is really the essence of that contract? Taking the modification of the law made by the act of 1869, which made all these bonds, both principal and interest, payable in gold, what is the essence of this contract? This Government agreed to pay the interest in coin, and by the act of 1869, modifying the law of 1862, the principal was also made payable in coin. When they were first issued I believed, and believe now, that the intention was to pay the interest in coin but the principal in legal-tenders, but the act of 1869 changed that, and made the interest and principal payable in coin. So be it. The contract is that we shall pay this character of debt, both interest and principal, in coin.

Now, Mr. President, I leave it to the intelligence of the Senate and the country, if we continue, as we shall be sure to continue, to pay our bonds as they fall due in coin, and if we continue, as we are certain to continue, to pay the interest every six months also in coin, will the credit of the nation be at all affected whether we raise this money by one means or another? I deny the proposition that a nation of the high character and standing of this need pledge any special source of revenue to maintain its credit at home or abroad, although it is customary for nations having doubtful credit to pledge certain sources of revenue by way of mortgage. The character of the nation, the means, the ability, the standing, everything that belongs to this people, is pledge enough to the world to maintain our credit, and there is no necessity for this additional security. Again, if you look at the law of 1862, which provided that the duties upon imports should be paid in gold, there is no pledge that this gold shall be used alone for that purpose. It is true it was a part of the legislation of that day, and I have no doubt that the object was to give to us at that time a credit which the exigencies of the day required. Why? Then the nation was involved in a gigantic war, and it was a possibility that a dissolution of the Union might permanently be effected and thereby the credit of the Government be impaired. It was to sustain the credit of the nation thus in danger of being destroyed. But that gloomy period has passed, the awful day has gone by, and there is to-day no reason why we should be subjected to the necessity of maintaining a mortgage upon any of our means of revenue for the purpose of sustaining our credit. Our credit is good enough, and I believe is too good, for the interests of all classes of people.

As a question of finance, not as a matter of national honor, our credit is too good. The nation makes nothing because the bonds are worth 115 or 117. There is no profit to the people, but only to a few speculators. We as a people make nothing by it, and a large portion of that profit inures to the benefit of foreigners and not to the benefit of our own people; and when to them, to a very small portion, the most of whom hold but a nominal citizenship and are to be found in the large cities.

But, sir, the answer, if I am correct in my argument, is, that if by receiving legal-tenders in payment of duty you appreciate them and make them equal to gold, there would be no necessity for having gold to pay interest upon the bonds. The interest is not paid by shipments of gold abroad. The Secretary of the Treasury, representing the United States, does not send every six months a load of gold to London or to Berlin to pay this interest. It is done through a system of exchange. He buys in New York or somewhere else the amount necessary to pay this interest abroad. It is not therefore paid by the shipment of gold. It is true that according to the laws of commerce if we are indebted abroad the balance has got to be paid in gold, but the mere payment of the interest is done through and by exchange. And if the legal-tenders are as good as gold, having been appreciated by receiving them for duties, you will not need gold to procure this exchange.

But, sir, there is another argument. At the present time paper money, both legal-tenders and national-bank notes, are below par 10 to 12 per cent. The amount of both issued is some $750,000,000. Ten per cent. loss upon $750,000,000 is $75,000,000, and that is repeated time and again during the year. It would be a matter of economy for the Secretary of the Treasury to buy $100,000,000 of gold every year and pay 10 per cent. upon that amount, which would be a loss of only $10,000,000, whereas the loss as it is now is $75,000,000. It would be much better for this Government to be compelled to buy the amount of gold which it needs to pay its interest than to depreciate all its paper issue. Our interest amounts in round numbers to $100,000,000. Ten per cent. on that would be only ten millions. The Government is only the people or the nation in the aggregate, and it would be infinitely better for it to lose ten millions than the people $75,000,000.

But, sir, I repeat that in my estimation gold would be worth no more than paper. There is a remarkable case in point. On the termination of the French war with Germany an indemnity was exacted of five thousand million francs—a thousand million dollars—which had to be paid in a very short space of time. The German government required every dollar of it in coin, and declined to receive any of the national securities of France. This exceeded the amount of coin in France by some four hundred million francs. Yet the obligation was met, and one large installment was anticipated, and every dollar of the indemnity was paid in coin.. What did France do? It authorized the Bank of France to issue paper money, and three thousand million francs were issued, being six hundred million dollars, and this paper money was made a legal tender and receivable for all debts of every nature and description whatsoever. The paper money was issued by the Bank of France, not by the French government, not as in our case by the Government, and therefore not as good as ours; but it was issued by the Bank of France, a corporation, not a part of the government excepting to a very limited extent. That paper money issued by this corporation, under the authority of law, was receivable in payment of every debt of every nature and description whatsoever, including duties upon importations. What has been the result? The prosperity of France continued, her manufactures were kept in a healthful condition, the circulation needed for commerce was not diminished, only it was changed from gold to paper, and gradually and rapidly too the gold came back to France in accordance with those great laws of trade which are just as fixed and certain as the laws of mathematics. Gold came back in accordance with those well-known laws, and the Bank of France reduced and canceled its circulation as the gold increased; and now, although they have not resumed, because a year ago a law was passed saying that they would resume on the 1st day of January, but for a year or more resumption has in point of fact practically taken place. To-day the paper money in France is worth as much as gold, and all the transactions of this country with France are made as if there were no difference between paper and gold. Yet for a short time after the war, in buying exchange in New York on Paris, the distinction was made whether the bill should be paid in coin or in paper, because the paper issue was at a depreciation; but it is not so now. There is in point of fact no difference; and why? Because the government of France at once created a legitimate demand for that paper money, made it a legal tender between individuals, and made it a legal tender from individuals to the government for everything whatsoever, and in a very short time the whole government had righted itself financially, while we have been here floundering in the mud and mire for a great many years.

Mr. President, I shall bring my remarks to a close as soon as possible, but I wish to make one other point. We desire to resume specie payments on the 1st day of January, 1879. I desire it. I as a democrat can desire nothing else. It is one of the cardinal principles of the democratic party. Gold and silver are the only true measure of value not only here but throughout the world. The great problem to solve has been how to get to the point of resumption without bringing ruin and distress on the country. You now desire to resume on the 1st day of January, 1879, and I believe it can be done. I will say more. The bill has some features which meet my approbation. There are some good features in the bill which strike me favorably, and with my amendment adopted I shall give it my support.

The resumption proposed is only on legal-tenders. Of course you cannot provide for the resumption of national-bank notes. Indeed it is a part of the bill to diminish legal-tenders and to increase national-bank notes. I agree, however, with the Senator from Ohio that there will not be much diminution of legal-tenders, and consequently there would not be much increase of national-bank notes. But nevertheless it is the theory of the bill that in proportion as one increases the other will diminish, less 20 per cent. You propose to resume on the legal-tenders alone, leaving the national-bank paper unprovided for. We have in this country now $165,000,000 of coin. It may to some extent be increased by the 1st day of January, 1879, yet we will not have anything like a corresponding amount to enable us to redeem the large amount of national-bank notes and legal-tenders; but if you will give to your legal-tenders a value equal to coin, you enable your national banks to resume also. There being now $382,000,000 of legal-tender notes, which may be reduced to $300,000,000, I do not think that that will be effected; but, taking the bill to be a success, the amount of legal-tenders will be reduced to $300,000,000. Make your $300,000,000 equal to coin, and, your national-bank notes by law being now redeemable in legal-tenders, there will be a fund for redemption equal to the legal-tenders plus the gold in the country. Therefore you must add your $160,000,000 of gold to your $300,000,000 of legal-tenders, which will make some $460,000,000 of means to redeem $354,000,000 of the national-bank notes, which may be increased by that time $100,000,000, making $454,000,000. The redemption fund would then stand at $460,000,000, the amount to redeem at $454,000,000, the redemption fund exceeding the other by $6,000,000; and thus the Government and the national banks on the same day throughout the land would resume without any disturbing effect, because the fund for redemption would be abundant; and whenever you make the means of redemption equal to the amount to be redeemed, there is no redemption required. The value of a bank note does not consist in the fact that it is redeemed, but in the fact that it is redeemable in good faith; not that it is actually redeemed, or at least very seldom; but the character of redemption must never be doubted, for as soon as there is the slightest doubt, then redemption is actually demanded.

Gold is no longer wanted in this enlightened age in transactions among commercial men. It is only needed as a basis of value, as the corner-stone and foundation for paper issues. I am very much in favor of introducing silver in lieu of this fractional currency, and this I consider a good feature in this bill.

Now, Mr. President, as to the time when the legal-tenders should be receivable for duties, my proposition is on the 1st day of July next. Although the notice appears to be short, I can see no reason why it should not be adopted. I do not perceive that the trade of the country would be disturbed by it or that it would affect commercial transactions. I can only see that a few speculators in Wall street would lose their occupation and would no longer be able to make money in buying gold one day and selling it the next. To do away with the gold-room of the city of New York would be a public blessing to this nation, and in my opinion this would do away with it. There will be no longer a necessity to buy gold, as there would be no use for it. Until 1879 we are not compelled to redeem. We have now eighty or one hundred million dollars in the Treasury; being much better off than most individuals.

But, Mr. President, this measure will be opposed by Senators upon the other side of the Chamber upon this plausible ground, and particularly by the chairman of the Committee on Finance, for I know his views on the subject, and I know he will argue with ability that it is a violation of the plighted faith of this nation, given to the bondholders, that the duties upon imports should be payable in gold, so as to enable us to pay our interest in coin. The argument is not correct. It is not true in point of fact. We did not make that pledge, as it is expressed and contended for by some gentlemen; and if we did make the pledge, we made it at a time when our credit was impaired, when a pledge of that kind was necessary; and it would not be a breach of faith to do away with it now, provided we carry out the spirit of the contract and pay our debt in coin. I am satisfied that a law of this nature would not affect the credit of the nation abroad nor the value of your bonds in the least. I do think it would be better for us if they were not as high above par; but let that be as it may, it would not affect the value, because every bondholder the world over would know that this nation is able and willing to pay its bonds in coin, principal and interest.

I think, as a means to accomplish the object that we all so much desire or profess to desire, the amendment that I have offered is most important, and the adoption of it in my opinion would enable us to resume beyond the possibility of a doubt. My friend from Ohio and myself are aiming to accomplish the same object. While his proposition is only to approach it in a slow way, I, being younger and more ardent, want to get at the thing in a more speedy way. I agree with him in principle; but if it be true that we can do it gradually, there is no reason why we should not do it rapidly; and I think, as a measure of finance, it would do more to settle the financial question in the country than any other measure, and satisfy the world everywhere that we do intend to resume specie payments, that we do intend to make our legal-tenders equal to specie, and are willing to take them in payment of all debts. Hence, agreeing in principle with my friend from Ohio, if I cannot accomplish my object I shall vote for his amendment, although I think we might increase it a little faster than he proposes.

Mr. THURMAN. I understand from the chairman of the Committee on Finance that it is the purpose to sit this bill out. I have no disposition, and I believe nobody has, so far as I know, to interpose any mere dilatory motions or delay in any way to defeat or retard the passage of the bill which the majority of the Senate possibly may vote for; but I think we need not hurt ourselves by sitting right straight along, and if it is acceptable I suggest that we take a recess for an hour or two.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will say in reference to the statement made by my colleague in one word that I did state to him that several Senators, some on both sides of the Chamber, preferred to close this matter to-night rather than that it should go over until to-morrow, if it must be closed before the holidays; and Senators have suggested that it ought to be disposed of before the holidays; but whether to-day or to-morrow I am perfectly indifferent. If Senators on both sides say they would rather finish it to-night, I am willing that we shall prolong the session, and then we need not devote to-morrow to it.

Mr. THURMAN. I withdraw my suggestion. My friends all around me say they are ready to vote now.

Mr. SCHURZ. Mr. President, I merely wish to say that I shall vote against the amendment, and also against the amendment to the amendment, for three reasons: In the first place, because I do not think that the object contemplated by the Senators introducing those amendments will be accomplished by their measure; in the second place, because it would have a doubtful effect upon our public credit; and, in the third place, because it is introducing into this bill a new subject of discussion which might finally embarrass it very much.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I want to ask the honorable Senator from Ohio who has charge of this bill one question with regard to its provisions; and before I do that I desire to make a comment upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BOGY] by which he proposes to make the payment of duties upon imports (now payable in gold which by law is appropriated to the payment of the interest on the public debt) optional with the importer, to be payable either in paper money or in gold coin. That would simply be to abolish the last trace, the last source, of gold income to the people of the United States. There is no gold now paid into the Treasury of the United States but that which is paid as duties upon imports. We know that at the time the bonds of the United States were issued the credit of the country was pledged that these duties were to be paid in gold, to be applied in payment of interest on the public debt, and it was made so payable for the purpose of giving credit to the securities of the United States.

If I believed, Mr. President, that the measure now before the Senate was a bill to restore specie payments in this country I would be inclined to vote for the measure of the honorable Senator from Ohio on my right, [Mr. THURMAN.] I have myself upon former occasions offered amendments, and voted for those offered by other members of the body, favoring a partial payment of duties upon imports in the paper money of the United States. I believe the Government discredited its own Treasury notes by refusing to receive them originally for the payment of debts due the Government while it insisted that other debts equally honest should be made payable in them. It was a mistake, it was a financial blunder, and one of the many which the history of the last twelve years records against the party in power. But, sir, believing that this is a bill rather adverse than favorable to a resumption of specie payments, that it is a bill tending to prevent a return to specie payments, that it contains many of the most objectionable features which have embarrassed our finances in the last eight years, and which it seems to me is intended to reproduce those same results, therefore I shall hesitate to vote even for the amendment of my friend from Ohio, much less for the amendment as amended by the Senator from Missouri.

I do not desire to banish from this country the last trace of gold payments to the Treasury. It is plain that if we are to resume specie payment there must be a fund of gold accumulated wherewith to resume, and this is nothing but a measure to abolish the only nucleus left by law for such accumulation and make a return to specie payments an impossibility while such a policy controls the Government. I hope this amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri will not be adopted, nor even that offered by my friend from Ohio, because I believe it should properly be appended to a bill honestly intended to resume specie payments; and as I cannot consider the measure before us to be in that direction, I am not disposed to vote for any measure that tends to banish our last source of gold income from the country.

Sooner or later, a sound public sentiment, born perhaps of the sufferings of the people, will demand that an honest measure of value shall be restored to the dealings of our citizens. That must come sooner or later, and I shall never be satisfied with the legislation of the country until it has produced that effect. Any measure tending to it shall find my vote recorded in its favor, and any measure hostile to it will find in me an opponent.

Now, I will ask the honorable Senator from Ohio who has charge of this bill whether he objects on line 15 of section 3, after the word "redeem," to inserting the words "and destroy," so that it will read:

It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to redeem and destroy the legal-tender United States notes in excess only of $300,000,000, to the amount of 80 per cent. of the sum of national-bank notes so issued to any such banking association as aforesaid.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would ask my honorable friend a question in response; and that is, whether the word he proposes to add will change the meaning of the bill?

Mr. BAYARD. Certainly it would, sir, in my opinion; and if it does not change it, why should the Senator object to the insertion of the word?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will answer the Senator now frankly, having asked him the question, that I do not propose to give my construction or opinion as a lawyer upon the question as to what is the meaning of the word "redeemed," as to whether it precludes or authorizes the reissue of notes, because I say that the question cannot arise under either of these sections until three or four years hence. The Senator will see that this process of reduction must go on until the whole amount of the fractional currency outstanding shall be redeemed. Whether it may then be reissued, I say frankly again to the Senator that we do not undertake to decide except so far as it is fixed by existing law. I, therefore, cannot vote for the Senator's proposition, simply because I propose to leave that an open question to be decided in the future according to law.

Mr. BAYARD. Now, the people of this country must take the record of this debate; they must take the answer of the honorable Senator who here represents his party on this subject, and they must see that he declines to tell them whether he means this to be a measure of contraction in any degree or at any time, or whether he means it to be a measure of inflation at the will and pleasure of the Secretary of the Treasury. We all know that the Treasury Department has been conducted with but slight regard for law for many years past. You had in 1872 and 1873 a reissue of the Treasury notes that your laws had declared to have been "retired and canceled," words of accepted, well-ascertained, thoroughly-understood meaning. Notes "retired and canceled" were retired and canceled in pursuance of a resolution of Congress in 1866 that the volume of the currency should be contracted thereby; but after that was done you had those notes reissued at the will of the Secretary, first in one sum of $5,000,000 in 1872, which were soon recalled, and then in a sum of $28,000,000 in 1873 and never restored but increased to $382,000,000 by the vote of Congress at the last session.

Now, see in this case: If it was an evil, if the people of this country felt that the Secretary of the Treasury ought not to be allowed no matter how honest or well-intentioned he might be, to play fast and loose with the business interests of the country, to make money plenty or scarce at his whim or pleasure, and that to the amount of $44,000,000, what do you say to this? Here you have a bill that gives him the same power to the amount of $100,000,000, and the honorable Senator who has charge of the bill, and who once reported against such dangerous power, will not agree that his bill shall contain language which shall render such an exercise of power impossible. No, sir, this is a doubled-faced bill. It seems to me (and I say it without disrespect to the motive of any man who wishes to vote for it) that this is juggling with a plain question which should be honestly treated. I say that here in my place, and I say it to my fellow-countryman out of this Chamber as well as those in it. I believe this bill to be a juggle with a question that ought to be a matter of straightforward honest business, and that there ought not to be in this bill any one word or any set of words susceptible of any but one clear and plain interpretation and not capable of being frankly and fully explained and construed by those who advocate its passage. Is it to contract your paper currency until you shall have such a volume that gold and silver, the money of the world, shall flow into the country to swell the combined volume of paper and coin again and give it not simply quantity but give it that which it now has not, intrinsic value? When you give it intrinsic value you give it an increased purchasing power. When you give it increased purchasing power, you reduce the volume necessarily less and less for the transaction of business; and when you have given your currency value in itself, by making it convertible at will into coin, you have relieved it of those fluctuations which cause such wide-spread distress to the laboring classes and the demoralization of every one engaged in business.

Now can it be that we shall be enabled to come back to the days of an honest standard of value, excepting by the process which shall gradually but surely make our paper money of credit convertible into a money of value? Things which are equal to the same thing are equal to one another; and therefore when your paper issues are made convertible into gold, convenience will prevent the gold from being demanded. Its presence will be sufficient to sustain the paper steadily at par. It will have, as I said, an increased purchasing power. That necessarily diminishes the volume, and that can only be accomplished by the presence of gold in the country which shall bear a due proportion to the volume of the currency to be redeemed by it on demand.

Is this bill a step in that direction? Does it not tend and tend only to invite a repetition of those very errors of finance which have played at fast and loose with the business of the country and made it more a system of gambling and speculation than of honest and legitimate commerce? That is the question. If this bill can be truly so described by any of its advocates, if it will tend even probably to such an end, it shall have my hearty support. Here I see it still more distinctly by the refusal of the honorable Senator who has charge of the bill to commit himself to any statement to its intent and meaning one way or the other. He complains of amendments being thrust in. "Thrust in!" I have seen no evidence of thrusting in of amendments. The honorable Senator says if Senators are going—I forget his exact language—but if amendments are to be thrust into this bill and questions of construction, it will destroy it; and he says it is a hard thing that it should be done, and he seems to arraign any one in advance who——

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope my friend from Delaware, who is a fair man——

Mr. BAYARD. I think the remarks will be found so reported. I do not think I misunderstood him.

Mr. SHERMAN. I not only invite now, but I think I did invite before, any Senator to offer any amendment who may choose to do so. I understand the Senator from Delaware desires to offer some amendments, and I trust he will present them and that the vote of the Senate will be taken on any proposition fairly presented by any Senator. I did not make any objection to his offering amendments, but I do object, on behalf of the friends of this bill, to the introduction of any other questions in the bill than those contained in it. Perhaps I used the word "thrust." I certainly will resist the thrust if made. I will vote against amendments, but I hope any Senator who desires to offer any amendment to this bill, so as to present his own views, will do so. Indeed, I should like nothing better than for the honorable gentlemen who are going to vote against this bill to tell us on what ground they vote against it. My friend from Delaware, I know, votes against it because it does not come to specie payments rapidly enough. I might agree with him on some points.

Mr. BAYARD. I am trying to give the honorable Senator from Ohio and the Senate my reasons for voting against it. I want to vote in favor of a simple, straight-forward, business measure, and I want to know the effect of what I vote for, and I do not choose to vote for a bill with two faces, and I do not choose to vote for a bill concerning which the gentleman having it in charge will not answer, if he can, plain questions as to the meaning of his own words used in the bill, but chooses to say, "You may make your own construction, you may put what amendment you please on the bill, and then put what construction you please on your amendments; but I do not choose to answer you as to what this bill is intended to do, or what is to be done with this currency which we have redeemed, or tell you how long it shall be redeemed, or whether the Secretary of the Treasury shall issue it the day after he has redeemed it, whether he shall accumulate it until it reaches $50,000,000 and then issue it again, or what he shall do with it." No; the honorable Senator, I think, has betrayed here both his embarrassment and his displeasure when such questions have been asked him; and therefore it is that when he as the father of this bill introduces his offspring into the Senate and asks me to vote for it and is not able to explain or willing to state what its provisions are, I think the question too grave to vote on in the dark.

Now, Mr. President, it seems to have been decreed in party caucus that this bill shall be passed to-night. To attempt to prevent it would simply be a question of physical endurance, of great personal inconvenience, and one that I am not disposed in this case to court for myself or others. My present feeling about it is that I would rather not vote at all upon the subject. I do not think this subject has been treated worthily in this debate and by this measure, and that the people of this country will say it has not been treated worthily by this debate and by this measure. There is no need for the passage of this bill this day, nor for two weeks to come, as a measure of relief. Its effect cannot be instantaneous. I do not think it is in the power of any man or party instantly to relieve the country from the financial embarrassments and pressure which are now upon it. Time must work relief. Wise laws will greatly assist and hasten the returning tide of prosperity, which, when it shall come back, should rest upon a sound basis. That, I think, is all that even wise laws can justly be expected to do. You cannot suddenly make a nation prosperous nor cure the ills of extravagant, corrupt, and reckless administration. Excess and improvidence must bear their punishment. All you can do is to set your administration upon a path of economy and honesty, that gradually prosperity may grow again.

I do not know for what purpose the gentlemen on the other side have so pressed this measure. Is it their sense of public duty or party necessity that this bill should be brought into the Senate only this morning and with the printers' ink scarcely dry upon it that we should be called on to vote upon it. I do not impugn their sense of duty, but I have the right to my own, and my own mode of exercising it. I consider that my vote here is a public trust, and I will try to execute it for the benefit of those who gave it to me. It is not my pleasure, not my mere personal opinion, certainly not my mere personal interest, that is to control me; but I feel and know that there are too many dependent for evil or good even upon the fraction of power which is given me by my vote in this Chamber to exercise it otherwise than with scrupulous care. This bill ought to be discussed, ought to be long and deliberately and patiently considered, and time is allowed us for none of this by the pleasure of the majority of the Senate. While they can pass the bill if it is their pleasure to pass it to-night—and I do not propose, as I said, to create a mere issue of physical endurance on this subject—at the same time my present impression is that I cannot vote for the bill as it stands with the refusal of the honorable Senator to deny the interpretation which it seems to me capable of bearing and refusing to accept amendments which would prevent any doubt as to a plain and honest interpretation. I shall reserve to myself the right of not voting on such a measure.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Mr. President, I am as much in favor of an early return to specie payments as any gentleman on this floor, and probably more so than most of those whom I have the honor to address. So far as I am personally concerned I would make short work of it. I have no panacea, but I would repeal the legal-tender act, and that would settle the question very soon. If Senators expect these measures of relief to extend through a series of years, with intervening sessions of Congresses to sit, and that at the end of that time there is to be a redress of so great a wrong as was perpetrated by the enactment of the legal-tender act without any suffering, they are very much mistaken. When you have departed from what is right, in getting back to it there must always be trouble; and the country will suffer before it gets back to a resumption of specie payments. Before we reach that great result the people will suffer and all branches of industry will suffer. You cannot legislate this people or this country out of that suffering. You have committed a wrong, and in getting back to the right you must expect to encounter difficulties. You might as well come to it first as last, and bear what you must, for now is as good a time as any you may have, when there is but 10 per cent. between paper and gold. Take what the Executive has recommended, repeal the legal-tender act, and let the people then adjust the relations that must then surround them. Interests take care of themselves, and soon there will be a sounder and better condition of things; and, while some will be obliged to bear hardships that in fact ought not to do it, the aggregate result will be good, and the hardships themselves will not be as great as may be anticipated by those who dread speedy and effective resumption.

We must get to it by more or less suffering, as did the people of England when they recoined their debased currency under William of Orange. It was not by years of studied and adroit legislation that it was done, but it was by the brave hearts and the master minds of his cabinet that Great Britain was indebted for a currency in coin that remains to this day. If you will read the description of the condition of things in England in the six months that transpired from the time all the debased coin was to be covered into the mint and recoined and issued to the people, you will have an idea of what the suffering of that people was and of the gloom and terror that then prevailed; but the men who controlled affairs there were never shaken for an instant from their settled purpose of redeeming England from the curse of a currency that was eating out her vitals. So here, I care not what you may say or what you may think or what you may do, you can only come to the resumption of specie payments really and truly when this people are willing to bear the natural consequences of their wrong-doing in the beginning. You must start in curtailing expenditures; in living economically; in doing without that which you can; not buy one dollar's worth more than you actually require, and only that when you have the money to spare. In other words, before we can come to a resumption of specie payments we must come down to hard-pan individually and as a nation. There is no use of talking of accomplishing the result by a mere system of legislation. Words, however nicely arranged in a law, will not do it.

We must go back to our normal condition before we can build upourselves again. And we are getting there day by day. More and more we are enduring, more and more we are suffering, and now one step more and all may be righted for a progress that our past bitter experience may secure for untold time.

But what is to be the result of this bill? I will vote for almost any measure that has a tendency to secure a return to specie payments, because I consider that if there is one wrong above another which can be perpetrated upon a free and industrious people it is that in this gold-giving and silver-giving land we should have upon us this vicious paper-money system that recognizes no convertibility into coin. It is a disgrace to the civilization of the age; it is a disgrace to the American name and character.

But what does this bill propose to do, I ask my honorable friends who originated it? It proposes to remit this whole question to the next Senate and House of Representatives and even succeeding ones, so that as soon as there is either real or imaginary distress, as soon as the cry comes up that more money is wanted to relieve, that moment agitation begins, and the Senate and House, it may be under the press of an election, may turn to the sovereign remedy, inflation—more paper money. What should be done in such a matter should be done quickly; there should be no time to undo. The knife and the pain should go together, so that, once over, we would not only not wish to be as we were, but be only too glad that it was all over, and bending our hopes to the future, would reap the fruits of a brave and a good act. There can be no temporizing with such great and vital questions. To act is the thing, and no better time than just now.

I would vote for this bill cheerfully if my honorable friend from Ohio would put in two sections of it a word or two, a word directing the Secretary to destroy the fractional currency and the legal-tender notes as they are redeemed. Forty-seven million dollars of fractional currency you may say is not a small matter. You propose to redeem $47,000,000. So far, so good; that is a considerable reduction; redemption of $47,000,000 of this miserable trash is something; but what is then to be done with it?

Mr. THURMAN. If the Senator will allow me, I desire to interrupt him there. The amount, according to the Comptroller, of fractional currency issued is between forty-seven and forty eight million dollars; but the Comptroller of the Currency reports, and no doubt truly, that the amount actually in existence does not probably exceed $40,000,000. The rest has been worn out and destroyed.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Say it amounts to $40,000,000, that is something to get rid of; but you do not propose to destroy it. That, then, remains on hand. Suppose you redeem five or ten or fifteen million dollars, or the whole of it, by the next session of Congress; that amount still remains on hand in the Department not destroyed. If we destroyed it, it would require legislation to remanufacture it; but it is to remain in the Treasury. So with your legal-tenders; 80 per cent. are to be redeemed for every dollar of new bank notes issued; but the redeemed are not destroyed; they are to remain on hand. Then as soon as there is a demand for money in the country, as soon as there is friction as a consequence of the bill, as soon as there is a wail or a panic in the land or a corner in Wall street, what will be done? The Secretary of the Treasury will be authorized to let loose that which he has redeemed, and you will have that in addition to what you have already got in the shape of the new national-bank notes. The very next Congress when it meets may inquire of the Secretary, "How much have you redeemed of legal-tenders; have you destroyed them?" And he will answer, "No." They then are all in the Treasury ready to be reissued; and the very first thing you may find is that Congress will be directing the redeemed but not canceled notes to be reissued again. If the notes be destroyed, if Congress knows that they are not in existence, there will be less motive in authorizing that amount to be manufactured than there will be in simply authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to reissue what he has on hand; for there may be no trouble in calling it a reserve and using it as such, as was once done, in what either Congress or a Secretary may consider an exigency.

Sir, I know what is coming. It is only intended for that. This proposition is only to have final effect in 1879. Now, I do not want to separate with our republican friends who profess to be hard-money men. There are some old democrats on the other side of the Chamber who have not forgotten the precepts of Jackson and teachings of Benton, or some old whigs who have not forgotten Webster and his great hard-money speech. I should like to co-operate with those gentlemen in providing for a return to specie payments. I desire to do it, and at the last session I was willing to vote for almost anything which looked in that direction, and I am willing to do so at this session. But the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber met in caucus, and for what purpose? To agree upon a financial measure. Now, sir, in a great measure like this affecting the public interests of the country, there ought to be no serious diversity of opinion even among political opponents. As the result of the caucus, however, we have this bill; and it, according to the statement of the chairman of the committee, the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] is to be left open to construction—to the construction of the Treasury Department and most conveniently to the action of Congress, which may be invoked in a year hence or two years hence, just as party necessities may require or dictate whether it shall be a measure of inflation or really what its title pretends to impart what it is.

That is the whole bill. How easy will it be under this bill to redeem $10,000,000 of fractional currency and $10,000,000 of legal-tenders by next winter, and then according to the supposed necessities of legislation order them to be issued again. I do not blame one more than another for this, because the natural desire of people when they are in debt is to pay with the cheapest thing they have or can get. The natural desire of people is to pay their debts as cheaply as possible, and they will do it if they can, and that is true the world over. Unless our people take a determined stand and are willing to endure suffering, we can never get back to the true standard of value. Having departed from the right, as you have done in establishing a legal-tender currency, we cannot get back to the point whence we started without suffering; and back you must go if you want this to be a prosperous country. You cannot do it by a measure of this kind. You cannot hold on to it long enough. Tumult and clamor and, it may be, real distress, will shake you; but to the old standard of the country and of all the world you must come. Sir, when you talk upon this subject you speak to a world-wide question.

The idea that this American Republic, this great country extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific, a gold-producing and a silver-producing country, should at this day be paralyzed in all its industries, its shipping interests, its manufacturing interests, its agricultural interests all going to the ground mainly if not altogether from the fact that we have not a competing currency with the world, is insupportable. How are we to expect to compete with the world when we are but ten or twelve days from the shores of all the great manufacturing and producing countries and we a paper-money country and they hard-money countries? It is out of the question. Under such a system your industries must go down, as they are going down and are down. You will suffer in getting back to sound policy, but to that you must finally come; and though it may not be for five years or ten years or fifteen years, though you may postpone it by such legislation as this, yet you must cut the Gordian knot as did the counselors of William of Orange when they stood up against the violence of London mobs and against the prejudices of the English people to maintain the public faith by maintaining the standard of money.

If this bill had that in it, I would vote for it cheerfully. Destroy these notes; I want them destroyed. Why not put in a provision requiring that? In that way we can bridge over the coming presidential election and these little questions of party politics by one great measure for the public good. Just destroy these legal-tenders and this fractional currency as they are redeemed. The meaning of resumption is or ought to be destruction to unconvertible paper money; but my honorable friend from Ohio will not say that they shall be redeemed in fact and literally. Let him say that, and I will go for the bill; and we may all go for it, defective and even delusive as it may be, as for a common object. I do not like to vote against this bill, and yet I feel that I ought not to vote for it as it is. I am reluctant to vote for it without a provision for destruction, because I fear this thing. It is only a bait to the passions and the prejudices of the next Congress. We have a democratic majority in the next House, and I do not want them to be in the way of temptation any more than I want you to do wrong. My democratic friends can go wrong in this question as well as my republican friends. I want no temptation left for them to undertake to tell the Secretary of the Treasury, "This issue you have got in hand and we want it, holding on to what we have got."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BOGY] to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN.]

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 16, nays 33; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Goldthwaite, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Johnston, McCreery, Merrimon, Norwood, Ransom, Saulsbury, Stevenson, and Thurman—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Boutwell, Cameron, Carpenter, Clayton, Cragin, Edmunds, Fenton, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Harvey, Howe, Ingalls, Logan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Sargent, Schurz, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Washburn, West, Windom, and Wright—33.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Boreman, Brownlow, Buckingham, Chandler, Conkling, Conover, Dorsey, Ferry of Connecticut, Gilbert, Gordon, Hitchcock, Jones Kelly, Lewis, Mitchell, Oglesby, Ramsey, Robertson, Sprague, Stewart, Stockton, Tipton, and Wadleigh—24.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I move to strike out the word "nine," in line 24, page 3, and insert "seven," so as to read "1877." According to my view of this measure we shall be no nearer specie payments in 1879 than we are now. There is no provision in this bill for the accumulation of gold for the purpose of resumption in 1879, and I think we may as well come back to specie payments two years earlier as postpone it to that period. My amendment gives us two years to get ready to return to specie payments, and if we really mean anything by this bill, let us assure the country that at an early day we mean to return to specie payments. I do not think the bill will have that effect. I think that while the people have demanded specie payments, and though the business interests of the country which have been depressed require that we shall abandon this system of an irredeemable paper currency, yet the financial wisdom of our republican friends who have agreed in caucus on this measure has been unable to do more than to promise to the people who demand something substantial that which will prove but of little value to them. I do not believe there is anything in this bill looking to specie payments. There is a declaration that we will return in 1879, but there is not a single feature in the bill that looks in that direction, save the mere declaration that we will in 1879 redeem the greenbacks in coin. Let us, I say, adopt the amendment which I now propose, and if there is any virtue in a declaration let us fix an earlier period for returning. I think the people of the country do not want a postponement for four years before they are to have something that is to be money in reality as well as in name, something that has an intrinsic value, something that will give stability to financial affairs in this country. I therefore offer this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ALLISON in the chair.) The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Delaware.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I offer this amendment: Strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert:

That from and after the 4th day of July, A. D. 1876, nothing but gold and silver shall be a legal tender for the payment of debts contracted thereafter.

Mr. CARPENTER. I ask for the yeas and nays on that amendment.

Mr. STEVENSON. I hope the Senator from Maryland will withdraw his amendment. I am one of those who believe that the legal-tender act was clearly unconstitutional, and I think so still. I shall not, however, vote at this time for its repeal. It would be rash and premature legislation for which the country is not prepared. So, too, in regard to the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments. I do not believe they were constitutionally adopted, but the country has acquiesced, and I am against disturbing them. I stand by them in good faith until they have been fairly tested and fully tried. I desire briefly to state why I shall vote against the pending bill. It cannot afford the stability which the country expects nor afford the relief which it has a right to demand. The bill is deceptive. It is a species of Janus-faced legislation, and should be deemed rather a measure of party policy than one of financial relief. Its introduction affords to my mind the first public acknowledgment by the republican party that they realize the fact foreshadowed by the recent elections that the scepter is rapidly passing from Judah, and that the days of their domination and misrule are rapidly coming to an end. To stay the advancing wave of popular condemnation it was necessary that the dominant party should, through caucus machinery, project some financial plan upon which expansionists and contractionists could temporarily unite. If public rumor is to be relied on, it has been a difficult undertaking. The bill before us is the result of their labor. It is eminently worthy of the object which the caucus sought to attain. The bill is clearly susceptible of two constructions. The expansionists by one construction can claim it as their measure and give it their support, while the contractionists, by a different construction, can insist that they have triumphed and the bill is one of contraction which commands their support. And it is unquestionably true that the bill is so worded as to justify diverse constructions, and allow both contractionists and expansionists to unite in its support as a party measure.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. STEVENSON. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do the democrats mean to say that it is theirs?

Mr. STEVENSON. No, sir; by no manner of means. The democrats have had no hand in the preparation of this bill. They have endeavored to acquire light as to its true intent and meaning from the distinguished chairman of Finance, but have failed to obtain it. Indeed, that distinguished Senator has not ventured to give us his own construction of the bill. Were he to do so, I venture the assertion that some of his republican colleagues would instantly take issue with him and prove that his construction was unauthorized and illogical. I venture to assert that the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Indiana wholly disagree in their construction of the power conferred by this bill upon the Secretary of the Treasury to destroy or reissue the legal-tenders which he is authorized to redeem; and yet upon that construction rests the question whether the pending measure is one of contraction or inflation.

Mr. EDMUMDS. What does the Senator say?

Mr. STEVENSON. I hope the Senator will not interrupt me. I will, when I get through, answer any question that he may propound. The accuracy of my prediction that this bill will be diversely construed by expansionists and contractionists will soon be tested when its provisions and intendment become the subject of popular discussion before the country.

Mr. President, the Senate well remembers how republican Senators differed upon the question of power when a former Secretary of the Treasury, now a Senator on this floor, exercised the power of issuing a large amount of the forty-four millions of reserves, and how severely that action was criticised as wholly unwarranted by the letter or spirit of the law. Am I mistaken in stating that the honorable chairman of Finance [Mr. SHERMAN] and the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] were warmly opposed in their construction of that law, one denying the legal authority exercised by Secretary Boutwell in that issue and the other equally confident in the assertion of the maintenance of that authority?

But, Mr. President, I am opposed to this bill upon another ground. I am unwilling to confer upon any Secretary of the Treasury the power to expand or contract the currency at discretion. The chairman of the committee who reports this bill declines to answer the question whether the Secretary of the Treasury can reissue the notes that he has redeemed, whether he will not have the power to reissue them. That is a matter on which the honorable chairman says every Senator must put his own construction. That is not the doctrine of the democratic party. They are opposed to arbitrary, unlimited power in one or many officials. They go for no ambiguous legislation. They are for straightforward, honest, upright legislation which the country can understand and which the public interest demands.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] says this bill looks to an early resumption of specie payments. When he is asked by the honorable Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] and the honorable Senator from Missouri, [Mr. SCHURZ,] what is his construction of the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to reissue the legal-tenders which he is empowered to redeem, he declines to answer! When the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] asks him to allow an amendment forbidding the Secretary of the Treasury to reissue the redeemed legal-tenders, their request is refused and the bill is to retain verbiage so uncertain as to admit of two constructions. Why this unusual mode of legislation? Is it the interest of the country or the sinking interest of the republican party which demands it? I can conceive of but one motive, and that is that contractionists and expansionists both hope to persuade the people that each have triumphed.

Mr. President, the dominant party will find themselves greatly deceived in this policy. The people will soon understand it. The very danger sought to be avoided during the last session of Congress of restricting the power of the Secretary of the Treasury and withholding from him any discretion of expanding or restricting the currency by reissue or destruction of the redeemed legal-tenders is increased by the provisions of the pending measure. No one can measure the danger of such a power invested in any one official.

While I have great faith in the honor and integrity of the present Secretary of the Treasury, whom I have for many years known long and well, and whose financial views are well known to the country as opposed to expansion and in favor of early resumption of specie payments, yet I am unwilling to clothe any Secretary, whether republican or democrat, with the power and discretion to inflate or contract at pleasure. It is a power too great to be intrusted to any public functionary. We have already felt the danger and evil influence of permitting any Secretary to exercise such a power; and no measure can ever receive my support when it is not limited and circumscribed by the letter of the law. It is because the chairman of the Finance Committee tells us it was the intention of the friends of the pending measure to exclude from it any words which by a uniform construction would require the Secretary of the Treasury to burn and destroy the greenbacks, as they were redeemed under the provisions of this bill, that prompts my opposition to it.

The present Secretary of the Treasury might, and probably would, construe the act as requiring a destruction by him of all the legal-tenders as fast as they should be redeemed, while his successor might take an opposite view and construe the same words as empowering him to retain the legal-tenders which should be redeemed, and to reissue them if he at any time deemed the interests of the country required it. Either construction would find defenders in this Chamber from Senators who will vote for this measure. Is such legislation open? Is it wise? Is it beneficent? Are not the interests of the country too great to allow or justify it? I think so, and therefore I shall vote against the bill.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I did not know that my amendment was going to give rise to discussion. It expressed my own personal views; but I withdraw it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ALLISON in the chair.) The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I thought the Senator from Wisconsin demanded the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He did.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is not that the first question to be tested under the rules of the Senate?

Mr. THURMAN. They were not ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This debate was entirely out of order. The Senator from Wisconsin had the floor and he was entitled to demand that the yeas and nays be taken on that amendment, and I insist on the rules of the Senate being observed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair observes that the yeas and nays were not ordered. The Senator from Kentucky took the floor and opposed the amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes; but I suggest to the Chair that the Senator from Wisconsin having the floor had a right to demand that the question should be taken on whether the yeas and nays should be ordered. He did demand it, and the Senator from Kentucky has been making his speech upon that question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will, if there is no objection, put that question.

Mr. THURMAN. No, sir; the amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It cannot be withdrawn when there is a demand for the yeas and nays.

Mr. THURMAN. It can be withdrawn at any time before the yeas and nays are ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But nothing can be done until that question is decided.

Mr. THURMAN. I deny any such proposition as that. A Senator demands the yeas and nays; and before any question is put as to whether they shall be ordered or not, the Senator offering the proposition withdraws it. What is to prevent his withdrawing it? Nothing. After you have once ordered the yeas and nays, and the call has begun, no other business can intervene; but it is perfectly within the competency of a Senator at any time to withdraw his amendment before the yeas and nays have been ordered on it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state the question as he understands it. The Senator from Maryland offered an amendment. The Senator from Wisconsin called for the yeas and nays upon it. The Senator from Kentucky immediately arose and was recognized by the Chair. The Chair is of the opinion, having counseled upon the subject, that it is in order for the Senator from Maryland to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very good. Then the amendment, I suppose, is withdrawn. I will merely take this occasion to remark that I am very sorry indeed that our friends open their batteries and retire so rapidly as they do under the cover of the heavy guns. There seems to be a great state of uneasiness and unhappiness on one side of the Chamber—I do not know what it is about, I am sure—on this subject. I was not speaking in reference to this particular amendment; I would just as soon the Senator from Maryland should withdraw it as not if he wishes to do so, because anybody else can renew it; but I beg leave to insist for the sake of the orderly proceeding of this body, no matter what the advice of the Chair is, that when under the Constitution of the United States and the rules of the Senate a Senator having the floor upon a pending question demands that the yeas and nays be taken upon it, he has a right to have that question put then; and it does not depend upon the pleasure of the Senate whether that question shall be forgotten and overslaughed by going on with the debate and then have the mover of the proposition, after it has been debated four or five hours, or whatever the time may be, find that it is inconvenient for his friends to put themselves upon the record on it and take it out. It does not depend on the pleasure of a majority of the body whether the yeas and nays shall be ordered on a measure. It depends upon the pleasure of one-fifth of the Senators present, and that is a demand which under the Constitution and the rules a Senator has a right to make at any time, and it is the duty of the Chair, I submit with all respect, to state that question and to ascertain whether one-fifth of the Senators present demand the yeas and nays when they are called for, and that no debate or other business can intervene except by unanimous consent.

I do not propose to appeal or to take any other step on the subject, because it is not in reference to this particular amendment that I make the remark, but you cannot have three or four questions going on at the same time, and as this question is one which overrides all others, I think that a Senator demanding the yeas and nays has a right to have it determined then and without further debate, for it is not a debatable question, whether the yeas and nays shall be ordered. So much for that.

Now that I am up, I wish to say a word on the general topics that have engaged our attention. The Senator from Kentucky complains that the chairman of this committee does not submit to the Assembly's catechism and answer the thirty-nine or the fifty-nine or the one hundred and nine questions which may be propounded to him. Have Senators forgotten that the construction of this bill, if it becomes a law, is a question which does not belong to Congress, that it belongs in another department and in another tribunal? And if Senators had addressed themselves to the bill itself, instead of to the Senator who has it in charge, and had stated to us their opinions of its defects and of its construction, and had offered amendments in that view, there would have been some force in asking us to vote upon those amendments. But this opposition to a bill providing for a resumption of specie payments, which is based upon catechisms and general talk entirely apart from the bill itself and intended to touch an entirely different body of people, as it evidently is, and not intended to touch the merits of the bill at all, is not quite the thing, it appears to me, in the Senate of the United States. Senators seem to be exceedingly ready to ask questions of other people without pronouncing any opinions of their own. I suppose they might catechise the Senator from Ohio on the subject of the ten commandments or of all the laws that we passed last year; but if in connection with that they would give us their own views upon this particular bill and tell us why it is that they are opposed to it and what they understand it to mean as a reason why they are opposed to it, perhaps the country might get some information. Whether it would be valuable information might possibly be another question.

So, Mr. President, I shall vote, until I get further instruction from the debates, against any amendment whatever that is proposed to this bill unless the Senator who moves it shall show us that that amendment in that particular is to be an improvement upon it. But I do not want to take up the time of the Senate in discussing what I think the bill means and what I do not think there is any particular doubt in respect to, because the hour is late and there is no good reason why the discussion of this subject should be continued.

Mr. CARPENTER. I desire simply to put in a protest against the ruling of the Chair upon the demand made for the yeas and nays. It seems to me that, in strict parliamentary law, when the yeas and nays are demanded, the pending question then is "Will the Senate sustain the call?" That not being debatable, no man can get the floor for any purpose whatever until that question is settled. Consequently he cannot get the floor to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. SCHURZ. I do not understand the Senator from Wisconsin to reopen that important question.

Mr. CARPENTER. Not at all.

Mr. SCHURZ. I desire to say to the Senator from Vermont that if he thought the opposition offered to this bill on the other side was factious, I shall be slow to think so with him; and if he promises to consider any amendment offered in good faith, I shall again give him an opportunity, for I may assure him that the proposition I am going to offer will be offered in the most perfect good faith.

I understand the object of those who introduced this bill to be twofold. In the first place the bill appears here as a party measure, and, as we are informed, agreed upon in caucus. About this I have but little to say. If the measure is really a good one, the party bringing it forward and giving it in good faith a united support will be entitled to all the credit that can be derived from it. The most legitimate—nay, the only legitimate way to make party capital consists in doing that which will best serve the interests of the country. I shall, therefore, dismiss this matter without further discussing its propriety. The question which I consider of paramount importance is whether the measure is a good one, and whether it will practically promote the ends it professes to serve. I desire to say at the start that I am going to vote for this bill. I shall do so in spite of all its defects. I should do so simply for the reason that it contains a pledge to resume specie payments on a certain day, and that, as we are solemnly assured, all those who support the measure will, as honest men, be obliged to consider themselves in honor bound to do all that is necessary to render the fulfillment of that pledge possible, should the provisions of the bill as they now stand prove inadequate. That pledge I mean by all means in my power to strengthen.

But at the same time I am bound to say that in my opinion the redemption of that pledge is not assured by the provisions as they now stand in the bill before us. I put some questions to the Senator from Ohio, who appears as the champion of the measure, for the purpose of ascertaining what his own views of the effectiveness of the different provisions of this bill were, and I regret to say that the answers I received from him were very unsatisfactory.

He permits me to doubt whether he himself sees a sufficient preparation for the resumption of specie payments in free banking and the withdrawal of legal-tenders to the amount of 80 per cent. of bank notes newly to be issued. To my mind that preparation does certainly not appear sufficient. Upon what ground do republican Senators expect to derive, as a party, any credit from the passage of this bill? Certainly upon no other than that this measure will practically relieve the country of the evils of an irredeemable paper money and bring on specie payments; for, if it does not, where will your party capital be? You will have none, and scarcely deserve any.

I suppose you do not indulge in the delusion that all the financial knowledge and sagacity of this nation is confined to the walls of this Chamber. There are a great many people in the United States of America who understand the subject of finance as well as we do, and when we lay a measure before them they will see through it just as quickly and as clearly as we; and I predict to-day that although it will be admitted that this bill has some good features, yet the financial minds of the country will very soon perceive that as a measure intended practically to bring on specie payments it is sadly inadequate in its provisions.

Look at the matter in the light of common sense. How can we get back to specie payments? It requires only candor and a little intelligent study of the subject to see that we cannot resume and maintain specie payments until we have less paper money and more gold. That is an absolute prerequisite. With the present volume of currency it is absolutely impossible to resume and sustain redemption. I think I am not going too far when I say that you, Senators, all feel this to be true. It is a very simple arithmetical problem. The depreciation of the currency indicates that its pres-cut volume is in excess of that which, on a gold basis, is necessary for the business transactions of the country. You resume under such circumstances, with such a volume of currency out, and what will be the consequence? Every dollar of the excess will at once rush to the Treasury for redemption and drain it of gold to that extent, and not only to that extent, for the general movement will take with it to the Treasury for redemption large quantities of paper money beyond that excess, enough perhaps to force suspension again. And what will become of the gold so drawn out? At least the excess will in all human probability flow abroad immediately. The effect which such a result would produce upon the business of the country cannot be calculated. I repeat, therefore, and I presume everybody must see it, if we want to resume specie payments with any degree of certainty and safety we must bring about a condition of things which will give us less paper money and more gold to redeem the remaining paper with, and unless the bill provides for that it does not come up to its profession.

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] says to me in an undertone, "You do not think you can pass a contraction bill?" I tell him candidly that unless we pass some bill which will bring about the condition of things I indicated, it is absolutely useless to speak of resuming specie payments and maintaining redemption. And in this respect the bill before us is palpably and deplorably inadequate.

I repeat, if I vote for the bill I do it merely because it contains a pledge to bind all its supporters as to their future action, but not because I believe that with its present machinery it will insure the desired result. At the same time, regarding it as inadequate, I do not look upon it as a dangerous measure. The duplicity which appears in it will, after all, be practically of comparatively little significance. I do not think that this bill, if made a law, will bring about a vast expansion of our national-bank currency. There was a loud clamor here last winter, as we all remember, that as soon as we should open the door for the establishment of new national banks in the West there would at once be a general rush to take advantage of the opportunity. What was the consequence? In my State, where it was also said the people were fairly starving for more "local circulation," we had an addition of about $9,000,000 offered to us, and the result was that we did not take a single cent, but surrendered $1,500,000 of what we already had.

I anticipate that the free banking provision will not lead to the establishment of a great many new banks in the West. Banking upon that basis will not be very profitable where the rate of interest is 10 per cent. and over. If there are any new banks created at all, most of them are likely to be in the East, and those Western Senators who last winter appeared so much frightened at the banking monopoly of the East, may see more of it under a free banking law like this than they ever saw before. Neither do I think that in the East a great many new banks will be started and that the volume of the national-bank currency will be very materially increased.

But if such an increase does not take place the measure will neither result in any corresponding reduction of the volume of greenbacks. There is, therefore, a probability that the bill will leave the currency of the country virtually in the same condition in which it finds it. At least the bill contains no provision which by its operation would necessarily change that condition.

But I want the Senate to understand that I express myself about the probable results of a financial measure with very great caution, for my own experience teaches me that when in the discussion of subjects of political economy we reason upon principles ever so correct, and draw from those principles conclusions ever so logical, it very frequently happens that in our calculation we leave out some element, some factor, which in practice brings about results very different from those anticipated, although our principles may have been correct and the conclusions were logical. Therefore, I say, I put forth any prediction of this kind with great diffidence; but I repeat, the bill as I at present understand it does not seem to me such as to render a material change in the condition of our currency probable.

I ask Senators, if the present condition of the currency is not materially altered, will the provisions of the bill bring us nearer to specie payments than we are to-day? I apprehend the judgment of the best financial minds in the country will be that the bill as it stands will not, and that further legislation of a more courageous character will be imperatively necessary. Why then not have that necessary legislation now? I ask republican Senators what effect do they think they can produce upon the public mind by a bill so manifestly insufficient? I need not tell them again that I do not mean to offer factious opposition; and it is with the utmost candor that I warn them not to indulge in any delusions about the gain they will make in public estimation by so inadequate a piece of legislation, for to conciliate a suspicious public opinion something more is required than a mere declaration of good intentions.

I fear that this bill is neither calculated to produce a steadying or reassuring effect upon the business community, for the business community will scarcely find in this measure as it stands a sufficient guarantee of a fixed, well-defined, and determined financial policy. The suspicion lies too near that a bill leaving the currency materially in the same condition in which it now is, will when the time of promise arrives, without any practical preparations for resumption having been made, be more likely to lead to a repeal or postponement of the promise than to the resumption of specie payments.

Now, I assume all the Senators around me supporting this bill are honest in desiring to reach the end they profess to have in view. Why, then, not give expression to that honesty of purpose in such a way that everybody will be obliged to recognize and appreciate it, by consenting to an amendment to this bill which will put the currency in such a condition that at the appointed time specie payments can with certainty and safety be resumed? Why expose yourselves to unnecessary suspicion and the business community to continued uncertainty by refusing to do to-day what ultimately, as honest men, you must do?

I to-day deprecated the hasty action on this bill which was advocated by the Senator from Ohio, and I will put it to him once more whether after all it is not far better that this bill be recommitted to the committee for the purpose of inserting into it some provision that will insure the approach to specie payments in the manner indicated by me. He knows just as well as I do that this bill cannot pass Congress before the holidays, and I think the more he considers the matter it will become clearer to him that this measure as it stands is not calculated to produce the desired effect upon the public mind; neither would it discourage agitation, for it is vague and indecisive enough to induce the advocates of inflation to make new efforts for the purpose of defeating the good objects here contemplated and of carrying their own point. Let those who stand ready to pledge themselves for the resumption of specie payments on the 1st of January, 1879, also show themselves ready to adopt the means necessary to that end.

I move you, therefore, sir, that this bill be recommitted to the Committee on Finance, with instructions to incorporate in it such provisions as are calculated practically to prepare the way for the resumption of specie payments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri moves that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Finance with the instructions he has named.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. SCHURZ. Then I offer the following amendment, to be inserted on the third page, section 3, line 22, after the words "and no more:"

Provided, That not less than $2,000,000 of legal-tender notes shall be retired monthly by the Secretary of the Treasury, and that the legal-tender notes so retired shall be canceled and destroyed.

I ask for the yeas and nays on this amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WINDOM, (when his name was called.) On all questions connected with this bill I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. NORWOOD.]

The result was announced—yeas 6, nays 44; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Fenton, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, and Schurz—6.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bogy, Boutwell, Cameron, Carpenter, Chandler, Clayton, Cooper, Cragin, Davis, Dennis, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Hamlin, Harvey, Howe, Ingalls, Johnston, Logan, Merrimon, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Ransom, Sargent, Saulsbury, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Sprague, Stevenson, Thurman, Tipton, Washburn, West, and Wright—44.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Boreman, Brownlow, Buckingham, Conkling, Conover, Dorsey, Ferry of Connecticut, Gilbert, Gordon, Hitchcock, Jones, Kelly, Lewis, McCreery, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Robertson, Stewart, Stockton, Wadleigh, and Windom—23.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HAGER. I desire to offer an amendment to meet a case which I think the committee have omitted to provide for in the bill reported. As all Senators are aware, we have two kinds of national banks—those that redeem their bills in gold and those that do not. There is no provision made here in regard to the gold-paying banks. Why not place them upon an equality with the other banks? The bill reported provides for the repeal of all limitation as to the amount of notes to be issued by the national banks which do not pay in gold, but it leaves the limitation that is provided by law upon gold-paying banks. This is an unjust discrimination. The gold banks should be encouraged, not discouraged. Those that do not redeem in gold I should say ought to be discouraged rather than encouraged. I hope that when I call the attention of the chairman of the committee to this provision he will accept the amendment which I am about to propose. The third section of the bill reads:

That section 5177 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, limiting the aggregate amount of circulating notes of national banking associations, be, and is hereby, repealed.

By reference to the statutes a section which follows, section 5185, will be found to have this limitation in regard to the gold banks:

But no such association shall have a circulation of more than $1,000,000.

My proposition is to amend the bill so as to repeal so much of this section as limits the circulation of the gold-paying banks. I presume it was omitted in the consideration of this bill by the committee, inasmuch as you have no gold banks upon the Atlantic side. In California we have no other kind of banks than gold-paying banks, and it is important for us that these banks should have the same rights in regard to circulation that the banks on this side have.

This is a reasonable proposition. It is not made with any view to make any factious opposition to the bill. I am not disposed to discuss the bill as to its merits or its demerits. We have specie as our currency in California and on the Pacific coast, and have always had. We have reached that point which you are desirous of attaining, and therefore we have little to say in regard to the arrangement of this bill, as it does not affect us in the manner in which it affects you on this side.

I hope that this proposition which is so reasonable, unless it is in conflict with some arbitrary rule which I have not seen in the Manual, will be adopted. I will ask for the yeas and nays on the proposition.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust the Senator will withdraw that amendment.

Mr. SCHURZ. I ask to have the amendment read.

Mr. SHERMAN. It simply repeals the restriction on the circulation of gold banks, limiting it to $1,000,000. That proposition has been reported favorably by the Committee on Finance and is pending in the Senate on another bill, but it has no pertinence at all to the question of specie payments. It is only a question as to the amount of circulation a gold bank in California may have. I trust the Senator will withdraw the amendment. I think myself the restriction ought to be repealed, but it ought not to be attached to this bill, which has no relation to banking except to make it free.

Mr. HAGER. I will merely say that the limitation in regard to the other banks is repealed by this very bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Not the limitation as to circulation of any particular bank. The relation of the circulation to capital or deposits is left as it it is.

Mr. HAGER. Let us read the bill and see:

Is hereby repealed; and each existing banking association may increase its circulating notes in accordance with existing law without respect to said aggregate limit; and new banking associations may be organized in accordance with existing law without respect to said aggregate limit.

I would ask if that does not allow existing banks to increase their circulation beyond the allowance that is now made by law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not at all.

Mr. OGLESBY. How does the Senator from California get rid of lines 39 and 40 of section 3?

Mr. SHERMAN. This whole section merely provides that the restriction as to the aggregate limit of $354,000,000 shall no longer apply; and the section repealed by this act is simply the section which fixes the aggregate at $354,000,000; and all these provisions are merely to allow new banks to increase their circulation without respect to that aggregate. This limiting the amount of circulation of the gold banks has no relation to the bill at all.

Mr. HAGER. I must admit that for want of practice in regard to the banking law as it exists, we not having anything of that kind, I am not very familiar with its provisions; but I would ask the chairman, if this bill becomes a law, whether the existing banks will not have authority to increase their circulation to any amount they may deposit bonds for?

Mr. EDMUNDS. By no means, unless they increase their capital.

Mr. HAGER. Can they do it under existing law?

Mr. EDMUNDS. By increasing their capital, not otherwise.

Mr. HAGER. But are they allowed to increase their capital?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly, if they conform to the other provisions of the law.

Mr. HAGER. I do not so understand. I understand there is a limitation now as to the increase of their capital, and that this bill is intended to allow them to increase their capital so that their circulation may be proportionately increased. In that respect I say the gold banks should be placed on an equality with them.

Mr. SHERMAN. I can assure the Senator that that is a mere question of detail as to the banking act. I am in favor of the provision, and at the last session reported a bill for that purpose, but it did not pass the House.

Mr. HAGER. I think the Senator is mistaken in regard to any pending bill of that kind. There is a pending bill to repeal another discrimination. Gold banks are only allowed now to issue 80 per cent. on the amount of their bonds, while the other banks are allowed to issue 90 per cent.; and there is a bill pending to repeal that discrimination, and place them in that respect on an equality. But I know of no bill that is intended to repeal this limitation of $1,000,000 circulation to each banking association that redeems its notes in gold.

Mr. SARGENT. On the merits of this proposition I entirely agree with my colleague, and I trust that the bill, which certainly, if not adopted, will very soon be introduced for the action of the Senate will be favorably reported by the Finance Committee, and I have no doubt, as the chairman of that committee states that he is in favor of it, its reasonableness will strike every Senator. But I cannot vote for this proposition as an amendment to this bill. I think, for the reason given by the chairman of the committee, the limitation repealed by the bill relates to the aggregate circulation of $354,000,000 and does not relate to the amount which a single bank may circulate. That restriction does not exist in regard to banks which are not gold-paying. Consequently this bill does not legislate on that subject.

Furthermore I desire that this bill in its present form and as reported by the Finance Committee shall go through. I believe that it is a great step in advance upon anything that we have had before, and furnishes great promise to the country. So believing, I do not desire that it shall be embarrassed by any amendment, and although entirely agreeing with my colleague on his proposition and desirous that it may pass as an independent one and determined to give him my aid in that direction, still as an amendment to this bill I cannot vote for it.

Mr. HAGER. If the measure is right, this is the only opportunity my colleague will have this session to vote for it in my opinion. If it accompanies this bill, and this bill becomes a law, that will also become a law; but if you wait for another bill to pass the ordeal of this Chamber and the other House, I have great doubt whether it will be got through; and if the thing is right, if all Senators admit that it is right, why not agree to it now? The chairman of the Committee on Finance, and my colleague, and every other Senator here, as far as I have heard, agree to it; and why not incorporate it in this bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. I can tell the Senator, if it is necessary to go into this debate——

Mr. HAGER. I was not a member of the caucus to which my colleague referred, or I might know the reason.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think I can tell the Senator perhaps better than his colleague can. This provision in regard to the limitation of the circulation of a gold bank to $1,000,000 was put in in the House, as I understand, on the motion of a member from California to prevent the Bank of California from coming in and absorbing the great amount of circulation. I always thought it was wrong to make this special discrimination to exclude a particular bank; and therefore we have once or twice reported a proposition to repeal this provision, but so far as I have known it has never yet passed the House. Certainly I would not desire to put on this bill a provision that would be likely to encounter local opposition in the other House if not here. The Senators seem to agree to it; but the members may not agree to it in the other House. At any rate, it is a proper provision for a separate bill, and I shall vote for it at any time in that form.

Mr. SARGENT. I have only a single remark more to make. I should oppose several things that might perhaps be considered right in themselves if they were proposed to be put on this bill. If this amendment be adopted, there is another one that occurs to me, and that would be the taking off of the 20 per cent. limitation and making it 10. A bill for that purpose passed the House and has been reported by our Finance Committee. I do not remember whether their report on that proposition was adverse or favorable. I think I could find several other propositions which might be a favor to our coast, but for the reason I have given as a controlling one, believing this bill to be a great advance on anything we have yet had and for the benefit of the whole country, I am willing to wait and attain the other objects in the ordinary course of legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California, [Mr. HAGER.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator demanded the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first question will be on the demand for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HAGER. Inasmuch as all the Senators are in favor of the proposition, I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays. [Laughter.]

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. I offer the following amendment: In section 1, line 7, after the word "them" insert "at their current value;" and after the words "redemption of" strike out the words "an equal number and amount of;" so as to read:

And to issue them at their current value in redemption of fractional currency of similar denominations.

It strikes me that the bill as it is drawn, if adopted, will leave us without any fractional currency before the next meeting of Congress. There is a difference of from 4 to 8 per cent. between silver and currency. In many sections of the country silver is worth nearly as much as gold. This is true all through the Southern States to-day. There is but a fraction difference between gold and silver there. I insist that you cannot keep small silver coin in this currency while it is 5 per cent. or even 1 per cent. above currency. Speculators will buy it up all over the country. They will go out as soon as this bill passes, and you will find great stringency in every part of the country for fractional currency. It cannot be had at all. The result will be that if it is presented to the Treasury here and exchanged for silver, the silver will be melted down into bullion and go abroad, and you will be without any fractional currency. It strikes me in that way.

People must not suppose that upon a mere notion of patriotism business men are going to allow this thing to run. If there is a quarter of 1 per cent. to be made by buying up and shipping silver, there are thousands of men in this country who will go into that business at once, and they will clear the last dollar of fractional currency out of the country in the first place, and then they will sell the silver. I think it would be wise at any rate to exchange it at its current value, the market value, whatever that may be; and then if it turns out that fractional currency is worth as much as silver, nobody will buy fractional currency and nobody will ship the silver.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. THURMAN. I was so unfortunate as not to hear the explanation of the Senator from Texas, and do not comprehend wherein his amendment, if adopted, would alter the bill.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. If the Senator from Ohio will listen to the amendment, it proposes to exchange the silver at its current value for fractional currency. That is to say, if silver is worth a premium of 4 or 5 per cent. above fractional currency, the Government is to ask that premium in exchange. The bill as it reads, as I understand, requires the exchange to be made even precisely. Now, there is a difference of at least 5 per cent. all over the United States between silver and currency.

Mr. THURMAN. If that were adopted, where would the Government sell its small change? Who would buy it?

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. Leave it as it is. The Senator from Ohio must understand that if the fractional currency is taken up and silver put in circulation in place of it, and that silver is worth 1 per cent. over the currency of the United States, it will be bought up. You cannot keep it in circulation; you cannot keep gold and silver in circulation to-day, because both are worth more than currency.

Mr. THURMAN. It is true that the most worthless currency is that which will circulate, and you cannot keep silver change and fractional currency both in circulation. The meaner of the two will circulate; but if you withdraw the fractional currency, then I do not see why the silver will not circulate.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. Mr. President, I have a word more to say. This bill strikes me with surprise, I confess. I have sat and listened to it carefully all the way through, and I have listened to the explanations that have been made, or, in other words, the absolute refusal on the part of the chairman of the Committee on Finance to explain at all. I understand the bill to be for inflation. I think I shall vote against it on that ground. I am well persuaded from the debate here last winter that no inflationist on this floor would vote for the bill if he did not believe it was for inflation. If Senators suppose that the country can be duped by anything of this sort, I think they are sadly mistaken. If they are not mistaken, I am. Since as long ago as the time of Martin Van Buren it has been common to adopt platforms with a double construction; but they are worthless, everybody knows, worthless for any purpose in the world, and this bill will most likely be worthless for any purpose. The whole text of the bill will be discounted before it is printed. Everybody in the country will consider what can be done under the bill. They will understand perfectly well, with what has been said here to-day, that it is competent for the Secretary of the Treasury to reissue forty, or fifty, or sixty, or eighty million dollars of currency after it has been retired.

Now, sir, if you can get anybody in the country to make up his mind that we are going to have specie payments under this bill I shall be very much deceived, I confess. I do not think that we are as near specie payments to-day as we were in 1869. In point of years probably we are if we ever come to them at all; but I mean our condition is such to-day that we cannot resume specie payments as easily as we could have done in 1869. I think we shall be less prepared in 1879 than we are to-day. The country is in the midst of a terrible panic. The whole country is prostrate to-day, and, as the Senator from Ohio farthest from me [Mr. THURMAN] remarked in his speech, the country has never recovered from such a panic under four years; I think not in so short a period as that. From the condition of the country to-day my conclusion is that we shall be in no condition to resume specie payments in 1879. If we do not go into bankruptcy between now and 1879 I shall be very well satisfied indeed.

It is no easy matter to deal with such a panic as we had last fall. Look at the condition of the Government at that time. There is hardly a national bank in the United States that did not commit acts of bankruptcy; and if the law had been put in force against them by the Secretary of the Treasury, as the law required him to put it in force, every solitary bank would have gone to the wall, as every Senator here knows, and the Government probably would have followed suit. They are not out of the woods yet, to use a common expression. If another panic occurs and the banks refuse to pay currency, as they probably would do, and there happened to be forty, fifty, or sixty millions retired in the Treasury under this bill, what does any Senator expect would be done? I expect that money would be reissued and set afloat in the country again in order to relieve the condition of the people and the panic and the Government and everybody else. We had as well face first as last the extent of this calamity that has fallen upon the country. It is going to grind the country almost to dust before we get out of it. The idea that by inflating the currency we start the wheels of business, of machinery, of commerce, of railroads, and of everything else in the country, is fallacious in my opinion. The country is not prepared for anything of that sort. It is confidence that is wanted, not money. There is plenty of money in the country now. It is to be had at a very small rate of percentage on proper securities; but you cannot induce men to go into business on it. No man has any confidence that he can prosecute business six months and come out whole. The general fear is that everything will go to pieces before a man can get his money back again safe.

Now, to my mind it is wisest for Congress to let the people work out of this panic for themselves. They have better judgment, better sense, know their wants and their condition better than we do. I confess for one that I have not been able to determine upon any bill that it would be wise in my judgment to pass. To go for contraction would bring on a panic; to go for inflation would only stave the thing off a few years and bring a panic on in the end, I think. For one, I should like to see the question left to rest with the people. If they cannot work out of it we shall have to go into bankruptcy, that is all. I do not believe it is possible to legislate out of it.

With these remarks I shall insist on the amendment I have offered. I have offered it in good faith, not to embarrass the bill in any way. I think it is an important amendment, whatever other Senators may think about it. We shall be without any fractional currency at all, I think, in less than twelve months unless some such provision be made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I ask that it may be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] desired me to say that on all these votes he was paired with the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. KELLY,] and that he should vote against the amendments and in favor of the bill, and the Senator from Oregon would vote the other way.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My colleague, Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, who is necessarily absent at this time, is paired upon these questions with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. MCCREERY.] My colleague would vote against this amendment, and I do not know whether the Senator from Kentucky would vote for it or not.

Mr. WINDOM. I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. NORWOOD.] I would vote against the amendment. I do not know how he would vote.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 3, nays 40; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cooper, Hamilton of Texas, and Tipton—3.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bogy, Boutwell, Carpenter, Chandler, Clayton, Cragin, Dennis, Edmunds, Fenton, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Hager, Hamlin, Harvey, Howe, Ingalls, Johnston, Logan, Merrimon, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Sargent, Saulsbury, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Stevenson, Thurman, Washburn, West, and Wright—40.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Boreman, Brownlow, Buckingham, Cameron, Conkling, Conover, Davis, Dorsey, Ferry of Connecticut, Gilbert, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Hitchcock, Jones, Kelly, Lewis, McCreery, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Ransom, Robertson, Schurz, Sprague, Stewart, Stockton, Wadleigh, and Windom—30.

So the amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and read the third time.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MCCREERY. I am paired on this bill with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.] He would vote for the bill and I should vote against it.

Mr. WINDOM. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. NORWOOD.] He would vote in the negative and I should vote for the bill.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am requested to state that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] is paired with the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. KELLY.] The Senator from Pennsylvania would vote "yea," and the Senator from Oregon "nay."

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 32, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Boutwell, Carpenter, Chandler, Clayton, Cragin, Edmunds, Fenton, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Harvey, Howe, Ingalls, Logan, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Sargent, Schurz, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Washburn, West, and Wright—32.

NAYS—Messrs. Bogy, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Goldthwaite, Hager, Hamilton of Texas, Johnston, Merrimon, Ransom, Sprague, Stevenson, Thurman, and Tipton—14.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Boreman, Brownlow, Buckingham, Cameron, Conkling, Conover, Dorsey, Ferry of Connecticut, Gilbert, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Hitchcock, Jones, Kelly, Lewis, McCreery, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Robertson, Saulsbury, Stewart, Stockton, Wadleigh, and Windom—27.

So the bill was passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HAMLIN. I ask the Senate to give me an executive session for a very few moments.

Several SENATORS. Let us take up the adjournment resolution.

Mr. CHANDLER. Pass the adjournment resolution first, and then we will have an executive session.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate do now adjourn. ["No!" "No!"]

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution for a holiday recess, and I ask the Senator from Maine to waive the executive session for that purpose.

Mr. HAMLIN. If the Senate will then give me a short executive session I will yield. ["We will!"] I withdraw the request then.

Mr. WEST. Is that resolution liable to be objected to?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, [Mr. INGALLS in the chair.] The Chair understands that the resolution of the House relative to adjournment cannot be considered at this time except by unanimous consent.

Mr. WEST. Then I beg to enter my objection.

Mr. HAMLIN. I renew my motion for an executive session.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at six o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 22, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

REIMBURSEMENT OF THE STATE OF MARYLAND.

Mr. O'BRIEN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4138) to reimburse the State of Maryland for arms and munitions of war taken from said State by authority of the United States in the year 1861; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

LOUISA F. STONE.

Mr. O'BRIEN also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4139) to compensate Louisa F. Stone, widow of Dr. Thomas J. Stone, deceased, for medical services rendered by him to United States troops at Leonardtown, Saint Mary's County, Maryland, in the years 1862 and 1863; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PRINTING OF A REPORT.

Mr. NESMITH. On behalf of the Committee on Military Affairs I ask the authority of the House for the printing of the report of General A. J. Hardie in reference to the expenses of the Indian war in Oregon.

There was no objection, and it was ordered that the report be printed.

IMPROVEMENT OF HOLSTON AND TENNESSEE RIVERS.

Mr. MAYNARD, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to communicate to this House a copy of report on survey in relation to the improvement of navigation of the Holston and Tennessee Rivers made by Lieutenant Colonel S. H. Long to Colonel S. D. Jacobs, president, &c., with the tables, maps, charts, and diagrams accompanying the same.

Mr. MAYNARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SHIP-CANAL BETWEEN CHESAPEAKE AND DELAWARE BAYS.

Mr. SWANN. I ask unanimous consent to submit for action at this time the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to report to this House the most feasible route for the Chesapeake Canal over the narrow peninsula which separates the Chesapeake and Delaware Bays, and also to transmit estimate of the cost of the same per mile, together with the probable distance saved by such canal between Baltimore and New York, the ports of New England and European ports, and the advantage likely to accrue from the construction of such work to the commerce of the United States, in the development of our trade and resources, and the probable saving in time, &c.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think that should go to the Committee on Commerce.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana object to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman from Maryland will not object to this going to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SWANN. I have no objection to its being referred to that committee.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

FOLDING DOCUMENTS.

Mr. KELLOGG. I ask unanimous consent to submit a joint resolution for consideration at this time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the appropriation of $25,000 by act of 23d of June, 1874, for folding Agricultural Reports be used for folding documents, including pay of folders of the folding-room and for materials, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. KELLOGG. I ask that the section of the act of last year making this appropriation be read.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I object to the consideration of the resolution now.

Mr. KELLOGG. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection for a moment till the section of the act is read, and until I make an explanation which will only occupy a moment.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I have no objection to the gentleman making a statement or having a section of the law read.

Mr. KELLOGG. Let the Clerk read what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

For folding the reports of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the years 1872 and 1873, $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary for the folding-room of the House.

Mr. KELLOGG. What I wish to say is this: That last year the appropriation for the folding-room was only about one-half what it had heretofore been. That appropriation of $25,000 was so worded that it cannot be made available, and the employés of the folding-room cannot get their pay for this month unless this resolution passes both Houses. I hope the gentleman from Vermont will withdraw his objection.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I have no objection to the resolution being referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. KELLOGG. Very well; and I hope the committee will report it back to-day.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 133) was received, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

CONTINGENT FUNDS IN THE INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. RANDALL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, instructed to transmit to the House a detailed statement of the disbursements of all contingent funds in his Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, and of all disbursements of the funds in the various divisions of the Secretary's office of his Department of the same period, giving the names of the persons to whom payments were made, the nature of the expenditure, and the amount in each case.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SMUGGLING OF MERCHANDISE THROUGH THE MAILS.

Mr. DAWES, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be directed to inform the House if he is in possession of any information or facts in relation to the smuggling of merchandise through the mails; and if so, to communicate all such facts and such legislation as may be necessary in respect to the same.

ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S DEPARTMENT.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 3912) reducing the force in the Adjutant-General's Department of the Army.

The bill was read. It provides that the Adjutant-General's Department of the Army shall hereafter consist of one Adjutant-General, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier-general; two assistant adjutants-general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of colonels; four assistant adjutants-general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of lieutenant-colonels; and ten assistant adjutants-general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of majors.

The second section repeals so much of section 6 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1870, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1869, as applies to the Adjutant-General's Department.

Mr. RANDALL. I should like to know whether the Military Committee have considered this subject.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. The Military Committee have considered this subject and this is the unanimous report of the committee.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the House to consider whether we really want any more brigadier-generals. Our staff corps are already too large in proportion to the size of the Army. We have been cutting down the Army and now we propose to increase the staff.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. It makes no more brigadier-generals.

Mr. GARFIELD. We ought not to have brigadier-generals at the head of our staff corps. I recollect the act of 1869 which was passed to stop promotions. The Speaker was then a member of the conference committee with myself, and we concluded that was the only safe way to prevent the tremendously large staff, which was a staff for a million men, from maintaining its out-of-proportion size. Now, if we reopen that, you will have what has happened in connection with our legislation of the last session. I understand that under that legislation there has been nominated for one staff corps enough, if extended to the whole Army, to require more than a million dollars' additional expense, and the pay and allowance extend back. I think this bill ought to be discussed more fully than it can be now. If the gentleman will consent to have it assigned to some day when we can discuss it fully, I would like to have it so discussed. I do not object to its introduction now, but I hope the gentleman will consent to an assignment for some future time.

It was but yesterday we had a bill sent to us from the Senate—I think it is now on the Speaker's table—to take back part of the legislation of the last session in regard to the staff corps. It seems to me we should consider the two bills together.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. Then I will ask that the bill be set down for consideration on the first Wednesday after the recess.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. For certain reasons, I would like to have the bill recommitted to the committee.

Mr. GARFIELD. Very well; they can report it back at any time just as well.

The SPEAKER. It can be recommitted and a motion entered to reconsider.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I have no objection to that.

No objection being made, the bill was recommitted and a motion to reconsider entered upon the Journal.

GRAND JURIES IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table, for consideration at this time, Senate bill No. 974, to enable the supreme court of the District of Columbia to proceed with its jury business.

The bill provides that until the 1st day of February, 1875, it shall be lawful for the supreme court of the District of Columbia, in its various terms, to cause to be drawn by lot and impaneled from time to time the proper number of persons for grand and petit jurors in said court from those whose names are now deposited with the clerk of the said court as jurors of the District of Columbia, selected by the persons designated to select jurors in said District; and such panels so drawn and constituted shall be deemed and held to be valid and legal; but nothing herein contained shall be construed to impair the right of challenge to individual jurors, as now existing by law.

Mr. CREAMER. I think I must object, and for this reason: if we propose to do anything with the courts of the District of Columbia, the sooner we settle the question whether or not the power exists in these courts to take editors from any section of the country the better. I think we had better discuss both questions at the same time.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. There is now no provision of law by which the courts can obtain grand juries for this District. This bill is only for a temporary purpose, to enable them to get a grand jury, so that the cases of parties now in jail may be considered. I will say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CREAMER] that there is another bill pending, making permanent provision for the jury system of this District. But there is an absolute necessity for the passage of this bill, to the end that parties now in jail may have their cases considered by a grand jury. I will state to the gentleman that this difficulty arises out of a recent decision of the supreme court of this District. The bill now before the House is a bill that the judges of the supreme court are anxious to have passed.

Mr. CREAMER. I will withdraw my objection.

There being no further objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read three times, and passed.

REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. POLAND. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table and considered at this time Senate bill No. 1054, reserving for the use of Congress one hundred and fifty copies of the Revised Statutes authorized to be printed by the act of June 20, 1874.

The bill provides that the one hundred and fifty copies of the Revised Statutes of the United States bound and delivered to the two Houses of Congress by the Congressional Printer under the concurrent resolution agreed to on the 11th of December, 1874, be taken and reserved from the number ordered by the Secretary of State under the act of Congress passed the 20th day of June, 1874.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read three times, and passed.

CONTRACT SURGEONS.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I ask consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 1043 suspending so much of the act entitled "An act to reorganize the several staff corps of the Army," approved June 23, 1874, as applies to contract surgeons. This act suspends so much of the act referred to as applies to contract surgeons until the 1st day of February, 1875. I ask that an amendment be made to the bill by striking out the words "the 1st day of February, 1875," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "until otherwise provided by law." That will meet the requirements of the case.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the gentleman will give some explanation for this bill, in order that the RECORD may contain the reasons for its passage.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. The Senate bill suspends the operation of the law for but a single month, and will not enable the Surgeon-General to employ contract surgeons. The Surgeon-General says that if he is permitted to employ contract surgeons there will be a saving to the Government of at least $60,000. He now has not a sufficient number of surgeons, and according to the law he is compelled to employ surgeons in the several districts, and must pay them according to the fee-bills of the towns where they live. This bill, if enacted into a law, will be a saving to the Government.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I believe it is conceded by every one who has given consideration to this subject that there will be economy in changing in some respects the law as passed at the last session. For instance, prior to the passage of that act the Medical Department had authority to employ a certain number of contract surgeons at fixed prices. By the law passed at the last session there is a restriction in this respect, so that at many of the posts where contract surgeons have heretofore been employed they are now unable to employ them and will be obliged to pay for specific visits at the rates paid in the cities or other places where the posts of the Army may be situated. I am satisfied from the examination I have given this subject that it will be a matter of economy to change in some way that law; and hence I think its operation ought to be suspended for the time being.

Mr. RANDALL. The object I had in view in asking for an explanation has been attained. I make no further objection.

There being no objection, the amendment proposed by Mr. ALBRIGHT was agreed to; and the bill, as amended, was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ALBRIGHT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOSEPH WILSON.

Mr. BECK. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table and passed the bill (S. No. 926) referring the case of Joseph Wilson to the Court of Claims. A sub-committee of the Committee on War Claims have examined this bill and recommend its passage.

Mr. LAWRENCE. But the whole committee has not acted on the bill. This matter ought to be very thoroughly examined.

Mr. BECK. The case undoubtedly ought to go to the Court of Claims.

The bill, which was read, provides that the claim of Joseph Wilson for compensation for mules captured by the rebels in July, 1864, in consequence, as he alleges, of the refusal of the pickets of the Army to allow him to pass within the lines and deliver the mules to the Government on his contract, be referred to the Court of Claims for its decision according to the law and practice of that court in such cases and proceedings.

Mr. RANDALL. What committee has examined this?

Mr. BECK. The Committee on War Claims.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read three times, and passed.

Mr. BECK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REGULATION OF TELEGRAPHS.

Mr. HAGANS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary inquire whether any injurious restrictions or discriminations are imposed on the transmission of telegraphic reports to the press or private individuals, and whether any, or if any what, legislation is necessary to regulate the administration of the telegraph; and, after hearing parties in interest, to report by bill or otherwise.

MARE ISLAND NAVY-YARD.

Mr. LUTTRELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4140) to appropriate $163,597 for the improvement of Mare Island navy-yard, Vallejo, California; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

DEVELOPMENT OF MINING RESOURCES.

Mr. LOWE. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2032) to amend an act entitled "An act to promote the development of the mining resources of the United States," approved May 10, 1872, be taken from the Speaker's table and concurred in.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask that the bill be read.

The Clerk read the bill.

It provides that the fifth section of the act named in the title be so amended that where a person or company has or may run a tunnel for the purpose of developing a lode or lodes, owned by said person or company, the money so expended in such tunnel shall be taken and considered as expended on the lode or lodes, whether located prior to or since the passage of the act; and such person or company shall not be required to perform work on the surface of the lode or lodes in order to hold the same as required by the act.

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

Mr. LOWE. I hope the gentleman will allow the amendment of the Senate to be read.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

In line 1 strike out "the fifth section of said act" and insert "section 2034 of the Revised Statutes;" and amend the title so as to read "an act to amend section 2034 of the Revised Statutes relating to the development of the mining resources of the United States."

Mr. LOWE. The amendment is only a simple reference to the Revised Statutes instead of the original act.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to have this matter considered by a committee.

Mr. LOWE. The bill has been considered by a committee and passed by both Houses. This amendment simply changes the mode of reference to the statute.

Mr. RANDALL. For one I do not comprehend how far back the bill may reach. We may credit expenditures very many years back.

Mr. LOWE. This bill has been fully considered by the appropriate committee and passed by the House; it has also been agreed to by the Senate. This amendment simply changes the reference to the section by referring to the Revised Statutes instead of referring to the original act. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] will not insist upon his objection.

Mr. KASSON. Has the bill been printed?

Mr. LOWE. Yes, sir.

Mr. PAGE. It has been fully considered by committees in both Houses.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, the bill is not before the House.

THE VISIT OF THE KING OF HAWAIIAN ISLANDS.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer the following from the Committee on Appropriations, which it is necessary to pass soon, if at all. It is an act in regard to the visit of His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands.

The bill, which was read, provides that the sum of $30,000 be appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to defray the expenses attending the visit of His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands and his suite in the United States; the same, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State, vouchers to be filed in the Treasury Department and statement thereof to be reported to Congress by the Secretary of State.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have here a letter from the Secretary of State on the subject.

Mr. HEREFORD. I object, and shall continue to object until I have an account of what was done with the $25,000 appropriated for the Japanese embassy. There has been no report made on that subject up to this day.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman to suspend his objection for a moment. The King of the Hawaiian Islands some months ago notified our Government of his intention to visit this country, and the President very properly tendered him an invitation to visit Washington as a guest of the United States. There was no time to lay the matter before Congress so that an appropriation could be made in advance for his expenses. I am informed, and have every reason to believe, not only from the Secretary of State but from the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, that the expenses of the visit will be of the most carefully economical character consistent with the nature of the expense. The sum named probably will be beyond what will be needed; but a full report, it is here provided, shall be made to Congress direct. It will be very embarrassing to the Secretary of State if Congress should now before the holidays refuse to make this appropriation.

Mr. RANDALL. How much is it?

Mr. GARFIELD. Thirty thousand dollars is the sum proposed. Probably the actual expense will be less than that amount.

Mr. RANDALL. I think we had better not appropriate more than is necessary.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have presented this matter, as it was my duty, before the holidays, and hope that objection will not be insisted on, as it will embarrass the Government in a matter so delicate as this is while our guest is still here.

Mr. RANDALL. It seems to me that we had better postpone the subject until the guest is gone.

Mr. GARFIELD. That could not well be done.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia objects, and the bill therefore is not before the House.

RECUSANT WITNESS—COLONEL R. B. IRWIN.

Mr. DAWES. I have a communication addressed to the Speaker of the House which I ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 22, 1874.

To the SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES:

We, the undersigned, attending and consulting physicians in the case of Colonel R. B. Irwin, having carefully, and in each other's presence, examined the above-named patient, and fully recognizing our responsibility to the Congress of the United States in the premises, do hereby certify that in our judgment the said Colonel R. B. Irwin is not at present in a physical condition to present himself before the bar of the House, or to be subjected to any mental excitement whatever.

W. P. JOHNSTON, M. D.,
Attending Physician.

ALEX. Y. P. GARNETT, M. D.,
Consulting Physician.

Mr. DAWES. After such a statement from gentlemen of such high personal and professional character the Committee on Ways and Means cannot instruct the Sergeant-at-Arms to bring this witness before the House unless the House should otherwise order. It has been deemed best to lay the paper before the House, in order that it may understand the reason for the non-appearance of the witness. The command of the House is to bring him here forthwith, and it may be a matter of inquiry why the Sergeant-at-Arms does not obey the precept of the House. It is only that the House may understand the reason why, in the present condition of the witness, the Sergeant-at-Arms did not feel at liberty to bring him here and have brought the matter up.

EAST PASCAGOULA A PORT OF DELIVERY.

Mr. CONGER. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Commerce a bill (H. R. No. 4141) to make East Pascagoula, in the State of Mississippi, a port of delivery in the district of Pearl River.

There was no objection, and the bill was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, provides that from and after the passage of this act East Pascagoula, in the State of Mississippi, in the district of Pearl River, shall be a port of delivery in said district.

Mr. CONGER. I wish the Clerk to read the following letter:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., December 16, 1874.

SIR: I have received your letter of to-day, submitting a proposed bill intended to make legal the present custom of allowing the entry and clearance of vessels at East Pascagoula, and requesting the opinion of this Department in regard to the matter.

You are informed in reply that, as the facts have been represented to me, East Pascagoula is the only port in the district of Pearl River suitable for the accommodation of the foreign trade which has recently opened in that district.

I recommend, therefore, instead of the passage of the bill submitted by you, that East Pascagoula be made a port of delivery in the district aforesaid. Then, by laws already existing, this Department will have authority to clothe the deputy collector of customs stationed there with the powers necessary to enable him to enter and clear vessels, to receive duties, and to perform other acts ordinarily done by a collector at a port of entry.

Very respectfully,

B. H. BRISTOW,
Secretary.

Hon. J. R. LYNCH,
House of Representatives, Capitol.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Is this port accessible to sea-going vessels?

Mr. CONGER. It is accessible from the Gulf of Mexico. A large number of buildings have been erected within a few years. They have to go to get their entries at a port of delivery nearly one hundred miles off. If it be made a port of delivery, the officer there will have the power to make such entries.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Does this increase the number of officers?

Mr. CONGER. It does not; it merely gives the power.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CONGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AGRICULTURAL REPORTS FOR 1872 AND 1873.

Mr. DONNAN. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to report a substitute for the resolution referred to the committee in relation to the printing of the Agricultural Reports.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the substitute only will be read.

There was no objection, and the Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed of the annual report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the year 1872 two hundred and thirty thousand copies, of which fifty thousand shall be for the use of the Senate and one hundred and eighty thousand for the use of the House of Representatives; and that there be printed of the report of the said Commissioner for the year 1873 one hundred and fifty-five thousand copies, of which thirty-five thousand copies shall be for the use of the Senate and one hundred and twenty thousand copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

Mr. DONNAN. I desire to say one word. The Committee on Printing have reduced the number named in the original resolution by seventy-five thousand. The reason for this reduction is that while for 1872 the Commissioner has received only the usual number, twenty-five thousand, he has received under the appropriation of last year, as I am informed by the Congressional Printer, one hundred thousand copies for 1873, being seventy-five thousand copies more for that year than for 1872. The committee have reduced, therefore, the number by that amount. I will state, also, that the cost of this report for 1872 will be a little less than forty-two cents per copy, and the cost of the report for the year 1873 will be between thirty-nine and forty cents per copy. I call the previous question upon the passage of the resolution.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I desire to ask the gentleman whether at the last session of Congress a resolution was not adopted ordering the report of 1872 to be printed?

Mr. DONNAN. During the last session the House of Representatives adopted a resolution authorizing precisely the same number as that we now provide for in connection with those received by the Department; but that resolution failed to receive favorable consideration on the part of the Senate.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Is it not now pending in the Senate?

Mr. DONNAN. It is not.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I suppose it is of no use to make any opposition to this. I would be glad, however, to have a division of the House upon it, to see if it be the unanimous wish of the House to adopt this resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

On the question of agreeing to the resolution there were—ayes 59, noes 26; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER. Is further count demanded?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I call for the yeas and nays on the question of agreeing to the resolution.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays there were ayes 14; not a sufficient number.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered, and the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. DONNAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRINTING EXTRA COPIES OF PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

On motion of Mr. DONNAN, the Committee on Printing were discharged from the further consideration of the resolution providing for printing 20,000 extra copies of the President's annual message, and the same was ordered to be laid upon the table.

F. CHRISTIAN AND Z. DE BOW.

On motion of Mr. MAGEE, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Patents was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1366) to authorize Thomas Christian and Z. De Bow to bring suit in the Court of Claims for compensation for the use of their improved wagon-brake by the United States; and the same was referred to the Committee on Claims.

FOWLKES WUNSTON ET AL.

On motion of Mr. WHITEHEAD, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Fowlkes Wunston and other citizens of Lynchburgh, Virginia; and the same was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

GOVERNMENT OF THE DISTRICT.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4142) amending an act entitled "An act for the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;" which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

PACIFIC MAIL SUBSIDIES.

Mr. DAWES. I am instructed by the Committee on Ways and Means to report the following resolution, and to ask its passage:

Resolved, That the Committee on Ways and Means, in prosecuting pending investigation into the alleged expenditure of money in procuring the passage of subsidies for the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, may hold sessions either by full committee or sub-committee, in the city of New York with the same powers as those now exercised by the committee in such investigations in the city of Washington.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INTERNAL-REVENUE LAWS.

Mr. FOSTER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4143) to amend the existing internal-revenue laws; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I move that the rules be suspended and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the special order, the bill (H. R. No. 3819) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes.

And pending that motion I move that all general debate on the bill shall be closed in five minutes.

Mr. POLAND. Will the gentleman yield to allow me to report a bill from the Committee on Revision of the Laws of the United States?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I yield to the gentleman if it will not occupy much time.

AUTHENTICATION OF REVISED STATUTES, ETC.

Mr. POLAND, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Revision of the Laws of the United States, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4144) providing for the authentication of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and for preserving the originals of all laws in the Department of State; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. POLAND. I am instructed by the committee to ask that this bill be put upon its passage. The Secretary, Mr. Fish, is exceedingly anxious that it shall pass before the holiday recess.

The bill was read. It provides that the certificate to the printed volume of the Revised Statutes of the United States required by section 2 of an act "providing for the publication of the Revised Statutes and laws of the United States," approved June 20, 1874, shall be made by the Secretary of State under the seal of the Department of State, and repeals so much of said section as provides that such certificates shall be under the seal of the United States.

The second section provides that section 204 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall hereafter read as follows:

Whenever a bill, order, resolution, or vote of the Senate and House of Representatives, having been approved by the President, or not having been returned by him with his objections, becomes a law or takes effect, it shall forthwith be received by the Secretary of State from the President; and whenever a bill, order, resolution, or vote is returned by the President with his objections, and on being reconsidered is agreed to be passed and is approved by two-thirds of both Houses of Congress, and thereby becomes a law or takes effect, it shall be received by the Secretary of State from the President of the Senate or Speaker of the House of Representatives, in whichever House it shall have been last so approved, and he shall carefully preserve the originals.

Mr. POLAND. I will not take any time to make any explanation of the necessity of this bill unless some gentleman desires it.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

LAND TITLES.

Mr. PACKARD. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the general Calendar House bill No. 2188, for the relief of persons to whom the governors of Northwestern and Indian Territories confirmed land. I ask that the bill may be brought before the House for consideration as in Committee of the Whole on the third Tuesday in January.

No objection was made, and it was so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MAYNARD. Have we had a morning hour?

The SPEAKER. We have not.

Mr. MAYNARD. Then I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the calling of committees for reports, beginning with the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I move that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. If the House agrees to go into Committee of the Whole that will waive the regular order.

Mr. MAYNARD. If the gentleman makes his motion for the purpose of going on with the naval appropriation bill, I hope he will submit another motion to close all general debate upon the bill, so that if we go into Committee of the Whole we will be upon the bill.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I propose to limit all general debate to five minutes, and make that motion.

Mr. BECK. I am advised, upon application at the document-room, that the report of the Secretary of the Navy, which we ought to have when considering this bill, has not yet been received.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The Printing Office is almost choked up. It is almost impossible early in the session to get the reports of the Departments and Bureaus. It is not the fault of the Department; the report has been sent in.

Mr. BECK. It so happens that gentlemen on this side of the House, who were not able to be present while this bill was being made up——

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Has not the gentleman received a copy of the report of the Secretary of the Navy?

Mr. BECK. I have not; I sent for it this morning, but received word that it had not been received.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I have received it.

Mr. BECK. I have at my room a pamphlet copy of the report of the Secretary of the Navy, without the appendix; but it is the appendix which gives all the necessary information.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The appendix sometimes does not reach the House until January or February. I do not think that at this stage of the session, considering that this is a short session and we have a long recess before us, the gentleman will insist that there should be any further delay. We ought to put these appropriation bills through as rapidly as we can in the early part of the session, because, as the gentleman knows, by and by there will be other matters besides appropriation bills which the House will want to discuss. The Senate has a finance bill which they will send over soon after the holidays; and the more appropriation bills we can get through now, the more time we will have then for the consideration of that and other bills. That is why I am desirous of getting this bill on, and I hope the House will pass it before we take our recess to-morrow. If we wait for the appendix and all these voluminous reports we will not pass this bill for weeks.

Mr. BECK. The report will be here soon after the holidays.

The question was taken upon the motion to limit general debate, and it was agreed to.

The question was then taken upon the motion to go into Committee of the Whole; and upon a division—ayes 79, noes not counted—it was agreed to.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole (Mr. HOSKINS in the chair) and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3819) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House all general debate has been limited to five minutes.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with.

No objection was made.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I now ask that the bill be read by paragraphs for amendment.

The Clerk began the reading of the bill, and read the following:

For pay of commissioned and warrant officers at sea, on shore, on special service, and of those on the retired list and unemployed, (and for expenses and transportation of officers traveling under orders,) and for pay of the petty officers, seamen, ordinary seamen, landsmen, and boys, including men of the engineers' force, and for the Coast-Survey service, eighty-five hundred men, $6,250,000.

Mr. RANDALL. I want to ask the gentleman from Maine a general question in regard to this naval appropriation bill. It is whether there is any fund derived from the sale of materials or vessels or from any other source which the Navy Department has now in its own hands and which can be drawn upon separate from the appropriations which we make? The gentleman, I think, will understand the purpose of my question.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Not a dollar, as I understand it. There was a provision made in one of the appropriation bills within the last two or three years, authorizing the Secretary to sell old vessels and useless materials. But it was also provided that the proceeds of those sales should all be paid into the Treasury, so that wherever any sales are made of old vessels, of property or material, by the Navy Department, the money is at once turned into the Treasury, and, as I believe, the Secretary of the Navy has no more control over it than other Departmental officers.

Mr. RANDALL. I was induced to make this inquiry, because I knew the fact that the Navy Department has in years past been the recipient of large sums of money from the sale of material and vessels and from other sources. The gentleman will remember that for the year ending June, 1871, the appropriations were $19,000,000, at least not $20,000,000, for the Navy Department; I have the exact figures here; while for the years thereafter we have continued to increase the appropriations until for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, they ran up to $31,000,000. Now, if my memory serves me aright, but $22,000,000 were appropriated for the year ending the 30th of June next. Now, my object in this inquiry was to ascertain whether there is any source from which the Navy Department derives revenue, unknown to the appropriation bill.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I see exactly what the gentleman is driving at. I will give the explanation. The report of the Secretary of the Treasury shows that the expenditure of the Navy Department for the year previous to last July was, as the gentleman states, about $30,000,000. That is explained in this way. The regular naval appropriation bill covering that year appropriated $19,000,000; but into that year there went as additional expenditures the extraordinary item of $3,000,000 for the construction of sloops of war, $4,000,000 for an emergency fund, $1,000,000 extra for iron-clad monitors, and all the appropriations for the navy-yards, making the aggregate nearly or quite $30,000,000 for that year. But the gentleman will see that that was an exceptional year, these extraordinary funds being put into the hands of the Navy Department for special emergencies.

I am glad the gentleman has called attention to this matter, because when I first saw that statement in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury it struck me there must be some mistake. But on inquiry—in fact without inquiry—on reflection, I saw how it was.

Mr. RANDALL. Then as to the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, there is no reason to believe that anything beyond what is actually appropriated in this bill is to be expended by the Navy Department?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I do not know, of course, what the future may bring forth; but so far as I can say now, and so far as the committee were informed, there is nothing to justify the belief that there will be any emergency or anything requiring any extraordinary appropriation.

Mr. GARFIELD. Of course the navy-yards come in another bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I understand that. But I wanted to see whether there is to be a reduction on the expenditures of years past.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Certainly, a very marked reduction, as during the progress of the bill I will explain.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I wish to ask my colleague [Mr. HALE, of Maine] what is the condition of the sloops of war he spoke of. Are they finished?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. They are nearly finished and ready for sea; it is expected that by the opening of spring they will all be ready to be put afloat.

Mr. BECK. Mr. Chairman, I rise to make an amendment pro forma for the purpose of asking a question. Not having been able to see the reports, (which are not in,) I desire to know how many men have been employed in the Navy during the last year. In answer to a resolution that I offered last spring, the Secretary of the Navy informed us that he had enlisted fifteen hundred additional men, and application was made to Congress for the passage of an enactment authorizing such increase. That law never was passed; but the men were enlisted, and they have been employed in the Navy, I presume. I see, however, that this bill provides only for eighty-five hundred men. I desire to know (and this is one reason I wished to see the report) how long ten thousand men were employed, and by what authority they were kept in the Navy, when Congress had refused to pass a bill increasing the number from eighty-five hundred to ten thousand.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The gentleman knows that in military establishments the force is naturally reduced at quite a rapid rate by the expiration of terms of service. This applies of course to the naval establishment as well as to the Army. The Secretary of the Navy, under the pressure of the emergency a year ago, when war was threatened with Spain, did enlist nearly fifteen hundred men in addition to the regular force, trusting to an appropriation of Congress for their payment and for the sanction of the increase. He frankly stated that under the emergency he had gone forward and spent more money than was regularly under his control and had enlisted these men. Congress did sanction his action, as the gentleman will remember, so far as to provide funds for the payment of those men; but it declined, and I think wisely, to embody in the act any authority for a permanent increase of the force. As soon as that result became known the Secretary ceased to make new enlistments; he discharged men as fast as possible, and reduced the force down to the regular number provided by law—eighty-five hundred men. During nearly all of the past year there have been but eighty-five hundred men in the service of the Government; and there is only that number now. Therefore the Secretary estimates only for the regular establishment, eighty-five hundred.

Mr. BECK. That is all I desired to know on this point.

For contingent expenses of the Navy Department, $100,000.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I move to amend the clause just read by striking out "$100,000" and inserting "$50,000." I make this motion for the purpose of stating that I believe this contingent fund, or a portion of it, is used to thwart the action of Congress.

The records will show, and many men on this floor will remember, that at the last session of the Forty-second Congress an act was passed cutting off certain sinecure offices in the different navy-yards—that of receiver of, and that of clerk of accounts.

My predecessor (Mr. Lynch) at that time on this floor asserted, as he had done before, that these were sinecure offices; that the receiver at the Kittery navy-yard in particular did nothing but receive his pay; that the Secretary of the Navy himself knew they were sinecure offices, and had discharged the incumbents; but was obliged to fill the position of receiver again at Kittery on account of the political pressure which was brought to bear on him. It was also stated by Mr. Lynch that he expected that at the other end of the Capitol there would be a pressure brought to bear to have these officers retained. He was not disappointed. They did not succeed, however, and the places were abolished.

The appropriation for these sinecure places expired in July, 1873; but a short time before the expiration of that appropriation I learned that the receiver to whom my predecessor stated it was robbery to pay money out of the Treasury of the United States for doing nothing was about again to be appointed to a similar position. I wrote to the Secretary of the Navy, referring him to the action of Congress and the statements which were then made, telling him that I believed them to be true, and protesting in the most respectful manner, but earnestly, against his appointing any man to any such position in the district I have the honor to represent. Then came the worst of the whole. I repeat what the commodore told me and others at the time. He said that the Secretary of the Navy came to him and requested him to write a note to him, the Secretary, asking that the man be appointed as inspector. He said that he protested against it; that he advised the Secretary of the Navy of the uselessness of the position, and of the pernicious example it would be to the yard itself. The Secretary of the Navy appealed to their long friendship, and gave him two days to consider the matter. The honest gentleman, the commodore, said that he had the hardest struggle for two days he ever had in his life between his duty to his country and his friendship, and that the politician succeeded; that he was beat; his hands were clean. The appointment was made in the face of and in spite of the action of Congress. The man is paid on a pay-roll by himself, probably from this contingent fund.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I consider this not only an insult to me, but an insult to every member of this House and to every member of Congress. And why is it that he is so persistently quartered upon my district year after year? For the benefit of my democratic friends I will say that it is no new seed planted by the republican party. It is rather a gnarled old oak, grown to its full stature in democratic soil. This henchman and chief have traveled together thirty years or more. It is due to every man on this floor, due to his self-respect, that he should stand by me in the position which I have taken, and which was taken before by my predecessor, if he would stand up for the rights of his district, the law, and economy in public expenditures.

I send to the Clerk's desk the time that this sinecurist remained on the yard each day for twelve days, which shows that he was on the yard about twenty-five minutes each day. He goes on at mail-time to get the news. The time was kept by the detective on the yard.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. My colleague has been finding out for the past two years how uncomfortable a thing it is to have a navy-yard in one's own district. I do not envy any man upon this floor who has a navy-yard in his district. It will always be a source of trouble and disappointment to him. I am sorry he has had an encounter with the politicians he speaks of, whoever they may be, and that he has not had his way. I have no doubt his way was the good way and the right way, but I appeal to the committee that here is not the place to settle difficulties which arise in the administration of navy-yards as to the disposition of patronage. How the fact that my colleague has been ill-treated, as he says he has—and I am bound to believe it when he says so—affects the contingent fund of the navy-yard, I cannot see. It is a fund that has been appropriated every year.

Mr. BURLEIGH. This man was put upon a separate pay-roll and paid by himself for that year.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I do not know how he was paid; but in considering this bill for the support of the Navy, we certainly have nothing to do with the quarrels of politicians in reference to the men who should go into the navy-yard. Quite likely my colleague has cause of complaint, but this contingent fund of the Navy Department is one which for years has been given for many various purposes in the running of the navy-yards. It is for rent and furniture of buildings and offices not in the navy-yards; for expenses of courts-martial and courts of inquiry—I have the bill of particulars before me; for boards of investigation; examining boards; clerks and witness fees; traveling expenses; stationery expenses and purchasing paymasters' stores at various cities. I think the committee will not call upon me to go through with the particularization any further. The list goes through all things essential in the running of the Department.

Why my colleague moves to reduce this appropriation $50,000 because a man was put in over his head in his navy-yard who ought not to have been put there, I cannot see. As to this fund and the disposition of it, if there is any question as to how it has been expended I am ready to answer.

Mr. RANDALL. Does the gentleman from Maine have the report of the contingent expenditures?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Reports have been sent in of the contingent expenditures of the Department and have not yet been printed. Knowing that to be the fact, I took the precaution to have a special copy made for my convenience, because I knew I should be asked if there had been no report made of the contingent expenditures. So I had the details all made up and have them here at hand; items as low as twenty-five cents being shown.

Mr. RANDALL. But the trouble is that we have not before us the information necessary to enable us to ask questions about these expenditures. We have not the facts before us. There is a material point suggested by the statement of the gentleman from Maine, and it is this: Whether after the Congress of the United States has declared that certain officers of the navy-yard heretofore provided by law are no longer necessary, the Secretary of the Navy notwithstanding that action of Congress has continued those officers and paid them from the contingent fund. Now that we do not know, unless we have this report. This morning I sent for the report of the expenditures of the contingent fund of the Navy Department, and I was informed that it had not been received from the printer. Therefore I cannot say whether these gentlemen have been retained in violation of the wishes of Congress and paid from the contingent fund or not. Can the gentleman from Maine tell?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I cannot tell. I can only say this as to the civil force in the navy-yards, that by a very wise provision, as I think, Congress cut down the civil force in all of the yards 47 per cent., and I know that from that time the Secretary of War has faithfully set himself to put into operation that provision of the appropriation bill. It was a thing, of course, that gave him a great deal of trouble, because he was besieged on all hands to retain men. Nearly half of them had to go out and he had to select who should be retained. I know this about it, that the Secretary has stated, and I believe him, that he has followed out faithfully the directions of Congress and has only expended for this force the amount that Congress appropriated for the different yards, and this year I have only put in the bill the same amounts that we gave last year. Now, I do not know who is in, and I do not know who is out. I do not know the name of a man affected by the provision of the bill of last year. The members of the committee are not called upon to give the names of men. That is not our duty under this bill. It is a matter of administration; and who were retained I do not know.

Mr. BECK. I move to amend the amendment by making the amount $40,000.

I move to reduce the contingent expenses of this Department as I expect to move to reduce the expenses of most of the others, because I think that all the expenditures of all the Departments ought to be appropriated for specifically and the contingencies made as small as possible. I understand those contingencies to cover such things as are not specifically enumerated. We are now appropriating specifically for everything we can think of; and I was informed the other day, when I asked the question, that, contrary to the habit heretofore, the present Secretary of the Treasury is now requiring that the money we appropriate shall be applied to the specific objects for which we appropriated it, which is certainly a great step toward securing economy.

I have looked into these contingent expenses very often, and I have had made out—how accurately I do not know, but by a very careful man, who seems to be very well informed—a statement of the contingent expenses of the several Departments, which I send to the desk to have inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks, so that their accuracy can be tested. It appears that in the Department of State the contingent expenses amount to $466 for each person employed. In the Interior Department they amount to $458 for each person employed; in the Department of Justice they amount to $600 for each person employed, and so on. It is true that they are smaller in the Army Department and the Navy Department than in the others.

I am wholly unable to see how such amounts of money can be expended or that they ought to be expended for contingencies. These contingent expenses ought to be cut down, and the amounts specifically appropriated and their expenditure accounted for specifically, as is now required by the Secretary of the Treasury, according to what the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations told us the other day.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I desire to ask my friend from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] if there is any relation between the amount of contingent funds in the several Departments and the number of the employés in those Departments. The gentleman seems to be instituting a comparison, and I ask for information whether there can be any possible relation of the employés to the amount of the contingent funds expended in the several Departments?

Mr. BECK. If I am correctly advised, there ought to be. I understand that this contingent fund covers stationery, ink, paper, &c., and various outside services. There are a large number of persons who have to be supplied with articles of stationery, &c., and there are rooms to be swept and labor to be done, and hundreds of things of those smaller items which I understand we cannot enumerate in an appropriation bill. They are too small to be taken notice of in that way.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I supposed there was provision made for printing for the Department, and that the expenses on that account would not form a part of the contingent fund.

Mr. BECK. I understand——

Mr. ELDREDGE. I do not suppose the articles the gentleman refers to compose all the articles for which this contingent fund is expended. I cannot even now see what relation there can be between the amount expended and the number of employés in the several Departments.

Mr. BECK. The statement I furnish merely gives the amount of contingent fund allowed to each Department or Bureau, together with the number of employés and the amount of the funds for each employé.

Mr. KELLOGG. Are all of the contingent expenses of the Departments expended upon the employés?

Mr. BECK. I do not know.

Mr. KELLOGG. The gentleman should find out.

Mr. BECK. I am trying to find out.

Mr. ELDREDGE. If the gentleman knows what these expenses are——

Mr. BECK. I do not.

The following is the paper referred to by Mr. BECK:

Memorandum showing the relative amounts appropriated for the contingent expenses of the several Departments in Washington.

Department.	No. of persons.	Amount.	Per capita.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD as a portion of my remarks the time-table of the sinecure in the navy-yard to which I have referred, as kept by a detective.

The paper is as follows:

M. F. Wentworth's time at the Kittery navy-yard.

October 20. Not in the yard.	October 28. From 11.45 to to 12.30.
21. From 11 to 11.15.	29. Not in the yard.
22. From 10 to 10.15.	30. From 10 to 11.
23. From 10.30 to 11.45.	31. From 9.30 to 12.*
24. Not in the yard.	November 1. Not in the yard.
25. Don't know.	3. From 10.30 to 11.
27. Not in the yard.

* This is the day of discharge.

Mr. BECK. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] has at his desk a copy of the expenses under this contingent fund; perhaps he can answer the question whether, so far as he can see, any of the employés have been paid out of that fund?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I can find nothing of that kind.

The question was upon the motion of Mr. BURLEIGH to reduce the contingent fund from $100,000 to $50,000.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Before that vote is taken I wish to say that I hope the committee will not cut down the amount here appropriated. It covers very important services. Within the last two years we have cut this item down from $125,000 to $100,000, and the Committee on Appropriations do not believe that we should go further than we have done. Gentlemen will see that the fund at the disposal of the Secretary for the whole uses of the Navy, scattered all over the waters of the globe, must certainly be drawn upon in a great many ways. The Secretary in this case desired a larger fund, but the committee thought it best to keep it at $100,000.

The question was taken upon the motion of Mr. BURLEIGH; and on a division there were—ayes 21, noes 24; no quorum voting.

Mr. BECK. I think we ought to have tellers; that is too small a number to act upon so important a bill as this.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HALE, of Maine, and Mr. BECK were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were ayes 37, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. COX. I move to strike out the last word with a view only to say this: The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] has not had his troubles allayed or his grievance remitted by his motion. There is a sort of impartiality on the part of the Navy Department that knows no party on this subject. I would suggest to him to put in a proviso to this clause to this effect: Provided that the expenditures shall be made in conformity to law. Perhaps that may pass. I tried one of these provisos last year; but it did not pass because it came from the wrong side of the House. I hope my friend will try it on his side of the House. I withdraw my amendment.

The Clerk read the following:

For the civil establishment at the various navy-yards and stations, the sum of $158,000.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I would inquire of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] why this appropriation in this clause is not set out in detail, as it was in the bill of last year?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. There was appropriated for the different navy-yards last year a certain amount to each yard. The Secretary of the Navy found that in some cases he could get along with less money than Congress gave him for particular yards, while for other yards he needed more. The only way in which we fixed the matter last year was to take the whole force, then cut it down, and keep the proportion the same for the different yards. Of course that was striking somewhat blindly. When the Secretary put the provision into operation he found that in some yards the force had been allowed to grow up till it was too large, and much more in excess in some yards than in others. Therefore, when we came to make up this bill he suggested that, while we did not increase the amount, it should be given to him in gross, so that he could assign it as he thought best. I thought that a good suggestion, and so drew up the bill.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I can understand how it may turn out as a matter of theory, that when appropriations in specific items are inserted, as they were in the bill of last year, they should not be exactly what they ought to be; that more was appropriated for the civil establishments of some navy-yards than was actually required by the service and less for other yards. But I cannot understand why, if the Secretary has found that out, (and I understand from the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] that he has,) he is not able to report here just what will be required during the next fiscal year for each one of these yards. If he has ascertained that, for instance, there was too much appropriated last year for the navy-yard at Charlestown, Massachusetts, and too little for the one at Brooklyn, New York, then he should be able to specify how much too much for the one and how much too little for the other.

It so happens that the amount in gross which is recommended this year is just the same as last year, or within a few dollars. I suppose it was intended to be the same in gross amount. Therefore, coming to that estimate, it would seem that we last year hit the exact amount as to all of the yards, but did not correctly specify the amounts for the particular yards. Now, it is, I think, tolerably well settled by this time that the better way is to have these appropriations specific so far as possible. As little as possible should be left to the discretion of the officer having charge of the disbursement. Otherwise we might make our annual appropriation for the naval establishment $17,000,000 in gross, leaving that amount for the Secretary of the Navy to dispose of as he saw fit. To what extent we shall go into details is, of course, a matter of discretion and of sound policy. But we did go into detail on this subject last year; and I understand that the only criticism upon the action we then took is that in some respects the amounts fixed were not the amounts that ought to have been fixed. Now, that could easily enough have been remedied this year. The amount could have been fixed, as it should have been, for each navy-yard; and then it would not have been left to the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy or some subordinate officer (and as likely as not the matter is regulated by the discretion of some subordinate) to expend twice as much as the amount appropriated for some of these yards and not half as much for some others; in other words, to exercise a degree of favoritism (if the Secretary or any subordinate officer should desire to do so) for the benefit of any locality or against any locality.

Of course I am not prepared to offer an amendment, because any amendment ought to meet the very point the gentleman suggests. If the amount appropriated in any particular cases last year was not right, then those appropriations should be corrected this year. Hence I cannot offer any amendment to meet the case; but I desire to enter my objection to this method of returning again to these general appropriations after we have once attempted to make them specific.

Mr. ARCHER. I move pro forma to amend by striking out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, we stand to-day in a most humiliating position, considering the high ground we have taken, first in proclaiming the Monroe doctrine, second in claiming exemption from the right of search, on which matter we went to war with England in 1812, and assert that we are ready to do so against Spain should she interfere with vessels bearing our flag. At this moment we are without suitable ships, without guns, and without men to man the few vessels we have; and only by accident have we been saved from a humiliating war, in which the people of the United States would have been greatly disappointed in the results. Everybody has been led to believe that we had one hundred and sixty-nine ships of war, when we have really thirty-two sea-worthy steamers and eight iron-clads. With these our officers are expected to contend against a navy fitted with all the modern improvements, having eight or ten heavy sea-going iron-clads, fourteen or fifteen large and swift frigates, besides four or five very heavy sea-going iron-clads rapidly advancing to completion. And here arises a difficulty we must always experience in cases of sudden emergency. No doubt in the course of a great war, when all our commerce was laid up, we would ultimately be able to man a number of ships, not with such seamen as are required for immediate action, but with material that could be worked into shape in the course of three or four months.

An army, as has been demonstrated time after time, can be improvised almost immediately from the rawest material. It is merely teaching men to load and fire a musket and drill, and maneuver in companies and regiments. This can be fairly learned in two weeks, although of course it takes time to make a perfect soldier. But it requires months of constant drill to enable a ship of war to be prepared to hold her own in action against the well-drilled and well-maneuvered war-vessels of the present day.

Congress allows the Navy but eighty-five hundred seamen, which many suppose are all employed at sea, but a large portion are necessarily stationed in receiving-ships, store-ships, school-ships, transports, navy-yard tugs, &c., and but a small force is left to man the vessels actually employed in active service. Many of our ships abroad are sixty men short, and few of them have their proper complement. Can any one expect a frigate of four hundred men to contend successfully with one of five hundred? Common sense would convince any one of the absurdity of this.

In all these matters, as we seem to have no originality, we must adopt the ideas of foreigners, at least those whose defeats have taught them the necessity of perfect system in organizing their navies.

We have had some remarkable successes against great odds. In 1812 we obtained advantage over England with our handful of frigates, because she was then neglecting the very matter that we are neglecting now, in not educating seamen expressly for the naval service, and it was not until the navy of France under the late emperor had reached a point of excellence it never before attained, that the English determined to reorganize their system and educate their own seamen. The apprentice system was established, and now all the ships of the British navy are manned with native seamen, from whom are made up the ordinary seamen, seamen, seamen gunners, and petty officers. The English have at present in commission thirty-four vessels devoted to the purpose of naval training, including twelve ships of the line for training apprentices, eight tenders to the same, four large ships for gunners' practice, and nine ships and one tender for coast-guard drill, and it is now proposed to extend this system to the North American colonies, where England has a reserve of eighty thousand seamen.

From these facts it will be seen how little attention we have paid to matters of so much importance. When we fit out a ship, men are picked up haphazard at different naval rendezvous, at least 50 per cent. being foreigners with little or no interest in the country or devotion to the flag and ready at the first favorable opportunity to desert. A ship going to sea in a hurry, manned by such a heterogeneous mob, without sufficient time to properly station her men or instruct them in their duties, would fall an easy prey to an enemy's vessel of much inferior size. The frigate Colorado was not long since taken from the row of vessels, laid up a sheer hulk, and fifteen days afterward she sailed fully manned and armed for Cuban waters. Her crew only went on board four days before she sailed, and no country could reasonably expect a ship to fight under such circumstances and not disgrace her flag.

The best officers in the Navy could not even work the men into their places, much less instruct them in the art of loading, aiming, and firing in the short space of time allowed the crew. The crew of a vessel would not know their places and would be a mere target for a well-drilled enemy's shot.

We keep constantly at sea thirty-four vessels, or just about the number of training-ships alone in the British navy, while she maintains in commission on foreign and home stations two hundred vessels of all classes. The thirty-four United States ships are scattered all over the globe, never more than six being allotted to one station. These six vessels are again scattered so that they seldom if ever come together in one squadron.

How are officers to perfect themselves in fleet sailing and battle formations under such circumstances; and what chance would they have of contending with a well-drilled force of foreign ships, for now almost all sea fighting will be done in order of battle? What chance would a regiment of soldiers composed of companies hastily brought together without previous training stand in a contest with a well-drilled force of equal numbers? And yet it is much more important that ships should be thoroughly trained in fleet tactics before attempting to give battle to an enemy's squadron.

Fleets are nowadays maneuvered in battle under steam as troops are upon land, and a single false move would throw a whole line into confusion and make the ships an easy prey to an enemy. The British, French, Russians, and all other people of any naval pretensions, except the Americans, have large practice squadrons constantly employed in drilling officers and men. The British Channel fleet is composed of twenty-five of their heaviest iron-clads, which are kept so constantly in motion that all maneuvers are like clock-work. In this way a thorough knowledge of the art of war is gained by officers and men throughout the service, and ships can join any squadron and at once take their place in line and perform the duty required of them. The same may be said of French and Russians. And what kind of ships do we give our officers and men to fight with? A style of vessels that have been ruled out of the line of battle by every other naval power, and which would not withstand the shock of battle on the ocean for fifteen minutes.

What chance would our old wooden frigates that cannot steam more than six knots an hour stand against the heavy iron-clads of European navies? Suppose a line of battle formed of ships like ours, and an enemy of half their number, heavy iron-clads and powerful rams, with a speed of twelve knots, were to come down upon them, breaking the line to pieces and crushing every vessel with which they came in contact, what chance would there be of success for the old wooden vessels; and what is the use of sending such ships to sea when their officers know that defeat is certain in case they have to encounter the new style of vessel?

We lay great stress on our "iron-clad monitors," as they are called, which really only admonish us of our weakness. Those vessels were built solely for harbor defense and smooth water, and they rely on their light draughts, which enables them to run into shoal water and avoid the crushing power of a ram, such as all foreign ships carry, but in a sea-way they are almost helpless. They cannot raise their turrets to train their guns, for the water would rush in and sink them; they cannot maneuver to avoid an enemy, for they have no speed. Their guns are good enough of their kind, but have no range; and though all the rest of the world has adopted the rifle up to the 35-ton gun, we have nothing of the kind in our Navy beyond some 100-pounders, which proved worthless during the late war, doing more damage to friends, by bursting, than they ever did the enemy.

We have then, it would seem, in our Navy nothing on which to depend except the officers, who are well educated in the art of war, and have shown in the past what they will do in the future, even against great odds. But is it fair to send these men to fight the battles of the nation and expect them to win when they have nothing on which to depend?

We are not accustomed to defeat; and in case of disaster during a foreign war our naval officers would be sacrificed to public opinion, and the blame that would fall on them should fall on Congress, whose duty it is to see that the Navy is in condition to meet any demands made upon it. At present our Navy will do to redress grievances against the small South American Republics, which have neither forts nor ships, or will answer to protect our missionaries among the South Pacific Islands, but in other quarters of the world its appearance is only a confession of our weakness.

Foreigners see the same old ships bearing the United States flag that they have been looking at for the last twenty years, with no advance toward the improvements of the present day. And when foreign officers come over here to examine our monitors, they write home that they are not up to the improved type. If foreigners have imitated them in any way, they have avoided their defects and constructed better vessels. There is no evil, however, for which there is not a remedy, and it may be asked what it is proposed to do?

Since 1790 we have expended $1,379,450,000 and have not now in the Navy a single ship that can be called a proper fighting vessel of war, although we have about thirty-eight that would do good service in destroying an enemy's commerce, although not fit to go into battle against vessels of the new type. During the same period Great Britain has built fifty-four heavy iron-clads, besides adding to her navy a large number of superior cruising-ships, and has kept in commission two hundred vessels of various classes since 1861 at an expense of $490,000,000, exceeding our expenditures since that time by $50,000,000, but having the most effective navy in the world to show for it.

Our system of naval administration provides for a civilian as Secretary of the Navy and eight Bureaus, with line officers at the head of four of them, and a surgeon, paymaster, constructor, and engineer at the head of the other four, all acting by authority of the Secretary. Previous to the establishment of the Bureaus the affairs of the Navy were managed by the Secretary and a "board of Navy Commissioners," composed of three line officers of the highest rank, with whom was associated a naval constructor of the first ability. When this board was abolished in 1842 the Navy then on hand was acknowledged to be the best for its size in the world, and its personnel and discipline were unequaled. From the day the board was abolished the Navy commenced to retrograde, and the harmony and unity of action which characterized the operations of the board seem not to exist in the present bureau system.

The great mistake in the reorganization of the Navy Department was in not retaining the board of commissioners to plan, with the Bureaus to execute.

At present the Bureaus may be likened to a balky team, without a professional head to guide them. One man plans and executes in his own department without responsibility to any one, and carries out his individual ideas, which may or may not be good ones. For instance, a constructor plans a ship, and an engineer plans an engine for her without regard to the opinion of the constructor.

The Chief of Ordnance may plan a battery much heavier than entered into the constructor's calculations, and there being no harmony in the different plans, the ship may be a failure.

While the Chiefs of Bureaus can exercise the most arbitrary power under the shield of the Secretary's authority, the inferior positions of chiefs of navy-yards and stations, over which they exercise control, have hitherto been filled by officers of high rank and experience, who entered the Navy long before the chiefs of Bureaus. In granting authority to the head of the Navy Department to appoint Bureau officers, the law authorized him to descend even to the list of commanders to find the person supposed best suited to the position. The object of this law was to enable the Department (in 1862) to ignore the older and more experienced officers and appoint those whom the Secretary of the Navy could easily control, and during the greater part of Secretary Welles's administration a civilian ruled the Bureaus with an iron hand and committed innumerable professional blunders at a cost to the country of many millions.

How different is the British navy department, which is composed of—First, a civilian, member of Parliament, occupying somewhat the position of our Secretary of the Navy; second, an admiral; third, a captain; fourth, a rear-admiral, (comptroller of the navy;) fifth, an earl, House of Peers; sixth, first secretary; seventh, second secretary. These are styled "the commissioners for executing the office of lord high admiral of England," &c. Under their direction is the secretary of the admiralty, contract and purchase department, department of comptroller of the navy, superintendent of naval stores, department of director of transports, hydrographic department, department of the accountant general, department of the medical director general, department of the director of engineering and architectural works, director of education for admiralty, royal observatory at Greenwich.

These latter offices assimilate to our Bureaus, but are subject to the supervision of the professional and mixed board which stands at the head of the list; and to this circumstance may be attributed the success of the British in maintaining a very large navy at little greater expense than we keep up a small one. Take away the board of admiralty, even with its defects, and the same difficulties would be experienced as in our case. A less efficient system would prevail, and the expenses of the British navy would be doubled. The first lord of the admiralty can appear on the floor of Parliament and make all necessary explanations regarding the navy and meet all attacks of the opposition. It was doubtless originally intended that our Secretary of the Navy should exercise similar powers, but Congress only extended that privilege to the Secretary of the Treasury, who, by the law of 1789, is authorized to appear on the floor of Congress and explain his acts or requirements.

The French navy department is composed as follows:

Minister of marine, (admiral.)

STAFF.

One captain of ship of the line, aid-de-camp; one lieutenant of ship of the line, aid-de-camp; one lieutenant of ship of the line, aid-de-camp; one lieutenant of ship of the line, aid-de-camp.

MEMBERS OF COUNCIL OF ADMIRALTY.

One minister of marine and of the colonies, (admiral,) president of council; two vice-admirals; two rear-admirals; one inspector-general of construction, (genie;) one commissary-general; one secretary, (commissary.)

Colleagues.

Two captains of ship of the line.
First bureau of cabinet, inspection of marine.
Second bureau of cabinet, naval operations afloat.

SECOND DIVISION.

Personnel of the navy.

One rear-admiral, (director;) one sub-director in charge enlistment bureau.
First bureau.—Staff of ships afloat in commission: One captain of ship of the line, chief.
Second bureau.—Maintenance of crews and other duties: One chief.
Third bureau.—Equipment and maritime justice: One chief.
Fourth bureau.—Sub-director of the marine corps.

THIRD DIVISION OF DUTIES.

Administrative services.—Commissioner-general of marine, (director:) One captain of ship of the line.
First bureau.—Maritime inspection and police of navigation: One chief.
Second bureau.—Fisheries and maritime domains: Sub-director.
Pay, clothing, and musters.
Third bureau.—Subsistence, hospitals, and galley-slaves.

FOURTH DIVISION OF DUTIES.

Direction of naval construction: Director.
First bureau.—Engineer of the first class: Sub-constructor in charge of bureau.
Second bureau.—Hydraulic works: Engineer of bridges and highways.
Third bureau.—General supplies: Commissary of marine sub-director of bureau.

FIFTH DIVISION OF DUTIES

Artillery of the navy and the colonies.
First bureau.—General of division of marine.
Second bureau.—Plans and works: Colonel of marine artillery.

SIXTH DIVISION OF DUTIES.

Colonies: One director.
First bureau.—General administration: One chief.
Second bureau.—Interior administration: One chief.
Third bureau.—Justice: Penitentiary, one chief.
Fourth bureau.—Finance, hospital, and pensions: One chief.

SEVENTH DIVISION OF DUTIES.

General accountability.—Counselor of state, director.
First bureau.—One chief of surveys of harbors and decrees of law.
Second bureau.—One chief of disbursements at sea.
Third bureau.—One chief (sub-director) of accountability of surveys
Fourth bureau.—One chief of accountability of material.
Fifth bureau.—One chief of interior service of libraries.
Sixth bureau.—One chief of preservation of archives.

From the above it will appear that the system of naval administration in England and France assimilates somewhat with our own, although with a better subdivision of labor. Indeed, our Navy Department was modeled on the plan of the two above mentioned, although it has now come somewhat to the condition of the play of Hamlet with the part of the Prince of Denmark omitted. Had the board of commissioners been retained under the law of 1842, to direct the Bureaus on naval affairs proper, we should have had as good a system as could be desired, with a little better subdivision of labor.

In all European navies professional men supervise naval affairs, notwithstanding there may be a civilian at the head of the department directing its political and financial management. Compare the results with those obtained under our system and note the difference.

We have not an efficient ship of war of the new style; we have no rifled guns that are worth anything; our enlistment system is the poorest in the world; we have not a marine-engine in the Navy that can propel a ship nine knots, with the exception of that in the Florida, which takes up the whole interior of the vessel.

Our medical and commissary departments are fair for the size of our Navy, but up to 1870 the Bureau of Provisions and Clothing continued to serve out shoddy raiment and bad food to the sailors in defiance of the protest of the board of inspection.

The detailing of officers for duty is imposed on the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation, who has already onerous duties to perform and has to bear the odium of ordering senior officers to positions not acceptable to them, which orders should emanate from a higher source. Of course the Secretary of the Navy is consulted about the appointment of higher officers, but the duty of detail should devolve on officers of higher grade, who would be familiar with the character of all those in the Navy, and from whose decision there should be no appeal, as there is at present. Yet it is not so much the fault of individuals as it is of the system. If a civilian were to be put in command of a ship of war, with ever so reliable officers to assist him, she would be a very indifferent ship of war; or if a naval officer were to be put at the head of the judiciary, it must be a very poor judiciary. "Every one to his trade" is an axiom no one will dispute.

To make the Navy what it should be the board of naval commissioners should be re-established, under any name that may be thought advisable, and clothed with the duties proposed for the board of survey, a bill to establish which once passed the Senate, viz, "to advise and assist the Secretary of the Navy"—

1. To detail officers.
2. To have charge of the Naval Academy.
3. To draw up rules and regulations for ships, yards, and stations, subject to Secretary's approval.
4. To examine plans of ships, steam-engines, and public works.
5. To examine and approve all contracts.
6. To make annually a full report to the Secretary of the Navy of the condition of the service, with necessary recommendations for its support and improvement.
7. To examine and correct the allowance-books from time to time.
8. To reorganize the apprentice and enlistment system.
9. To visit and examine the navy-yards annually or oftener, if necessary.
10. To examine the evidence in courts-martial.
11. To make the necessary alterations in ordnance, equipments, navigation supplies, and clothing from time to time, and to report from time to time to the Secretary of the Navy such matters as come under their observation for the improvement of the Navy.

When such a board of officers is established, and not before, will we have an efficient Navy like that required by a nation of forty million people, with a constantly-increasing commerce and an immense extent of coast open to the inroads of any ordinary naval power. The three senior line officers on the active list should be the members of the proposed board, of which the Secretary of the Navy should be ex officio president, the senior officer acting as president in the absence of the head of the Department and signing all reports made to him.

There should be three associates, namely: a naval constructor, an engineer, and an officer with the rank of captain, the last-named to be the secretary of the board. When this is done, the Navy will require nothing more for years in the way of naval administration.

The best feature in the organization of our Navy is the Naval Academy, which theoretically possesses all the requisites for turning out accomplished officers. It has, however, important defects, which would be remedied when the proper naval organization was established. Here the young cadet is taught everything relating to his profession, and is imbued with proper ideas of discipline and the respect due his superiors. When he graduates from the Academy, he is presumed to have the ground-work of a naval education, only waiting for an opportunity to put in practice the theories he has learned. But what is the poor youngster's disappointment when he comes in contact with the real service. He finds himself on board a ship which he has been taught to believe unfit for fighting purposes and which his reason tells him is the case. He finds the crew, whom he had expected to see perfect specimens of American tars, a heterogeneous mob of men of different countries, the native element not being sufficient to indicate the nationality of the ship. The wholesome laws established by Congress to maintain discipline he finds so curtailed by departmental authority that offenses are often committed with impunity. Perhaps his captain is an inefficient officer, who has for years indulged in drinking to excess, and who has been passed to his present position by an examining board unable to find anything "on record" against a person notorious throughout the Navy as having disgraced it for years. Our youngster finds the discipline bad, the officers with no heart in their duties, the guns not suited to cope with the improved ordnance of foreign navies, the crew, without distinctive uniform, clothed in shoddy. Executive and other officers have been ordered to the ship without regard to their efficiency, and the only things to distinguish the vessel as an American man-of-war are the officers and the flag at the peak.

This is hardly an overdrawn picture of some of our ships of war when first fitted for sea; for it is on board of such vessels that young officers, the future commanders of our ships and fleets, receive their first impressions of active service. Their after experience is little better. There is no system of instruction for young officers to compel them to put in practice what they have learned at the academy, and what they acquire in after life must be due to their native energy and love of knowledge. It is not uncommon when midshipmen are ordered to their final examination on their return from a cruise that two out of seven fail from ignorance of the practical part of their profession. So the thing is carried on from grade to grade until that of rear-admiral is reached, and the occupant is often incapable of properly performing his duties.

All this is for the want of a naval head to look after matters. A civilian Secretary of the Navy, no matter how clever, cannot be expected to understand in four years the details of a service which it costs an officer a life time to master. The Secretary of the Navy, being the member of a party and of a political turn of mind, naturally directs his chief attention to the political status of the Navy, to the neglect of some matters with which he is little or not at all familiar, and the Navy Department being considered an inferior office in the Cabinet, is regarded as a stepping-stone for something better. But few of the men who have held the position of Secretary of the Navy have comprehended the wants of the service even after an experience of eight years, the longest period any one has held the office. They have all committed great mistakes on first assuming office for want of a competent advisory board to assist them in the performance of their delicate duties.

Some Secretaries have endeavored to form an advisory board by assembling the Chiefs of Bureaus together and listening to their opinions. But these gentlemen are naturally in favor of anything emanating from their own Departments.

Here, then, you have a complete account of the Navy, with its defects, requirements, and a plan for its reorganization; and he who can introduce and perfect a system that will make the discordant elements now ruling the Navy work in harmony will reap a well-deserved reputation, and will have performed a distinguished service for his country. Before closing I will add a few remarks in relation to the yearly appropriations made for the Navy, to show that they are amply sufficient if judiciously applied.

Mr. Chairman, the great leak in the administration of the navy-yards of the country arises from a vicious system that has grown up, not confined, I am sorry to say, to the republican party alone, but which was practiced even in the days of democratic rule—a system of turning the navy-yards into political machines about the time of elections. Now, the fact of the matter is that one or two months before an election the navy-yards are crowded, not with mechanics, but with all kinds of broken-down politicians, who go there to draw their per diem until the day of the election, when they are expected faithfully to vote the party ticket.

Mr. O'NEILL. As the gentleman speaks with such confidence, I would like to ask him whether he has ever been in a navy-yard as inspector, and has ascertained what kind of men are employed there?

Mr. ARCHER. I have been, perhaps, as much about the navy-yards as the gentleman himself. Although I have no yard in my district, my long service on the Naval Committee has made me familiar with the workings of navy-yards during the last eight years; and my knowledge of their history induces me to say that the remark applied to democratic rule as well as republican.

Mr. O'NEILL. I merely wanted to ascertain whether the gentleman had ever visited navy-yards at times when he could judge as to what kind of men were employed there.

Mr. ARCHER. If I had been in the gentleman's district in Philadelphia I think, from all I have heard, and heard from reliable sources, that I could have reported very many men employed there on the gentleman's recommendation who were mechanics of very low grade.

Mr. O'NEILL. I would like to know on what authority the gentleman makes that statement; for I undertake to say in reference to the employment of men in the Philadelphia navy-yard now, and at all times under republican administration, that none but skilled mechanics have been put in the shops where mechanical work was done, and none but able-bodied laboring men have been put in the laboring departments; and they have done their work to the satisfaction of the officers who employed them.

Mr. RANDALL. How about the employment of Jerseymen?

Mr. O'NEILL. I have nothing to say about Jerseymen. I have no doubt that if men were brought from New Jersey to do this work, they were men fit for the positions.

Mr. ARCHER. I did not intend that that any remarks of mine should drift into a partisan discussion with regard to the navy-yards and the Navy; and I was particular to qualify my remark by saying that the evil had existed under democratic as well as republican administration; and this evil, Mr. Chairman, never will be remedied until this Congress shall pass a law limiting the number of employés in the navy-yards. Whatever party may be in power will use these navy-yards as political engines; but whenever Congress will pass a law of that kind, we shall have a regular set of skilled mechanics in the navy-yards of this country from one end of the year to the other. If the peace establishment could be once ordered by Congress the number of laborers allowed to the navy-yards should be as follows:

	Mechanics.
New York or Brooklyn	1,000
Boston	800
Philadelphia	800
Norfolk	800
Washington	600
Portsmouth, New Hampshire	600
Pensacola	300
Making all told	4,900

These, at an average of three dollars a day per man, would amount to $1,542,300 per annum. This, including the amount called for to support the civil establishments of the navy-yards, would be $4,880,300; add $1,000,000 for material in Construction and Engineer Department, and we have $5,880,300 for labor and timber. Ordnance and torpedo corps should be cut down to $500,000 yearly for gradual increase and improvements in artillery; coal, hemp, and equipments to $1,100,000; hydrographic work to $110,000. We should buy our charts. Provisions and clothing should be cut down to $1,438,000, for the clothing is returned to the Government as the sailors pay for it; contingent expenses of various Bureaus, &c., should be reduced to $1,000,000, and the various expenditures mentioned in the appropriation. Each Bureau should put down for every thing required and have no such general contingent. Printing and binding should be cut down to $50,000. There is great waste in these items. Then the appropriations for the Navy would stand thus:

Pay or officers and seamen	$6,400,000
Pay of civil establishments, navy-yards	338,000
Ordnance and torpedo corps	500,000
Coal, hemp, and equipments	1,100,000
Navigation supplies	134,000
Hydrographic work	110,000
Naval Observatory, Nautical Almanac, &c	64,000
Repairs and preservation of vessels	3,000,000
Steam-machinery tools, &c	2,000,000
Timber, &c	1,000,000
Provisions	1,400,000
Repairs of hospitals, &c	40,000
Surgeons' necessaries	40,000
Contingent expenses of various departments	1,000,000
Naval Academy	193,458
Marine Corps	1,177,311
Printing and binding	50,000
Naval Asylum (Philadelphia)	51,650
Total	18,598,419

The difference between this sum and the amount called for in 1873 is $1,558,328, which could be applied to the gradual increase of the Navy for iron-clads, and in ten years would build us seven large vessels of this class, capable of carrying the heaviest guns.

In all these calculations, I have made large allowances for pay of mechanics, and have provided for twice as many as would be employed in private yards to do the same work. The great leakage, in fact, is our navy-yards, where no man does more than two-thirds of a day's work, and in times of political excitement men are crammed into the yard simply for the purpose of carrying an election! This custom will continue until the master-workmen are borne on the Navy Register as warrant officers, hold their appointments during good behavior, and are subject to court-martial.

If Congress would appropriate besides this, $2,000,000 annually for some years, for the gradual increase of the Navy, and specify that it is for the construction of iron-clad vessels of not less than three thousand tons, we would in a few years have as good a navy as could (for ordinary purposes) be desired. We can never compete with France and England in iron-clad ships, and must depend upon perfecting the torpedo for means to keep the navies of those powers out of our harbors.

In all my remarks I desire to reflect upon no person, and only find fault with a system under which the Navy can never prosper, no matter how clever may be those who administer its affairs. In this opinion I am upheld by every officer of the Navy, excepting perhaps the few who occupy the positions referred to, and it would be hardly natural to expect them to acknowledge the present system wrong, fearing to reflect upon themselves, although in reality they are not to blame, as they doubtless make the most of their positions.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I move to strike out the last word in the section. I wish to make a statement to this House, and perhaps the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. ARCHER] can give me some information on the subject, as he is a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs. In the Mare Island navy-yard, in the district which I represent, during the election times there have been from twenty-five hundred to three thousand men employed. Just prior to the election in 1872 nearly three thousand men were employed, but during the past year there have not been more than from seven hundred to one thousand, certainly not exceeding a thousand, employed on Mare Island. Large numbers of men were discharged the day after election. Yet, sir, our naval vessels are rotting for lack of repairs. They are left upon the stocks without anything being done in the way of repairing them; and yet good honest mechanics, who are anxious for work, are allowed to remain idle. Good mechanics, residents of Vallejo or Mare Island navy-yard, have been driven from their homes to seek employment, for political purposes; honest workingmen, honest mechanics, men who served the country during the late war, are refused employment, and why? Because they have chosen to exercise the right of the elective franchise in their own way, on their conviction of what was right and proper, they have been driven from their homes at Mare Island to seek employment elsewhere. Perhaps the gentleman can tell us why we have not had our share of the appropriation for Mare Island as usual.

Mr. COX. There is no election there this year.

Mr. LUTTRELL. But we will have one there next year. I am informed by one of the leading men of Mare Island that they expect to have three thousand men employed next year. Now, sir, I would not appoint a man for political reasons alone, but I would select good mechanics. I have recommended many men to be employed there, but in no instance have I recommended a democrat in preference to a republican; but I have recommended good mechanics of all parties, because I believe honest mechanics should have this employment at all times. I tell you that at Mare Island men who have been covered with scars received in defense of the flag of their country have been driven from their homes and their homes are closed to-day in Vallejo and their places filled by politicians, and why? Because they saw fit to vote as honest freemen, just as their conscience dictated. Let us have no more of it; and I wish to say to the democrats on this floor, that if in the next Congress they attempt to exercise any such power, namely, to force men to vote against their honest convictions as the republicans have done, I for one shall be unwilling any longer to vote the democratic ticket upon any such foundation of oppression and wrong. I never will vote for any party which will attempt to compel honest workingmen, honest mechanics, to vote against their conviction. Such has been the action of republicans at Mare Island, in my district, and I can prove it. I hope the democrats will remember this, and never tolerate for a moment the turning out of any man because he happens to vote against them. I am in favor of a first-class navy, and will vote for the bill under consideration.

Mr. Chairman, hundreds of men were employed in the navy-yard at Mare Island for political purposes, and I know of hundreds that were refused employment in 1872 for political reasons. Hundreds were compelled to walk in line and vote what was called the tape-worm ticket, a ticket so small that it was impossible to scratch or add a name to it; and any man refusing to vote as directed was discharged; and, so far as I am individually concerned, I will never support any man or party guilty of such oppression. Fellow-democrats, let us work for the rights of the people, the workingmen of our country, leaving them to exercise the sacred right of the elective franchise in accordance with their own judgment. And if we but prove faithful to our pledges and the country, the people will prove true to the democratic party.

Mr. RANDALL. Now, Mr. Chairman, as we are on this item of contingencies, I would like to say just one word.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. We have passed from the contingent fund of the Navy Department, and are now upon the civil establishment.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to direct attention to this bill, so far as contingent funds are provided for its various Bureaus. We have in this bill nine contingent funds provided for. We appropriate a contingent fund for the Department proper, $100,000; for the Bureau of Navigation, $6,000; for the Ordinance Bureau, $1,000; for Equipment and Recruiting, $75,000; Yards and Docks, $40,000; Medicine and Surgery, $25,000; for the Bureau of Provision and Clothing, $50,000; for the Naval Academy, $36,000; and for the Marine Corps, $15,000; making in the aggregate for these nine items $348,000. I especially ask the attention of the gentleman from Maine to this aggregate amount appropriated for contingencies in this bill.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Let me say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that if he will look back he will find that twelve years ago the aggregate of this appropriation was $800,000, instead of $348,000 asked for in this bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I am glad we have succeeded in reducing these contingent funds from $800,000 to $348,000, and what I now hope is that the reduction will not stop here but go still further. Gentlemen cannot be unaware of the fact that in these very contingent appropriations lies the cause of the evil of which we all complain. I suggest to the gentleman from Maine, who has charge of this bill, that these very contingent items shall be so modified that we may know particularly for what items the money is to be expended. In some cases the items are specified, but in others cases the appropriation is made in a lump to the contingent fund without particularizing the items. I am ready to co-operate with the gentleman in reducing these contingent expenses to the very lowest possible point. If in twelve years we have reduced them from $800,000 to $348,000, I do not see why they cannot be farther reduced without doing any injustice to the service. It is in these contingent appropriations we find the gross abuses which have crept into the management of the naval service. They are the fruitful cause of those irregularities of which gentlemen complain.

Mr. LUTTRELL withdrew his amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For drawing, engraving, and printing and photolithographing charts, correcting old plates, preparing and publishing sailing directions, and other hydrographic information; and for making charts, including those of the Pacific coast, $60,000.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to strike out "sixty" and insert "thirty" in order to give the gentleman from Maine opportunity to explain why this item is double what it was last year. We then appropriated $30,000 for this purpose, and why should we appropriate now $60,000 for the same purpose?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. We have put together in this bill what were two items in the bill of last year.

Mr. RANDALL. I think not. I have both before me. For this purpose we appropriated last year $30,000, and this year we are asked to appropriate $60,000.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. We have put together two items of last year's bill in one item this year. In the bill of last year the items were as follows:

For drawing, engraving, and printing and photolithographing charts, electrotyping and correcting old plates, preparing and publishing sailing directions, and other hydrographic information, $20,000; and for making charts, including those of the Pacific coast, $30,000.

Mr. RANDALL. I see that the gentleman is right as to the two items being put together; but there is still an increase of $10,000.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. But the amount is not doubled.

Mr. RANDALL. I withdraw that remark, and ask the gentleman to explain the reason for the increase.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I will state the reason for the increase in this item. And I may say that there are very few items of the bill in which there is an increase. There are constant calls received from the Pacific coast for the extension of these surveys. All that has been done has been done under these appropriations, and in making up the bill we found that such was the need to our commerce and navigation of this appropriation that we were willing to put it at this sum. There have been wrecks there within the past year, and much property destroyed that might have been saved if more of the information had been given which is furnished under this service. The amount of property that would have been saved would have more than trebled or quadrupled this cost. It is in the interest of our merchant marine. It may be a question how much we should appropriate. I would not be in favor of an extravagant appropriation, but I do not think this is an extravagant appropriation; it is only an increase of $10,000.

Mr. RANDALL. I presume it is hardly likely that any abuse can creep in there. I withdraw my amendment.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For reducing the observations of the transit of Venus, $2,000.

Mr. MONROE. For the purpose of obtaining an explanation from my friend from Maine in regard to this appropriation, I move to strike out the paragraph. I make this motion because, as I now remember, a special commission was appointed to take charge of this whole work of making the observations in regard to the transit of Venus, and also, as I suppose, of making the calculations based upon those observations. My understanding was that a special appropriation was to be made for all the expenses which that commission would incur, and I supposed they would do this work of making the calculations. I do not understand why the Naval Observatory should have an appropriation for this purpose.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The appropriation that was made does not complete the work. We made a special appropriation for an expedition under the charge of the Naval Department, and sent out vessels to different parts of the world upon this scientific expedition. Now, all that is of any use in the observations of the expedition must be brought here to the Navy Department and to the Naval Observatory, which is the organ of the Navy Department for this subject-matter. The results of these two expeditions are taken there and the observations are there reduced. And I have no doubt that hereafter—I will state for the information of the gentleman from Ohio, so as to give him notice—we will be called to make a further appropriation for the Naval Observatory for preparing the reports they may wish to make. I do not know to what extent such further appropriation may be required; but if the work were to cease now, with the observations of the expedition merely, it would be of no account whatever; nobody would ever get any benefit whatever from the results of that expedition.

Mr. MONROE. I think the gentleman does not quite understand my point. The gentleman cannot surpass me in his appreciation of the importance of having those calculations properly made; but I supposed that reducing those observations would be a work that must be done at any rate under the authority of the commission, and that there was a special appropriation for that purpose.

If the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] will assure us that there is to be no other appropriation for reducing these observations except this one, then I do not know that I will make much objection to this item.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I cannot say that. I have not scientific knowledge enough on this subject-matter to say that this $2,000 will be sufficient. I can say, however, that in the opinion of the officers at the Observatory this $2,000 will answer the purpose for this year.

Mr. MONROE. But is there no danger of two sets of men working at the same thing, each on a different appropriation?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I have no fear of that at all.

Mr. GARFIELD. The language of the section of the law making an appropriation for the expedition was that they were to take the observations; and they have gone to distant points at considerable expense to take those observations. They merely took the astronomical and photographic observations on the day of the transit, and under their orders they come immediately home as fast as they possibly can. All the mathematical tables are in the Department here, and so are the computers who will reduce the observations, which of course cannot be so well done away at the distant posts of observation.

All the nations that have sent abroad expeditions are now competing which shall first bring out the results of the respective expeditions. So far as heard from, the observations have been very successful, and the Naval Department are waiting with great anxiety to receive here the observations of the expedition, so that the computers may be set to work.

I myself think that the Committee on Appropriations have made a mistake in not giving the whole sum that was asked for this purpose, viz, $3,000, instead of $2,000. And since an amendment has been offered, I will move to make it $3,000, in accordance with the estimate.

Mr. MONROE. I will withdraw my amendment with the understanding that there is to be but one set of men at work. I make no point on the amount.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. So far as I am concerned I will accept the amendment moved by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

The question was taken upon the amendment moved by Mr. GARFIELD; and it was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following under the head of "Bureau of Ordnance:"

For miscellaneous items, $5,000.

Mr. RANDALL. I notice that a few words which were in the last naval appropriation bill have been dropped out of this: "For freight, express charges, and purchase of instruments." I suggest that they be incorporated here after the words "miscellaneous items."

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I have no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting:

For equipment of vessels: For coal for steamers' and ships' use, including expenses of transportation; storage, labor, hemp, wire, and other materials for the manufacture of rope; hides, cordage, canvas, leather; iron for manufacture of cables, anchors, and galleys; condensing and boat-detaching apparatus; cables, anchors, furniture, hose, bake-ovens, and cooking-stoves; life-rafts; heating-apparatus for receiving-ships; and for the payment of labor in equipping vessels, and manufacture of articles in the several navy-yards, $1,250,000.

Mr. RANDALL. Here is an increase of $185,000. I would like to have it explained.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. This is the only item of increase in the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman explain it.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Certainly, I will. Under the emergency appropriation of last year—that is, under the action of the Secretary in fitting up the fleet so as to be in condition to meet war if it came upon us—there was a more heavy draft made upon this Bureau than on any other, in proportion to the appropriations made for the several Bureaus. In looking over the needs of this year the Secretary believed, as also did the committee, that this was the only place in the whole bill where an increase was necessary. The Secretary showed the committee that he was running more snugly in his use of the appropriations than any other Department. He runs his Department upon the theory that there shall be no deficiencies.

Mr. RANDALL. Is not the explanation this: that the expenses have been incurred, and we must meet them?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. We must meet them.

The committee rose informally, and Mr. CESSNA took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing, from the President of the United States, was communicated to the House, by Mr. BABCOCK, his Private Secretary, who informed the House that the President had approved and signed the following bills and joint resolution:

An act (H. R. No. 3188) granting a pension to Letta Bagley;

An act (H. R. No. 3339) relating to the disposition of certain lands to be reclaimed in sections 14, 23, and 26, in township 16 north, of range 20, in the county of Sheboygan, in the State of Wisconsin; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 119) to continue the board of audit to examine and audit the unfunded or floating debt of the District of Columbia.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session, and proceeded with the consideration of the naval appropriation bill. The following was read:

Bureau of Construction and Repair:

For preservation of vessels on the stocks and in ordinary; purchase of materials and stores of all kinds; labor in navy-yards and on foreign stations; preservation of materials; purchase of tools; wear, tear, and repair of vessels afloat, and for general care and protection of the Navy in the line of construction and repair; incidental expenses, namely, advertising and foreign postages, $3,300,000.

For salaries of sub-agents and watchmen and miscellaneous expenses incurred in the protection of timber-lands, $5,000.

Bureau of Steam-Engineering:

For repairs and preservation of boilers and machinery on naval vessels; and for fitting, repair, and preservation of yard machinery and tools; and for labor in navy-yards and stations not before included; and for incidental expenses; and for purchase and preservation of oils, coal, iron, and all materials and stores; and for completing and erecting on board vessels compound engines with boilers, $1,800,000.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of making some remarks on this bill. It will be noticed that the portion of this bill relating to the Bureau of Construction and Repair is included in twelve lines. Last year that portion of the bill embraced one hundred lines. Has the Navy Department become so much more honest that we can trust it further than heretofore? I maintain that the abbreviation of that portion of the bill is in the interest of contractors. We to-day have a Secretary of the Navy; good, honest, intelligent officers in the Navy; constructors and skilled mechanics to lay out the work in the navy-yards and oversee it; skilled laborers, ready to work, men that have learned their trade in the navy-yards, and of superior skill—a perfect organization. But as an appendage, for a tail I may say, we have the contractors. The trouble is that the contractors are winding around the whole body.

On this I have a little story to tell, and now is the right time to tell it. Last winter a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs received a letter from a contractor at the Kittery navy-yard, claiming that a constructor from another yard and the head of a Bureau had received many presents of different kinds from contractors; that he paid them $6,000 for their influence with the Navy Department to buy a timber-bending machine of him, now in Boston. The letter was withdrawn during the recess by request of the party sending it, and acknowledgment made that they were not right when the first letter was sent. The first contract by this Mr. Griffeths was to complete the new sloop of war building at Portsmouth. During the recess he receives an extra $4,000 for completing her and $2,000 for launching her—a ship of six hundred tons—with all the facilities of the yard at his command, and he says there was a mistake in his sending the letter; and now what is the result? The man had contracted to complete the ship. At first he gets four prices to launch her; he gets $4,000 to complete the ship again; and now he has a contract, as I understand it, under which they agree to give him $25,000 to go on with her, and he does not agree in that contract to complete the ship; he does not seem to be bound to do anything but have money.

I maintain that the whole abbreviation of this portion of the bill, the leaving out the items, is in the interest of contractors. In the Kittery navy-yard, now practically closed, only one carpenter and two laborers are at work in construction, where they let this ship out; there my sinecure man is, and his brothers, four of them, receiving twenty dollars a day, or about that sum, besides other sinecures and clerks that are receiving large sums, with foremen and leaders. The laboring men are turned out of the yard, when the organization of the Bureau of Construction alone, one of the seven Bureaus, costs $5,000 per month, because there is no money for them—and new men outside get contracts, and work the cheapest men they can; and this sinecure man and his henchman, with others, are staying there under full pay, drawing their pay from the Government, and the hardest work they have to do is to go to the yard and come away again. This thing has been carried on there until the management of the yard, in the face of promises of retrenchment and reform of the party by the party, has become a stench in the nostrils of all good men in the vicinity.

Now, sir, I have said what I want to say about this bill. I mean to try to clean my own domicile and be ready for the next tenant. I understand that the House does not sustain me in what I have said; it did not on the other proposition; but I predict that the time will come when members will find out, as I believe I have found out; what the contraction from a hundred lines to one paragraph of twelve lines in this part of the bill, calling for so much money, is for.

I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. CREAMER. Mr. Chairman, I renew the amendment. One of my colleagues [Mr. TREMAIN] enlightened and entertained the House yesterday by quoting from a New York paper, the Sun, an attack made upon him; and he pointed out to us the fact that no matter how conscientious or how devoted a Representative may be in the discharge of his duties, he is constantly misrepresented and maligned by newspapers of the country. If that gentleman were in his seat at this time, I would like to call his attention to the reason why Representatives are constantly misrepresented by the papers of the country.

Sir, the administration of the Navy Department, since the present Secretary took office, has certainly, from the facts given to us from time to time by the newspapers, been the most corrupt, the most imbecile, and most contemptible in the history of the Government; and I would assure my friend from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] who fathers this bill and who was so careful yesterday about his reputation as regards his vote on the Pacific Mail steamship subsidy, that if he continues to father such measures as this—a bill appropriating $16,000,000—without having the papers here before us, the data showing how these items are made up, he will soon lose the glory that he achieved here at the last session by his shrieking for the reduction of the pay of members.

Sir, I contend that this Department, above all other Departments of the Government, needs investigation. It has done more to bring the Government and the republican party into contempt in the minds of intelligent men throughout this country than any other branch of the Government. I know whereof I speak when I charge that no such spectacle ever was presented in the history of the country as was witnessed here a year ago when simply on a scare of a war with Spain a fund of millions was voted to be used at the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, this great admiral and great sailor, who has achieved so many brilliant results in the excursions he has made, out of the contingent expenses appropriated here, to Fortress Monroe and elsewhere, with the assistance of many valorous members of Congress. I know whereof I speak when I say that this Secretary is the companion daily and nightly of contractors and jobbers, who make millions a year out of the Government of our country—who are swindling us constantly, swindling the Government, swindling the Treasury.

Look at the spectacle presented at the last election. I differ from my friend from Maryland [Mr. ARCHER] when he states that the same abuses now existing prevailed in the days of democratic rule. I deny that. I refer now to the employment of men at navy-yards upon the approach of elections. We have had men employed at election-time, (I speak now of the navy-yard at Brooklyn,) we have had men employed previous to elections, for election purposes; but never before in the history of the Government, at least so far as our section is concerned, were men—I was going to say imported—never before were men sent from New Jersey to New York from the district of a gentleman whom I now do not see upon the floor, but who entertains us very often with his views on the currency, and who I am very sorry to say was not re-elected, as I recognize in him a man of ability and integrity, whose services will be very much missed here. Notwithstanding the efforts of his friend the Secretary of the Navy in importing men from districts in New Jersey to the Brooklyn navy-yard previous to the last election, that gentleman failed to secure a re-election. And I would like to call the attention of a gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. GOOCH,] whom I do not see in his seat, to the fact that even the republican papers of the city of Boston denounce the outrageous system that prevailed at the Charlestown navy-yard, where men to the number of fifteen hundred were employed two months before the election and discharged upon the very opening of winter, immediately after the election was over.

Now, sir, I do not speak as a partisan in this matter. Gentlemen complain that their actions here are misrepresented by the press of the country. Now, this Secretary and his administration have been charged time and again with the greatest abuses, the most corrupt practices; and no investigation has ever taken place. How, then, can you complain when the newspapers assail you? I insist, Mr. Chairman, that this bill should lie over until we have a detailed statement of the items of which these appropriations are made up, and that this House is not responding to the voice of the people, as expressed at the last elections, in passing a bill of this character and magnitude at this time in such a hasty way.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad that the gentleman from New York [Mr. CREAMER] has had the opportunity to deliver his scold. We had almost completed the bill. Nothing that has been said here has any pertinence to the part of the bill that is now before us, or in fact to any part. It is nothing except what we have listened to somewhat before this session; that is, general, sweeping, irresponsible, outright statements of fraud, theft, and here is added imbecility. I tell the gentleman from New York that if, instead of scolding the Navy Department, he will look into its records for the past five years, under the administration of the present Secretary, he will find that the money which has been appropriated by Congress has been better expended, there is more to be seen for it, than at any other time in the history of the Navy Department. The American Navy to-day, with appropriations constantly decreasing for five years, is in better condition than it ever was before. It has good ships, in good trim, well manned, well officered. There have been new ships built, there have been old ships repaired, and considerable money has been expended; and when the gentleman talks about fraud and about base conduct on the part of the head of the Navy Department, I defy him to produce anything which shall back up his statements or fix a stain upon the head of that Department.

Mr. CREAMER. Does the gentleman deny the statement about the Charlestown navy-yard? Let him answer whether he denies that.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Yes, I do; but I am coming to that by and by.

The gentleman says that the Secretary of the Navy has been allowed to run loose and never has been investigated. Why, sir, this charge of his is as wrong as the rest. The Secretary of the Navy went through a thorough and complete investigation years ago on this very subject of contracts on a motion coming from a gentleman then upon the floor of this House, a prolonged investigation resulting in his complete acquittal. I have never heard since that day anybody else here upon this floor who has ventured to stand up and make such charges as the gentleman has made. I tell him and the House that the charges are not true; that he has no ground for them; that they are false, and he has no right or authority to make them.

He says that the Navy is the most corrupt, wicked, and imbecile Department of the Government; that there has never been anything like it in American history to shock our people. I am not fond of going over old party records. I have been trying to run this bill in a business manner, and I have not sought to bring up party records. But, sir, it does not lie in the gentleman's mouth to come here representing the democratic party in New York City, and talk about the Departments of the General Government shocking the sentiments of the people. It does not lie in his mouth to call up any record of that kind. He knows, he cannot have forgotten, that within the last five years he has had in his own city a spectacle of fraud and corruption in the city government, under the old administration of Tweed, in his own party—such a spectacle of fraud and corruption that the world never saw its like. And the worst of it is that to-day nobody knows how far it extended.

I am told, upon good authority, that papers showing money stolen from the treasury of New York City by Tweed and his associates are still coming in, representing hundreds of thousands of dollars, so that nobody knows the bottom of the pit, if, indeed, it be not bottomless. These are things in the gentleman's own party that he will do well to scrutinize instead of standing up here on an appropriation bill and making vague, formless charges against the head of this Navy Department.

Now, one word about the navy-yards. I am very glad the gentleman has referred to this matter of putting on force in the navy-yards before elections, because I have heard that mentioned before, and have armed myself with the facts showing to what extent the force has been put on in view of the late elections. There is the pinch, and that is what suggested the attack of the gentleman. I have the record of the entire force in several of the large navy-yards of the Government for the years 1874, 1873, and 1856, for I thought it worth while to go back to the pure days of democratic administration to see in what numbers men were found working in navy-yards just before elections. I will state before giving the figures that the number of men the Secretary of the Navy has put on in the present year in the months before the election is smaller than even I supposed it was. There were in the navy-yard in New York in the month of September, 1874, 1,061 men, and in October, 1,309; in all, 2,370 men. A year ago, when there was no election, when there was nothing to call out any extra display of force, the New York yard had in October 1,740, and in September 1,741 men, or in all 1,111 more a year ago than during the same months this year.

Mr. ARCHER. A year ago was the time when we supposed we would have trouble with Cuba.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. No, that had not come; that was not dreamed of; there was not a cloud in the sky, and of course that was not the reason. Now let us go back to New York and take the year 1856.

Mr. SCHUMAKER, of New York. Will the gentleman allow me to make a single remark?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I would rather proceed with my statement.

Mr. SCHUMAKER, of New York. I merely desire to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that any comparison of the figures with reference to the number of employés in the navy-yards in years which were not presidential election years is unfair. If the gentleman will take the numbers for 1872 and 1868, the years of the presidential elections, then the comparison would be fair.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. That is just what I am coming to. Let us see how many men in 1856, a presidential year, were in the New York navy-yard in September and October. In September there were 1,556, and in October 1,628, making in all 3,284 men in those two months—934 men more than were put on in 1874, with all this influx from New Jersey that the gentleman talks about; and, by the way, if the Secretary of the Navy sent men for the election from New Jersey to New York, all I can say is that in running the New Jersey campaign he was not bright.

Now I want to follow the figures right along. Take Philadelphia. How many do the committee suppose were in the employment of the Philadelphia navy-yard in October of this year, the month of the election? There were 661 men. How many do they suppose in October of last year? Ten hundred and fifty men. How many do they suppose were there under the democratic administration in 1856, the year of the presidential election when the republicans almost carried Pennsylvania, and, as they always believed, were counted out of the vote? Nine hundred and fifty-six men, or 294 more than were in the navy-yard in the month of October of this year. How was it at Norfolk? In the last election in 1874, in October, there were 1,666 men. Last year there were 1,541 men. But in 1856, in the corresponding month, when appropriations were smaller for the Navy, there were 1,926. And so it is with all of the yards.

Mr. SCHUMAKER, of New York. Will the gentleman tell us how many there were in 1872 and in 1868?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I have not got here the figures for those years.

Mr. SCHUMAKER, of New York. Those statements are intended to deceive this House. The gentleman states what is not true.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I am stating the truth.

Mr. SCHUMAKER, of New York. It is a very unfair statement, and the gentleman knows it. He should take the presidential elections if he intends to treat this House fairly.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I have taken the year 1856.

Mr. SCHUMAKER, of New York. You must take 1872 and 1868 to make a fair statement. It is too thin altogether.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I have taken this year, a congressional election year. I do not wonder that the gentleman is nervous.

Mr. SCHUMAKER, of New York. There is nothing nervous about me; but when a gentleman has a reputation for candor and fairness, I hate to see him deceived and attempting to perpetrate a fraud upon this House.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I have taken this year because it is the year of a congressional election; I have taken last year for a comparison because it was not a congressional election year, that the House might see that the Secretary of the Navy has not because of a congressional election increased the force over and above the force in a year when there was no special election. Then I have gone beyond that, and taken the year of the presidential election, 1856, eighteen years ago, and shown what were the forces in the navy-yards at that time. I care little about these old things. But as the question has been raised by vague charges, and as the newspapers have been full of statements that the Secretary had piled in men by hundreds and thousands to corrupt the suffrage and carry the election, I have thought it right to show that they are false from the top to the bottom. There is no truth in any such charge, and whoever makes the charge without having made any investigation makes it ignorantly, and whoever makes it with investigation makes the charge falsely.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the amendment is exhausted.

Mr. CREAMER. I withdraw my amendment, and move to strike out the paragraph for the purpose of saying a few words.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires at this point to say that he has allowed this debate to run over the five minutes allowed by the rule. Hereafter the Chair will find himself compelled to enforce strictly the five-minute rule.

Mr. RANDALL. The Chair will remember that we have had no general debate on this bill; therefore some latitude should be given.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would also remind the gentleman from Pennsylvania that by order of the House all general debate on the bill was limited to five minutes. That of course does not affect the operation of the five-minute rule.

Mr. CREAMER. I do not see what the affairs of the city of New York have got to do with this question. The gentleman from Maine seeks to place me in a false position upon this question. He has referred to Tweed. Why, sir, I fought Tweed when he was in power in the New York State Legislature and in the city of New York at elections; and I opposed him when he ran the republican party of the State of New York more easily than he did the democratic party. The curse was that with Tweed the republicans and democrats went in together for plunder. The plundering of the treasury of the city of New York which occurred there, and which placed Tweed on Blackwell's Island, was through a board of supervisors made up of six republicans and six democrats.

I think that a great many of these contractors to whom I have referred, and who hover around this Capitol in daily consultation with the Secretary of the Navy, are democrats. That makes no difference. I fought Tweed when he was in power. Now that he is down I do not believe in hounding him any further. I believe some reference has been made to those who have followed him since he has lost power. The gentleman from Maine stands here defending the Secretary of the Navy. I charge that the appropriation of $5,000,000 made a year ago was one of the greatest frauds ever perpetrated upon the American people, and if you were to take a microscope to-day and examine the entire Navy, you could not see where a dollar of it has gone.

The gentleman from Maine can gain no reputation by standing up here and endeavoring to force through at this time a bill of this character. So far as the employment of men in the navy-yards is concerned, that amounts to nothing. I would not care if they should employ ten thousand or fifty thousand men in the Brooklyn and Boston navy-yards, particularly at a time like this. But do not employ them on the eve of an election and then discharge them all when the election is over. I believe with the gentleman from California [Mr. LUTTRELL] that a time like this is the time when men should be employed. The time to reduce your force is not when millions of men are discharged from all the manufactories and industries of the country. The time to employ men is a time like this. And I will vote for the largest sum to equip and fit out our Navy if it can be honestly and properly done.

So far as the best information I can obtain goes, the same class of men who have been jobbing here for years under all administrations seem to have absolute control of the Navy Department. Your Secretary of the Navy has been charged by the public press with fraud and corruption, and the acts have been specified. I say that when a Cabinet officer is assailed, and he is so far indifferent to the voice of the press and the people as never even to ask for an investigation, you cannot complain when Representatives are assailed or members of this House misrepresented and charged with being corrupt. I simply speak as an American citizen, not as a democrat or a republican. I say it has a tendency to bring our Government into contempt to have the Secretary of the Navy, or any other official high in office repeatedly challenged to come forth and demand an investigation and he fails to do it.

This bill is made up of items that should be investigated, particularly when charges are made against this Department. As I have previously said, so far as men being employed in the navy-yards is concerned that makes no difference. The gentleman dodges the question entirely; he does not come up and answer these charges. Why not have the Secretary of the Navy come here and ask for an investigation, instead of coming here as he did a year ago, running from desk to desk and from member to member, lobbying a bill through appropriating $5,000,000 on a scare of war with Spain?

The President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury, right in the midst of the greatest financial panic that ever occurred in this country, were asked to issue $10,000,000 of the reserve then in the Treasury, for the sake of stopping the panic, as it would have done. But the President shook his head and said "No; there is no law for it." But the Secretary of the Navy on his own volition could go on and expend $5,000,000 without the shadow of right or law. That is my answer to the gentleman from Maine. I am sorry to see a gentleman with the reputation that he has championing a measure of this kind, endeavoring to whitewash the Navy Department, misrepresenting the facts stated by my friend from Brooklyn [Mr. SCHUMAKER] as regards the items of which this bill is made up.

Mr. GOOCH. I agree with the gentleman who has this bill in charge, that any man who has a navy-yard in his district is to be pitied. I know that statement will be assented to by every gentleman here who is so unfortunate as to represent a navy-yard district, not even excepting my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] whom I see before me.

Some suggestions have been made by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. ARCHER] which I think worthy of consideration. One is that the navy-yards should be conducted in such manner as to employ as nearly as possible a uniform number of men. I know that it is an impossibility always to employ the same force, as it must vary at times with the exigencies of the service. But the fact is that wherever there is a navy-yard men crowd into that locality and find themselves homes there, and they are constantly anxious to secure employment within the yard. When business is dull in private establishments, then men from other localities also press for employment in the yard, and claim that no one set of men should be constantly employed by the Government to the exclusion of all others. And the fact that the force in the yards is so constantly changing keeps men waiting in the expectation that their chance for employment will come.

Reference has been made to the navy-yard in my own district, and it has been stated that there was an increase of men there this year prior to the election. It is true that there was such increase; and the record as cited by the gentleman from Maine shows that there has been an increase of employés as a rule about the time of an election throughout all the navy-yards in the country under all administrations.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. If the gentleman will allow me, I will give the record as to the Boston navy-yard, which I did not give before.

Mr. GOOCH. I was about to call on the gentleman for it.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. In September, 1874, 1,209 were employed; in October of the same year, 1,750; in all, 2,959. In September, 1873, 1,741 men were employed; in October, 1873, 1,740 men; in all, 3,481—522 more than in 1874.

Mr. SPEER. Where does the gentleman get that record?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. It was made up in the Navy Department.

Mr. SPEER. Made up by the Secretary or his clerks.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Yes, sir.

Mr. GOOCH. I wish to say that there was a special reason for the employment of laboring men in the Charlestown navy-yard. It is well known that the Government had used up during the war all the live-oak timber that it had accumulated, and that it has been obliged to use in the construction of vessels material wholly unfit for the purpose, and that to-day we are finding vessels which should be in a serviceable condition entirely rotten in consequence of the use of improper timber. For this reason, as I am informed, the Government has been stocking its yards with live-oak timber to be laid aside and protected and kept until such time as there may be a demand for its use. In order to protect this timber it must be either housed or docked. At the Charlestown yard the Navy Department entertained the idea of putting its timber into a wet-dock; but finding itself unable to accomplish that, it then determined to protect this timber by piling it up and covering it in such a manner as best could be done. And, sir, the season being late, and the time when that timber should be protected having come, I understand that the authorities increased the force at the navy-yard in Boston for that purpose.

So that while I do not claim that the Charlestown yard is an exception to the rule which is admitted by all to have obtained at all yards pending an election, no matter which party has been in power, still I say there should have been an increase at that time for the purpose which I have stated.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CHITTENDEN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CREAMER,] in alluding to the corruptions of the Brooklyn navy-yard, has led me to recall certain facts in regard to it which, especially as I have the honor to represent a district in Brooklyn, seem to require me to say something in reference thereto.

I am not here to apologize for anything that has ever been done or omitted at the Brooklyn navy-yard. I have been taught to feel and I know that it has been a sink of political corruption for many years; and although I am elected from a district closely allied, I have the honor and the pleasure to say that I was elected wholly independent of it; and there is no man outside or inside of it that pretends to have any special claim upon me whatsoever.

In respect to the last election I do not believe that all the remarks of the gentleman from New York as to the corruption of the Brooklyn navy-yard apply. I know that it has but about five hundred men employed. When the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. ARCHER] said that in a time of peace one thousand men would be in his opinion a proper proportion for the New York navy-yard, I felt like suggesting to him that great injustice is done at the present moment to that yard. But the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] has explained the number employed there in October. I have no doubt at all that many of them were put there to carry the election. I say, here, upon my responsibility as a member, that I have been informed that a disreputable person obtained letters (I presume by fraud of some sort) from several members of the present Cabinet, recommending him or designed to assist him in obtaining the congressional nomination at the election at which I had the honor to be elected. But he did not succeed in his purpose. I have reason to believe that he placed many men in the Brooklyn navy-yard at that time; but I have no positive knowledge. They are not there now. And there stands upon the stocks one of the ten sloops of war voted here last year, rotting for want of covering, and nobody to cover it. There is no work going on there except the repair of the Tennessee. For this reason, in this connection, I wish to add my voice in favor of some further explanations in respect to the items under consideration. If I correctly understand the appropriations here proposed for the Bureau of Construction and Repair, if I understand the language of that section, it substantially places, in half a dozen lines, at the control of the Secretary of the Navy $3,300,000. If there is anything definite in that section it is this:

For the preservation of materials; purchase of tools; wear, tear, and repair of vessels afloat, and for general care and protection of the Navy in the line of construction and repair.

I would like the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] to tell me if that clause does not place in the power of the Secretary of the Navy $3,300,000 to expend or not as he may elect; whether it is not in his power to reconstruct and rebuild a monitor now on the stocks of the Brooklyn navy-yard which has rotted away before boilers and turrets designed and built for it were put into it; and whether under that clause the Secretary of the Navy has not the power to adopt a new plan for hull for the same turrets and engines? There is another clause, under the head of "Bureau of Steam Engineering," for "incidental expenses; and for purchase and preservation of oils, coal, iron, and all materials and stores; and for completing and erecting on board vessels compound engines with boilers, $1,800,000."

Now, I undertake to say under that clause the Secretary of the Navy may clearly in his discretion adopt a plan which has been sent to me since I was elected a member of this body, suggesting a grand iron ship to be constructed in which are to be put the turrets and the engines which were built for a wooden ship now on the stocks and rotting—confessedly so rotten that it is not worth while to cover it. Again I would like the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] to tell me whether under that clause the Secretary of the Navy would not be authorized in his discretion to adopt the plan of such a ship as I have described.

Mr. BURLEIGH. If in order, I should like to move an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending amendment is exhausted, but it is competent to amend the paragraph.

Mr. SCHUMAKER. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I move to amend by adding the following:

Provided, That the work be done in the shops of the navy-yard when practicable.

Now, Mr. Chairman, when I hear my colleague from Maine [Mr. HALE] at all times defending the action of the Navy Department, I look upon him with pity, because he is a man for whom I have the greatest respect. When I hear him talking of economy in the navy-yards I cannot but remember the letters which I am daily receiving, and which I have received ever since I was a member of Congress, from different officers scattered throughout the Navy, gallant, zealous lovers of their country and its flag. They write me, without exception, that the Navy is in the same deplorable condition as ever. When I look over the expenditures of the Navy Department I find that for the fifteen months preceding the 1st of October last there was expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy over $39,000,000. Why, sir, it is one-half of what our whole Navy is worth to-day.

Gentlemen talk about economy in the Navy. My friend from New York on my left [Mr. CHITTENDEN] struck the right key when he wanted to know what the Secretary of the Navy can do with this money. I contend he should use it in our navy-yards in employing skilled workmen who have served there as apprentices and who are now thrown out of employment. But what does he do? He built a monitor that lies in the Charlestown navy-yard, or did lie there, in the district represented by my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. GOOCH.] Then what did they do? They put this monitor upon the dry-dock, took off her iron plating and sheathed her with boards, took out her twelve engines and her turrets and all her works and landed them upon the dock and then towed her hulk to Chester, Pennsylvania. They are now loading schooners with the works of that monitor, all mixed up together in confusion, her engines, her boilers, and her plating, preparatory to removing the whole to Chester, Pennsylvania. My friend from Maine knows, or it is known, that the shipbuilders of Maine make draughts of ships they intend to build, and from these make molds and get out their frames and transport them to Maine and build ships on them. The Secretary of the Navy does different. He sends his materials for building his vessels away from navy-yards having all the materials, tools, and skilled workmen to build them out to Pennsylvania to get iron frames for them, when the draughts and measures of the frames could be sent well, and with light expense, and the frames returned at light expense to the place where all the materials are on hand to build and furnish the ship. It is like a man who, wanting a suit of underclothing from Chester, should go there himself instead of sending his measure and have the clothes sent him. This is the economy of the Navy.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to ask the attention of my colleague from Philadelphia [Mr. O'NEILL] to one fact which appears in this debate, and that is while we have only six hundred and sixty men employed in the Philadelphia navy-yard, a first-class navy-yard in every respect, in the Norfolk navy-yard, which is in no degree equal to the Philadelphia yard, they have sixteen hundred men, and in the Charlestown navy-yard thirty-two hundred men.

Now it seems to me that it is at least a moderate way of stating it, to say that the gentlemen who represent Norfolk, and Charlestown, and New York have more influence than all of us combined; for I confess to you that I have sought to place men in the Philadelphia yard, and have sought to do it in vain. Whenever a man comes to me I give him a note. I do not always have it responded to, but I feel that I have done my duty.

And in addition I want to protest here against the defense made by the gentleman from Maine in justifying an abuse now because that abuse existed in 1856. That is no reason, to my mind, why we should not correct it. There were many things perhaps under Mr. Buchanan's administration which, for my part, if I had been here I never should have defended; and this is, perhaps, one of them. And I never will hereafter defend any wrong of this sort simply because I have the example of a democratic administration.

I am quite aware that gratuitous advice is seldom appreciated, and yet I feel that I ought to say to the republican majority of this House that one of their fatal mistakes has been that when we on this side charge corruption and misconduct, instead of their showing alacrity to correct abuses, they have sought to apologize for and defend defaulters and wrong-doers. So far as I have any voice in the democratic House of Representatives next year, I shall endeavor to exercise double the energy in casting out unfaithful democrats which I have shown in pointing out the misconduct of republican officials.

Mr. O'NEILL. I had not expected to participate in this debate, but after the remarks of my colleague I desire to say a few words. In reference to the Philadelphia navy-yard, and the employment of men there, I will say that when naval work is to be done at that station the Secretary of the Navy orders men to be employed to do that work, and then only, and such I suppose is his course at other yards—the more work the more men. At one time work can be more readily and conveniently done at one yard than at another. I would like there to be plenty of it all the while at the Philadelphia yard, especially in these hard times, and, as my colleague well knows, there is not a locality in this country when skilled labor and honest toil of all kinds are required where you can find more men fit for either than in the city of Philadelphia. Whenever there is work to be done there the Secretary in the proper and conscientious performance of his duty does not hesitate to order it and to employ a sufficient force of mechanics and laborers, and no more, to have it done well and in a way to challenge the admiration of the world.

I am sure my colleague will always admit that the work from the workshops of Philadelphia, either national or private, is unsurpassed. When my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. GOOCH] was addressing the Chair something dropped from his lips to which I desire to call attention. He said he pitied the member of Congress who had a navy-yard in his district. I do not want to be brought within the sphere of that pity. I prefer and like to represent a district or a city where a navy-yard is located. I want to aid in passing appropriations for building, repairing, and equipping a navy in this country, and I want especially to have the work done just where a portion of it is now done, in the city of Philadelphia, where we can furnish the men who know how to build, repair, and equip ships both for national purposes and for the mercantile marine.

I think no gentleman is to be pitied for having a governmental establishment of any kind in his district or in his city. I desire to keep the navy-yard in Philadelphia, and I say to the gentlemen representing the States and districts in which there are navy-yards, that all they have to do if they are tired of them, and are deploring their pitiable condition in having them, is to vote to abandon them and then urge the rapid building of one grand naval station for the whole country at League Island, in the city of Philadelphia. The work there should go on with greater rapidity. There is land enough for mechanical shops for all the purposes of a navy. There is ample room for docks, and liberal appropriations should be made to hurry to completion this most important yard.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. CREAMER] who spoke a few moments ago has referred in harsh terms to the Secretary of the Navy. The gentleman knows that he cannot make a specific charge against that officer. That officer has fulfilled his duty on every occasion since he has been at the head of the Department. We all know what his course was in fitting up a navy when there was the scare of a war with Spain, as the gentleman calls it. We know that he did in sixty days as much as was ever done in the Navy Department in the same space of time during the dark days of the rebellion. By an expenditure of less than $5,000,000—about $4,000,000—in those sixty days he fitted up a navy that was capable of coping with the navy of Spain, and in those few days he covered himself with glory and proved himself a statesman; and this Congress confirmed all he did by passing the $4,000,000 appropriation bill with great unanimity. Never in the history of any country has more effective work been done than was in that short period accomplished by that distinguished and patriotic official. The gentleman was in this House last winter, but he has forgotten the decided acquiescence of members in the prompt policy of the Secretary of the Navy when war was threatening. Many were of opinion that his preparations for the supposed enemy had much to do with the then solution of the exciting question. While the gentleman then saw that this work on the Navy was going on during the hard times of that financially disastrous fall, and knew that the Secretary was with judicious expenditure striving to uphold the honor of our flag, he now asks why ten millions of reserves were not put out by the President of the United States to help the people in their extremity. The gentleman well knows who made this request of the President of the United States. As I recollect the circumstance, some of his constituents attempted for selfish purposes thus to dictate to the President, but he in his wisdom denied to the money dealers and gold speculators of Wall street their bold demand for governmental aid sought by them, not one moment for the benefit of the people, but for their own aggrandizement at the people's cost.

I desire to say one word more. I must speak hurriedly, as a few minutes make but a short space of time for discussion when a man's official character is brought before the House and assailed. An effort was made a year or two ago to impeach the integrity of the Navy Department with reference to the administration of its duties. A committee sat for weeks upon the investigation, and the Secretary of the Navy and those who acted with him were triumphantly justified and vindicated wherever efforts had been made to tarnish their names and bring discredit and dishonor upon their official acts.

I will not sit here silent and listen to a gentleman upon this floor making charges against an honorable and patriotic officer of this Government. How does the gentleman know that the Secretary of the Navy associates with thieves and dishonest contractors? How does he know of such foul associations as he has broadly charged? If he does know, let him here and now say before this House where and when he witnessed such associations of the Secretary; who gave him such information; when and to whom a contract has ever been given out by this official that has not been for the interest of the Government. He cannot point out any such instance, and he does not name his informant or informants.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Now let us have a vote.

The question was upon the amendment of Mr. BURLEIGH to add to the paragraph last read these words:

Provided, That the work be done in the shops of the navy-yard when practicable.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

Naval Academy:

For pay of professors and others: For one professor of drawing, (head of department,) $2,500; four professors, namely, one of mathematics, (assistant,) one of chemistry, one of English studies, history, and law, and one of French, at $2,200 each; twelve assistant professors, namely, four of French, one of Spanish, three of English studies, history, and law, one of mathematics, one of astronomy, and two of drawing, at $1,800 each; sword-master, at $1,500, and two assistants, at $1,000 each; boxing-master and gymnast, at $1,200; and assistant librarian at $1,400; three clerks to superintendent, at $1,200, $1,000, and $800, respectively; one clerk to commandant of midshipmen, $1,000; one clerk to paymaster, $1,000; one apothecary, $750; one commissary, $288; one cook, $325.50; one messenger to superintendent, $600; one armorer, $529.50; one gunner's mate, $469.50, and one quarter-gunner, $469.50; one cockswain, $469.50; three seamen in the department of seamanship, at $349.50 each; one band-master, $528; eighteen first-class musicians, at $348 each; seven second-class musicians, at $300 each; two drummers and one fifer, (first-class,) at $348 each; in all $58,826.

Mr. MERRIAM. I move to amend the paragraph just read by adding the following:

That all cadet appointments hereafter to be made from congressional districts shall be designated only after competitive examination, open to all the youth of proper age in the district, by a committee of three competent and impartial citizens of the district, said committee to be selected by the member of Congress representing the district from which said cadet is to be appointed.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I raise the point of order that that is new legislation, and therefore not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

The committee rose informally.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed, without amendment, a bill of the House of the following title:

A bill (H. R. No. 3745) to remove the disabilities of James Howard, of Baltimore, Maryland.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session, and proceeded with the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following under the head of "Naval Academy:"

For contingent expenses, $36,600.

Mr. RANDALL. This clause, unlike other clauses of the same character, has not the details which should be given.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I have the full details, but not at my desk.

Mr. RANDALL. They ought to be put in.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I think so myself, and will see that they are inserted before the bill becomes a law.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I move that the committee now rise and report the bill with amendments to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and, the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOSKINS reported that pursuant to the order of the House the Committee of the Whole had had under consideration the special order, being House bill No. 3819, making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes, and had made sundry amendments thereto, which he was directed to report to the House.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. There are no amendments of any importance to this bill. I call the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole were concurred in, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HALE, of Maine, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AFFAIRS IN ALABAMA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following:

To the Speaker of the House of Representatives:

I have the honor to transmit herewith, for the information of Congress, a memorial forwarded to me by a convention of colored citizens assembled in the city of Montgomery, Alabama, on the 2d of this month.

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, December 22, 1874.

Mr. RANDALL. Let that lie upon the table and be printed.

Mr. GARFIELD. It should be referred to the special committee on affairs in Alabama, and I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

STREETS AND SEWERS OF THE DISTRICT.

Mr. RANDALL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the board of audit of the District of Columbia furnish to this House all tables of expenditures on streets and sewers, whether so far published or not published, from the organization of the late District government to this date; also the dates and details of the assessments against private property, what loans have been made to anticipate this revenue, the dates of said loans, where the funds obtained therefrom have been kept from the time of issuing of such indebtedness to date, the amount of such bonds that have been redeemed, if any, to date; also, the collections on account of said assessments, what they were applied to, and a clear, detailed statement of what may be hereafter expected from said source, naming streets and approximating expenses thereon; finally, a succinct statement as to rules followed in making assessments against private property as well as against the United States, stating the authority of law therefor, with date of each law.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SARAH W. JONES.

Mr. LAWRENCE, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on War Claims, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4145) for the relief of Sarah W. Jones, of Shelby County, Kentucky; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and with the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. LAWRENCE also, from the same committee, reported back adversely the following, which were laid upon the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

The claim of J. T. Green, of Jackson, Mississippi;

The petition of Elizabeth Weaver, of Fauquier County, Virginia, for compensation; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3922) for the relief of Joseph Ballister.

SOPHIA LOW HOOLE.

Mr. LAWRENCE also, from the same committee, by unanimous consent, reported back the petition and accompanying papers in the case of Sophia Low Hoole, praying for a revolutionary pension; and moved that the committee be discharged from their further consideration, and that they be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812.

The motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 926) referring the case of Joseph Wilson to the Court of Claims;

An act (S. No. 974) to enable the supreme court of the District of Columbia to proceed with its jury business; and

An act (S. No. 1054) reserving for the use of Congress one hundred and fifty copies of the Revised Statutes authorized to be printed by the act of June 20, 1874.

NATURALIZATION OF CHINESE.

Mr. PAGE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4146) providing for the exclusion of Chinese from the benefits of the naturalization laws of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

DANIEL E. BAILEY.

Mr. BASS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4147) for the relief of Daniel E. Bailey; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

LOUISIANA ELECTION CONTEST.

The SPEAKER laid before the House papers in the contested-election case of Sheridan vs. Pinchback; which were referred to the Committee on Elections.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. KELLOGG, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House papers in relation to the claim of Mrs. Julia L. Williams for balance due on the steamer City of New York, no adverse report having been made.

Mr. NIBLACK, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House papers in the case of George H. Wright and others, presented at the first session of the Thirty-ninth Congress.

Mr. BUNDY, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House the memorials and papers pertaining to the claim of J. J. Lints.

Mr. ARCHER, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House papers in the case of Commodore Bissell, no adverse report having been made thereon.

Mr. STRAIT, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House two petitions of W. C. Dodge, upon which no action has been had.

Mr. BECK, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw the papers of Robert Price from the files of the Committee on Claims, no adverse report having been made.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House the petition of Walton Cobb, the case never having been considered by a committee.

Mr. SHELDON, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House the petition and papers relating to the claim of E. E. Saunders.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. DANFORD for one week from the 23d instant, on account of sickness in his family; to Mr. WALLACE, for six days from the 23d instant; to Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS, until after the holidays; to Mr. BURLEIGH, until January 5; to Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, for two days; to Mr. LANSING, for two weeks from December 21; to Mr. COTTON, for one week; to Mr. BANNING, for five days; to Mr. PENDLETON, until January 5; to Mr. STANARD, until after the holidays; to Mr. FRYE, for eight days from December 22; to Mr. STORM, for two weeks; to Mr. STANDIFORD, for ten days; to Mr. HATHORN, for three days from the 21st instant; to Mr. SMITH, of North Carolina, for three days from to-day; to Mr. FINCK, until January 5; to Mr. PACKARD, until January 5; to Mr. WALDRON, until January 4; to Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan, until January 4; to Mr. TOWNSEND, until January 5; to Mr. CRITTENDEN, until January 6; to Mr. WILLIAMS, of Massachusetts, until January 5; to Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana, for two weeks; to Mr. MCDILL, of Iowa, until January 5; to Mr. STRAIT, until January 5; to Mr. CARPENTER, for six days from the 23d instant; and to Mr. BLAND, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the few of us who now remain adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at three o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BASS: The petition of Daniel E. Bailey, for relief, to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. BECK: The petition of J. K. Dixon, Isaac Holbrook, and others, for the establishment of a post-route from Williamstown, Grant County, Kentucky, to Owenton, Owen County, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, December 23, 1874.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE.

The CHIEF CLERK (Mr. WILLIAM J. MCDONALD) called the Senate to order, saying: The Chief Clerk has received the following communication from the Vice-President with a request that he communicate it to the Senate:

WASHINGTON, December 22, 1874.

Please inform the Senate when it assembles to-morrow that I shall not be present.

H. WILSON.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Secretary, I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That in the absence of the Vice-President Hon. MATT H. CARPENTER be, and he is hereby, chosen President of the Senate pro tempore.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Clerk, I ask that the ballots be taken.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is moved to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "resolved" and inserting:

That the Senate now proceed to the choice of a President pro tempore by ballot.

The Chief Clerk put the question on the amendment, and it was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senators will prepare their ballots. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] will please to act as tellers.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Clerk, I nominate Hon. A. G. THURMAN, of Ohio, for President pro tempore of the Senate.

Mr. ANTHONY. I nominate Hon. MATT H. CARPENTER, of Wisconsin.

The Senators having cast their ballots, and the ballots having been collected and canvassed by the tellers, the result was announced as follows:

The CHIEF CLERK. The tellers report the whole number of ballots 51; necessary to the choice 26, of which Mr. CARPENTER received 33 ballots and Mr. THURMAN 18; and there was one blank ballot. Mr. CARPENTER is therefore elected President of the Senate pro tempore and will be pleased to take the chair.

Mr. CARPENTER took the chair as President pro tempore, to which he was escorted by Mr. THURMAN, and said:

Senators, please accept my thanks for this renewed expression of your kindness and favor. The only return I can make for the partiality of your friendship is an impartial discharge of my duties, which I shall endeavor to do.

On motion of Mr. ANTHONY, it was Ordered, That the Secretary wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that in the absence of the Vice-President the Senate has chosen Hon. MATT H. CARPENTER, a Senator from the State of Wisconsin, President of the Senate pro tempore; and that he make a similar communication to the House of Representatives.

JOURNAL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLINTON LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 3819) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4144) providing for the authentication of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and for preserving the originals of all laws in the Department of State.

CONTRACT SURGEONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 1043) suspending so much of an act entitled "An act organizing the several staff corps of the Army," approved June 23, 1874, as applies to contract surgeons, which was in lines 4 and 5 to strike out "the 1st day of February, 1875," and insert in lieu thereof "otherwise provided by law."

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The amendment was concurred in.

HOLIDAY RECESS.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, I beg leave to interrupt the regular course of business, and I appeal to the Senate to allow me to do so. I was yesterday constrained to do a very ungracious thing to my associates here. I did so out of deference to my colleagues from the southern section of the country in the other House, who had voted unanimously against an adjournment over the holidays, but not with any idea of preventing the passage of the resolution, knowing that there was a majority of the Senate in favor of it. Now, I should like to ask the Senate to do me a particular favor. I know that perhaps they will not be unanimous on the point, but if they would do me the favor to take up that resolution now and consider it, I should be very much obliged to them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Louisiana moves that the Senate proceed to the present consideration of the holiday-recess resolution. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is before the Senate and will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution of the House of Representatives, as follows:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring.) That when the two Houses adjourn on Wednesday, the 23d instant, they adjourn to meet again on Tuesday, the 5th day of January next, at twelve o'clock noon.

The resolution was concurred in.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FLANAGAN presented the petition of Lemuel Adams, a soldier of the war of 1812, asking to be placed on the pension-rolls; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BOREMAN presented the petition of Samuel C. Bartlett, of West Virginia, praying for an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HITCHCOCK presented the petition of F. M. Brown, county clerk, and the other officers of Clay County, Nebraska, praying for the passage of a bill allowing the taxation of railroad lands; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. NORWOOD presented the petition of James G. Sturdivant, of Summerville, Georgia, praying compensation for provisions, supplies, &c., taken by the United States forces; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HAMLIN presented the petition of James O. Thompson, praying that a certain disability imposed upon him by the sentence of a court-martial may be removed; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FENTON presented the proceedings of the common council of the city of Rochester, New York, and the proceedings of the Board of Trade of the city of Oswego, New York, in favor of the confirmation of the treaty now pending for the re-establishment of relations of reciprocal free trade between this Government and Canada; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented the petition of Mrs. Lucy J. Loop, residing at Dunkirk, New York, praying for a pension on account of the services of her deceased husband; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of J. W. Benson, of Brooklyn, New York, praying action on the part of Congress for the recognition of the services of David Ritchie for gallant and meritorious conduct in the Navy; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented the petition of prominent periodical publishers of the city of New York, representing that the new postage law makes unjust discriminations by which periodicals are rated at one cent per pound higher than newspapers, and praying that the law be so changed as to fix the postage on periodicals at two cents per pound; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. JOHNSTON presented the petition of Murray Mason, of Virginia, praying for the removal of his disabilities; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland, presented the petition of Lemuel Jones and Thomas W. Jones, praying to be reimbursed for damage done to the schooner Chieftain by the Government transport Star; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. MERRIMON presented a resolution of the Legislature of North Carolina, in favor of an appropriation to enable the New River Canal Company to connect the inland water system of North Carolina with the Atlantic and Gulf coasts; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of North Carolina, in favor of the granting of pensions to the surviving veterans of the Mexican war; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ANTHONY presented the memorial of Kate Lonise Cushing, widow of the late Commander William B. Cushing, United States Navy, praying an allowance on account of the services of her husband; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, presented the petition of Fiske Mills, of Washington City, praying to be reimbursed for expenses incurred in preparing a model for a statue of the late General John A. Rawlins; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Quartermaster-General, dated the 16th instant, recommending that the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill be so amended as to include the employment of two additional messengers or laborers in his office; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PORT OF DELIVERY AT ATLANTA.

Mr. NORWOOD. I desire to submit a motion for the reconsideration of the vote taken day before yesterday by which the bill (H. R. No. 3474) to establish Atlanta, in the State of Georgia, a port of delivery, was indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia moves to reconsider the vote of the Senate by which the bill indicated by him was indefinitely postponed.

The motion will be entered.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1066) to incorporate the Georgetown and Tennallytown Railroad Company of the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1067) to divide the State of Iowa into two judicial districts; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAGER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1068) for the relief of banking associations issuing notes payable in gold; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KELLY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1069) providing for the construction of the Oregon Central Pacific Railway and Telegraph Line; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Railroads, and ordered to be printed.

AGRICULTURAL REPORTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed of the annual report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the year 1872 two hundred and thirty thousand copies, of which fifty thousand shall be for the use of the Senate and one hundred and eighty thousand for the use of the House of Representatives; and that there be printed of the report of the said Commissioner for the year 1873 one hundred and fifty-five thousand copies, of which thirty-five thousand copies shall be for the use of the Senate and one hundred and twenty thousand copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Printing.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 4141) to make East Pascagoula, in the State of Mississippi, a port of delivery, in the district of Pearl River, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (H. R. No. 3819) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

AUTHENTICATION OF REVISED STATUTES, ETC.

The bill (H. R. No. 4144) providing for the authentication of the Revised Statutes of the United States and for preserving the originals of all laws in the Department of State, was read twice by its title.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent of the Senate to pass that bill at this time. The first section merely rectifies some errors in respect to the mode of authentication of the Revised Statutes and of the laws of Congress, which are to be sent to the various public officials in the United States and the executive authority of the several States. By some accident the act of last year provided that this should be done under the seal of the United States instead of under the seal of the Department of State. The seal of the United States is what in other countries is called "the great seal," and it is a very formidable affair. To make the law conform to what it always has been this change needs to be made.

Then the other section of the bill which remodels one section of the Revised Statutes, which I have under my hand, provides for leaving the law where it was understood to be before the Revised Statutes passed. By some accident the commissioners of revision brought forward an old obsolete law—I think an act of 1789—which requires the Secretary of State to send, as fast as each law passes, an authenticated copy—two copies, in fact—to the executive authority of each State under the seal of his Department. That has fallen into disuse for more than fifty years, because it would be very expensive and entirely useless, a new law having taken its place providing for sending at the end of each session a copy of all the acts of that session; so that to carry out the law as it now reads in the Revised Statutes it would be necessary for the Secretary of State, every day as a bill passes, to send to the various officials in the United States, that I need not enumerate, copies authenticated under his own signature and sealed with the seal of the Department of State, which would require him, as he has computed it, to make about eighty thousand of these certificates, which of course is totally useless, and is a waste of time and labor.

This bill provides for rectifying these mere technical difficulties that have arisen on account of the passage of the Revised Statutes in their present shape. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the bill may be passed now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of this bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Senate as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 4144) providing for the authentication of the Revised Statutes of the United States and for preserving the originals of all laws in the Department of State.

The bill provides that the certificate of the printed volume of the Revised Statutes of the United States required by section 2 of an act "providing for the publication of the Revised Statutes and laws of the United States," approved June 20, 1874, shall be made by the Secretary of State under the seal of the Department of State.

The second section provides that section 204 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall hereafter read as follows:

Whenever a bill, order, resolution, or vote of the Senate and House of Representatives, having been approved by the President, or not having been returned by him with his objections, becomes a law or takes effect, it shall forthwith be received by the Secretary of State from the President; and whenever a bill, order, resolution, or vote is returned by the President with his objections, and on being reconsidered is agreed to be passed and is approved by two-thirds of both Houses of Congress, and thereby becomes a law or takes effect, it shall be received by the Secretary of State from the President of the Senate or Speaker of the House of Representatives, in whichever House it shall have been last so approved, and he shall carefully preserve the originals.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. SARGENT. I am in favor of the passage of the bill for good reasons that have been given; but I take this opportunity to make one remark upon the apparent changes of law which were made by the Revised Statutes, certainly without the knowledge of Congress, and I doubt if they were with the knowledge of the committees of Congress who gave as much time and attention as was possible perhaps to the scheme of revision of the laws. I have been surprised since we passed the Revised Statutes, on a number of occasions, to find that the statute law of the United States was changed in very grave particulars; and yesterday my attention was called to a case which I ask the patience of the Senate for one moment while I bring it to their notice.

Any one acquainted with the legislative history of the past few years knows that the question has been raised on a number of occasions whether the word "white" should be stricken from the naturalization laws or not. Some of the Senators and Members who are more familiar with the condition of things existing upon the Pacific coast thought it would be disastrous to the interests of civilization and good government on that coast to have Chinese naturalized, and therefore, and for that reason only, resisted the striking of the word "white" out of the naturalization laws.

I need not perhaps give the basis for that belief; but they thought, among other things, that as these persons were actually imperialists, if they had any political sentiments, as they were ignorant of our language and very slowly acquired it, they might be naturalized in large numbers and sent in platoons to the polls, and consequently anything like free government under proper influences would be lost to American citizens where they were in large numbers. At any rate we made a most earnest struggle in both Houses of Congress on that matter. The object of those who pressed for legislation in that direction was to enable certain persons who were of African descent to be naturalized, and finally there was a compromise made, by which the word "white" was left in the naturalization laws, but it was provided that aliens of African blood or African descent might be naturalized. So the law was placed in the statute-book, Africans being allowed to be naturalized, but the word "white" being retained for the very object that was explained in the debates at the time the provision was adopted in regard to Africans, that the Chinese might not be naturalized.

Now, sir, I find by reference to the Revised Statutes—

Any alien may be admitted to become a citizen of the United States in the following manner and not otherwise.

And the words are industriously excluded therefrom which are in the original statutes, which I traced up, providing that "any alien, being a free white person," may be naturalized under the laws of the United States. If that is not legislation under the form of revision, in spite of the action of Congress intelligently had to accomplish a certain object, then I cannot give an instance of it.

I call attention to this because it is possible that by and by I may ask that the law be put in statu quo, as it was before this provision was made, and also to show that it is a surprise upon us members from the western coast that any such legislation appears to have been adopted. I will state, however, that it was a matter of actual impossibility, as everybody knows, for Senators to familiarize themselves with every provision and every line of these Revised Statutes, one volume alone of which now in my hand amounts to over a thousand pages; and that is the only excuse I can give for having overlooked the matter.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I merely wish to add that the occasions are very rare indeed when I should venture to ask the Senate to pass a bill without a reference and in the regular course, for I do not think it is a good plan; but as this bill plainly relates only to the mere method of disposing of these laws and their authentication, and inasmuch as the Secretary of State, in a communication that I hold in my hand, expresses earnestly the desire and shows the necessity of its being passed before the holidays in order that these authentications of the Revised Statutes may go on, I have ventured to ask the Senate to depart from what I regard to be a very wholesome rule, of having everything referred.

I will only say in answer to the Senator from California that he cannot have forgotten that a good many of us a year ago thought it was unwise to pass these Revised Statutes in bulk without their being gone through with in the regular way, on account of the danger that the very things might happen which it now appears have happened, and in many respects necessarily happened, one may say, when you take so vast a work as this and do not have it subdivided among various committees. And so I entirely concur in what he says, that we must take steps from time to time, as rapidly as possible, to rectify the errors that have necessarily crept into this book; and by that I do not mean to impute to anybody any want of diligence in it; but it is perfectly clear that any body of commissioners, taking the vast mass of the laws that had accumulated, would make these mistakes, and that any one committee having the whole of them in charge would necessarily overlook many of these things that were apparently trifling and that would not be brought to their notice. It ought to be a warning to us never to pass any law, as it appears to me, except this particular bill, without a very careful reference and consideration of it.

Mr. THURMAN. I am very glad that the Senator from California has called attention to the matter about which he spoke; but I cannot help expressing my surprise that the fact is as he states it to be if his investigation has been correct. The legislation which he states has taken place in Congress is precisely what he says it has been, and how these revisers could have misunderstood that legislation passes my comprehension. It was stated here and in the other House that this revision was no change of the law at all, that it was only to make the law conform to what had been decided to be the law and to eliminate from the statutes, where necessary, mere repetitions of the same provisions of law and reconcile and harmonize those which seemed contradictory; and even that attempt to remove repugnancy, it was said, was pursued in a very slight degree; but there was to be no change in the laws. If there was a change in any phraseology, it was simply to make more clear the legislative intention as it had been expounded by the courts. But now we find, if my friend from California is correct in his statement, that there has been a most material change in the law; and how it could have taken place is a thing that is very singular to me.

But, sir, that is not all. I have in my desk a statement—I suppose every Senator has received the same statement—from certain importers, in which they complain of about a dozen or more changes in the tariff laws; and most singularly it so happens that every single one of these changes in the law is against free trade. That is one of the strangest things that ever happened, that every single one of them imposes a higher duty than was collected before the Revised Statutes were passed.

I did not rise to suggest what is the remedy for this; but I do hope that some remedy will be devised and that it will receive the attention of the Senate.

Mr. CARPENTER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) Mr. President, in the absence of the chairman of the Committee on the Revision of Laws, I ought perhaps to say that that committee did what any other committee of this body would have been compelled to do. Congress provided first for a revision by commissioners, which ran on for years. Congress then passed a law authorizing the committee to make a contract with other gentlemen in Washington to go over their work and revise it. The committee, of course, had to accept that work as it was, and it was impossible to review it in detail.

I remember the discussion and the legislation referred to by the Senator from California; and I think he is entirely right in his statement of it, and of course the charge to which he referred is a mere blunder; but it is one of those blunders which I can very well see how the revisers might fall into without any intention to usurp the law-making power. The action of Congress for so long a time has been directed to striking the word "white" out of the Constitution and laws that they thought undoubtedly it was by omission or mistake that it was left in that law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. A bill once passed the Senate, I think, for that purpose, but it does not seem to have become a law.

Mr. CARPENTER. The understanding was upon the part of all the Senate that the Committee on the Revision of the Laws were not answerable. The chairman expressly so stated; and everybody knew that if that volume was to be passed it had to be passed at once and in bulk, for if we once entered into the amendment of it here, there would never be any end to it and never any passage of it. The idea was to pass the law as a starting-point, and then have something to which all subsequent amendments could refer; and it was with that view that the law was passed. The point mentioned by the Senator from California is clearly a blunder; and undoubtedly there are others; but it was a matter of impossibility for us to go through and prevent blunders.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senator from Wisconsin did not suppose that I intended to reflect upon the Committee on the Revision of the Laws on the subject.

Mr. CARPENTER. Not at all.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SENATOR FROM LOUISIANA.

Mr. MORTON. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Senate recognizes the validity of the credentials of P. B. S. Pinchback, as certified to by Governor William P. Kellogg, of Louisiana, under the seal of said State; and the Committee on Privileges and Elections are instructed to examine and report if said Pinchback is entitled to be admitted on the prima facie case thus made, or if such admission should be postponed until investigation is made as to the charges of corruption in his election alleged against him.

Mr. THURMAN. I object to the consideration of that resolution to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over.

Mr. MORTON. I move that the resolution be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

THE COUSHATTA TROUBLES.

Mr. CLAYTON. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested, if not incompatible with the interests of the public service, to lay before the Senate the official reports and communications of Major Lewis Merrill, United States Army, relating to certain disorders in Louisiana known as the Coushatta troubles.

Mr. BAYARD. I object to the present consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be laid over.

Mr. CLAYTON. I move that the resolution which I offered be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

SENATOR FROM ALABAMA.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I ask to have the resolution respecting the compensation of Mr. Sykes, claimant for a seat in this body, taken up and recommitted to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, reported by Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, May 28, 1874:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Francis W. Sykes, late contestant from the State of Alabama, out of the appropriations for compensation and mileage for Senators, the sum of $3,374.80, being the salary of a Senator from the 4th day of March, 1873, to the 28th day of May, 1874, inclusive.

The pending question being on the amendment submitted by Mr. CARPENTER on the 5th of June, 1874, in lines 4 and 5 to strike out "$3,374.80, being the salary of a Senator from the 4th day of March, 1873, to the 28th day of May, 1874, inclusive," and insert in lieu thereof "$3,000."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maryland moves to refer the resolution and amendment to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

GEORGE S. WAGNER.

Mr. DENNIS, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the following resolution, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the Senate to the mother of George S. Wagner, deceased, the late Librarian of the Senate, $150 for his funeral expenses, and a further allowance equal to three months' pay of his annual salary.

CREDENTIALS OF SENATOR-ELECT.

Mr. PEASE presented the credentials of Hon. B. K. Bruce, elected by the Legislature of Mississippi a Senator from that State for the term commencing on the 4th day of March, 1875; which were read and ordered to be filed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLINTON LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 420) to amend an act entitled "An act for the restoration to homestead entry and to market of certain lands in Michigan," approved June 10, 1872, and for other purposes, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 1043) suspending so much of an act entitled "An act organizing the several staff corps of the Army," approved June 23, 1874, as applies to contract surgeons; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4144) providing for the authentication of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and for preserving the originals of all laws in the Department of State.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, the first bill on the Calendar will be reported by the Clerk.

The CHIEF CLERK. The first bill on the Calendar is the bill (S. No. 71) to authorize the organization of national banks without circulation.

Mr. BAYARD. We have passed a resolution to adjourn to-day for the holidays, and I know that the hours of leaving Washington render it necessary to many members of the Senate to do so shortly. I submit, therefore, that we might as well adjourn, and I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator to withdraw that motion for a moment, that we may have a short executive session?

Mr. BAYARD. I do not desire to interfere with that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. WRIGHT. I trust the Senator from Vermont will withdraw that motion for a moment. I want to present an amendment in the nature of a substitute to a pending bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well.

Mr. WRIGHT. The next bill in the order of business, as I understand, is what is known as the District bill. That bill will necessarily go over for the recess. I offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute for it at this time, and ask that it may be printed, so that Senators may have an opportunity to examine it. I offer a substitute for the pending bill (S. No. 963) for the better government of the District of Columbia, to be laid on the table and printed.

The proposed amendment was received informally, and ordered to be printed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I renew the motion for an executive session.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After forty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at one o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned, the adjournment being under the concurrent resolution of the two Houses till January 5, 1875.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 23, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MARGARET S. HASTINGS.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table and put upon its passage the bill (S. No. 862) granting a pension to Margaret S. Hastings.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Margaret S. Hastings, widow of Charles B. Hastings, late a private in Company E, Forty-fifth Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers, and pay her arrears of pension from the date of the death of her husband to the time her present pension commenced.

Mr. MAYNARD. Has that Senate bill been considered by any committee of this House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not advised.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. It has passed the Senate and has the approval of the chairman of the committee of the House, who is prepared to speak for himself.

Mr. MAYNARD. If the gentleman is prepared to say it has been even informally considered by any committee of this House, I do not object.

Mr. RUSK. I will say I believe the Senate report to be correct. This is an extreme case. It is a violation of the rules of the committee to pass any arrears of pension, but in this extreme case of necessity I believe this bill ought to pass.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to say in regard to this matter that we have almost uniformly refused to pay back of the date of granting the pension. This dates it back to the death of the soldier. I cannot see how we can do this without making a precedent for a great many other cases. I hope the gentleman will let it go to the committee.

Mr. MAYNARD. I do not place my objection on that ground at all. I can see there are extreme cases where the pension ought to go back, but I do not think we ought to pass bills of this character without having at least the sanction of the committee.

Mr. GARFIELD. Perhaps it ought to be referred.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. This is a peculiar case of great merit and I hope gentlemen will not object. This woman is suffering.

Mr. HURLBUT. I object.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. Then let it be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, with leave to report at any time.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

MRS. MARY E. TWIFORD, OF NORFOLK, VIRGINIA.

Mr. DONNAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 2524) for the relief of Mary E. Twiford, of Norfolk, Virginia, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on War Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

HARRISON HARBOR COMPANY, MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. LYNCH, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4148) authorizing the Harrison Harbor Company to excavate a channel and harbor in the Mississippi Sound, and to construct docks and breakwaters in connection therewith; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL BANKS OF NEW YORK CITY.

Mr. COX. I ask unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to require each of the presidents and cashiers of the different banks doing business under the banking laws of the United States in the city of New York, under oath, to report to him within ten days of the passage of this resolution the exact amount of gold coin, gold certificates, and checks or memorandums of individuals held by said banks at the close of business on the 19th of December, 1874; and that said Secretary transmit to this House the results of said report.

Mr. MERRIAM. I object.

Mr. MAYNARD. Let it be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. MERRIAM. I do not object to its reference.

The resolution was received and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

ARKANSAS CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—BELL VS. SNYDER.

Mr. HARRISON, from the Committee on Elections, submitted a report in the contested-election case of Marcus L. Bell against O. P. Snyder; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask that the resolutions reported in that case be read for consideration at this time.

The Clerk read as follows:

1. Resolved, That Marcus L. Bell, the contestant, was not elected a Representative in Congress to the Forty-third Congress from the second congressional district of Arkansas, and is not entitled to a seat on this floor.

2. Resolved, That the sitting member, O. P. Snyder, was duly elected a Representative to the Forty-third Congress from the second congressional district of Arkansas, and is entitled to his seat as such Representative.

Mr. HARRISON. I call for the previous question on the adoption of the resolutions.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolutions were adopted.

Mr. HARRISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RESTORATION OF MICHIGAN LANDS TO HOMESTEAD ENTRY.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at twenty-two minutes past twelve o'clock p. m., and reports are in order from committees, beginning with the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BRADLEY, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back, with an amendment, a bill (S. No. 420) to amend the act entitled "An act for the restoration to homestead entry and to market of certain lands in Michigan," approved June 10, 1872, and for other purposes.

The bill was read.

The first section amends the act approved June 10, 1872, entitled "An act for the restoration to market of certain lands in Michigan," so as to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to cause patents to be issued to three hundred and twenty members of the Ottawa and Chippewa Indians of Michigan for the selections found to have been made by them, but which were not prior to the passage of that act regularly reported and recognized by the Secretary of the Interior and Commissioner of Indian Affairs; and the remainder of those lands not disposed of, and not valuable mainly for pine timber, shall be subject to entry under the homestead laws for one year from the passage of the present act, and the lands remaining thereafter undisposed of shall be restored to market.

The second section permits all Indians who have settled upon and made improvements on section 10, in township 47 north, of range 2 east, and section 4, in township 47 north, of range 3 west, Michigan, to enter not exceeding eighty acres each, at the minimum price of land, upon making proof of such settlement and improvement before the register of the land office at Marquette, Michigan; and when these entries shall have been completed in accordance herewith the remaining lands embraced within the limits of these sections shall be restored to market.

The third section provides that all actual, permanent, bona fide settlers on any of the lands reserved for Indian purposes under the treaty with the Ottawa and Chippewa Indians of Michigan, of July 31, 1855, shall be entitled to enter not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres of land, either under the homestead laws or to pay the minimum price of land, on making proof of his or her settlement and continued residence before the expiration of ninety days from the passage of the present act, in case such settlers do not claim any of the lands heretofore patented to Indians, or in conflict with the selections found to have been made by Indians referred to in the first section of this bill, and shall have settled upon those lands prior to the 1st day of January, 1874.

The amendment reported by the Committee on the Public Lands was as follows:

At the end of section 1 strike out the words "restore to market," and insert the words "offer for sale at a price not less than $2.50 per acre."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BRADLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SALES OF TIMBER LANDS IN CALIFORNIA, ETC.

Mr. BRADLEY. I am also instructed by the Committee on the Public Lands to report as a substitute for House bill No. 410 a bill (H. R. No. 4149) for the sale of timber lands in the States of California and Oregon and the Territories of the United States.

The bill was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I suppose that the bill is open to the objection that it should have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Vermont makes the point of order that this bill should have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole. On what ground?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. On the ground that it disposes of public property.

Mr. BRADLEY. I will say to the gentleman from Vermont that this bill has been carefully considered by the Committee on the Public Lands and has been materially cut down from the original provisions in regard to the amount of land to be sold. It has been guarded at all points. At present there is no law providing for the sale of public lands in the Western Territories and new States, and the passage of this bill seems to be a matter of great necessity. If the gentleman insists upon his point of order I have no doubt that it will lie, but I hope he will withdraw it.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I insist upon my point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Vermont makes the point of order that this bill disposes of public property, and therefore should have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole. The Chair sustains the point.

MINERAL LANDS.

Mr. BRADLEY also, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported as a substitute for House bill No. 2152 a bill (H. R. No. 4150) to amend an act entitled "An act in relation to mineral lands," approved February 17, 1873; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to inquire of the Chair if the same objection does not lie to this bill as to the one previously reported?

Mr. BRADLEY. If the gentleman from Iowa will allow me, I will explain that this bill makes merely one amendment to the act. The law was amended in 1872 so as to except Michigan, Arkansas, and Minnesota from the operation of the original act, and all that this bill does is merely to add Missouri and Arkansas to the list of exemptions. That is all the change that is proposed.

Mr. KASSON. I desire to say, reserving the point of order, that in reference to all measures affecting public lands and mineral lands my object is to preserve as far as possible the homestead principle to apply exclusively to the public lands and the development principle to apply exclusively to the mineral lands. And as it is impossible while this bill is being read to refer to previous laws, to see the effect of it I think it desirable that the bill should be before us in print and receive the approval of the Committee of the Whole. It is for that reason that I make the point.

Mr. BRADLEY. The bill applies exclusively to mineral lands, and only excepts Missouri and Arkansas with the other three named in 1872.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa reserves the point of order that this bill also disposes of public property and should have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole. It is the duty of the Chair to sustain the point of order.

RIGHT OF WAY THROUGH THE PUBLIC LANDS IN UTAH.

Mr. BRADLEY also, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported as a substitute for House bill No. 3051 a bill (H. R. No. 4151) granting the right of way through the public lands for a toll-road in Little Cottonwood Canyon, in Salt Lake County, Utah; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. RANDALL. Before the bill is read at length, I ask the Chair to determinine whether the point of order applies to this bill also. My object is to save time that would be occupied by the reading of the bill by the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Michigan desire to put the bill on its passage?

Mr. BRADLEY. Yes, sir,

Mr. RANDALL. It gives the right of way over the public lands for certain distances.

The SPEAKER. The bill gives the right of way over the public lands four rods in width, and to that extent the rule applies. The Chair sustains the point of order, and the bill goes to the Committee of the Whole.

LAWRENCE COUNTY (ALABAMA) NARROW-GAUGE RAILROAD.

Mr. BRADLEY also, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported adversely upon the bill (H. R. No. 2732) granting certain lands to the State of Alabama in trust for the Lawrence County Narrow-gauge Railroad; and the same was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that, in the absence of the Vice-President, the Senate had chosen Hon. MATT H. CARPENTER, a Senator from the State of Wisconsin, President of the Senate pro tempore.

The message further announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 1043) suspending so much of the act entitled "An act reorganizing the several staff corps of the Army," approved June 23, 1874, as applies to contract surgeons.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 1044) providing for the resumption of specie payments; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message further announced that the Senate had agreed to the resolution providing for the adjournment of both Houses of Congress from Wednesday, 23d instant, to Tuesday, January 5, 1875, at twelve o'clock noon.

LAND DISTRICT IN OREGON.

Mr. HERNDON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back, with a recommendation that it pass, the bill (S. No. 381) to create an additional land district in the State of Oregon, to be called the Dalles land district.

The bill was read.

The first section provides that the President of the United States be authorized to establish an additional land district in the State of Oregon, which district shall be bounded as follows, namely: Commencing on the Columbia River at the intersection of the range line, between ranges 8 and 9 east, thence south on that range line to the fourth standard parallel, which is the north boundary of the Linkton land district; thence east on that parallel to range 27 east; thence north on range line between ranges 26 and 27 to the Columbia River; thence down that river to the place of beginning, comprising all that land in Oregon situate north of the Linkton land district and between ranges 8 and 27 east of the Willamette meridian. The district, as above bounded, is to be known and designated as the Dalles district; and the office of the district is to be located at the city of the Dalles, or such place as the President shall direct, in the State of Oregon; and the President of the United States is empowered to change the location of this land office, from time to time, as the public interests may seem to require.

The second section authorizes the President to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, or during the recess thereof, a register and a receiver for the district hereby created, who shall each reside in the place where the land office is located, and shall have the same powers, responsibilities, and emoluments, and be subject to the same acts and penalties which are or may be prescribed by law in relation to other land officers in the State.

The third section provides that the public lands in the district shall be subject to sale and disposal upon the same terms and conditions as other public lands of the United States. But all sales and locations made at the office of the old district, of lands situated within the limits of the new district, which shall be valid and right in other respects, up to the day on which the new office shall go into operation, are confirmed.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I desire to inquire of the gentleman reporting this bill whether it would not be better to strike out in the second section the words "or during the recess thereof," which are inserted in the clause with regard to the power of the President to appoint these land officers?

Mr. HERNDON. I do not know that I shall make any objection to striking out those words.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The phraseology of the bill is that "the President is hereby authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate or during the recess thereof, a register and receiver for the district hereby created." It occurs to me that the words "or during the recess thereof" should be struck out, because as the bill now stands they might imply that the President is empowered to make during the recess of the Senate an appointment that shall not require to be confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. HERNDON. Mr. Speaker, I do not think that the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Vermont would materially change the bill, while it would have the effect of sending it back to the Senate. It is a Senate bill, having received the unanimous approval of the Senate committee and having been passed unanimously by the Senate. In this House it has received the unanimous recommendation of the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. This is a mere matter of phraseology. I do not see why there should be any need of putting in the bill a provision that the President may appoint these officers during the recess of the Senate. It is a constitutional power he would have at any rate, while the bill on its face would seem to imply that he might appoint these officers during the recess, and that they would not be subject to the confirmation of the Senate after that body assembled.

Mr. NESMITH. Mr. Speaker, as this is a matter that has no effect whatever upon the substance of the bill one way or the other, I appeal to the gentleman from Vermont to withdraw his amendment. The people for whose benefit we propose to establish this land district are situated between two vast ranges of mountains, and they have no facilities for reaching the existing land offices without great trouble and expense, and at some seasons of the year it is absolutely impracticable. If the gentleman persists in his amendment, it will probably defeat the bill. I make a personal appeal to the gentleman to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I have no objection to the passage of the bill, and if gentlemen think that the amendment would embarrass it or delay its passage beyond the time that would be convenient, I withdraw the amendment.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HERNDON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SIERRA IRON COMPANY.

Mr. ORR, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back, with amendment, the bill (S. No. 514) granting to the Sierra Iron Company a right of way through the public lands for a railroad and telegraph.

Mr. RANDALL. To save the time of the House and to relieve the Clerk from the necessity of reading this bill, I make the point that it appropriates public property, and must receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ORR. The bill had better be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is entitled of course to have the bill read.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] makes the point——

Mr. ORR. Has the amendment been read?

Mr. RANDALL. It would be unfair not to make the point against this bill after other similar bills have gone the same road, and especially in view of the fact that there is so sparse an attendance of members.

Mr. ORR. I have no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that the point of order lies against bills of this character.

Mr. RANDALL. I will hear the gentleman, reserving my point of order.

Mr. ORR. I desire to say that this bill is exactly in accordance with many bills we have heretofore passed without much objection. I had hoped that the point of order would not be made against bills which grant nothing but a simple right of way over the public lands and the necessary material for the construction of the roads. I admit that the point of order will be good if made; and if the gentleman insists upon it the bill must go the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RANDALL. I insist upon my point of order.

The bill, with the accompanying amendment, was accordingly referred to the Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be printed.

DENVER, SOUTH PARK, AND PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. ORR, from the same committee, also reported a bill (H. R. No. 4152) granting the right of way through the public lands to the Denver, South Park and Pacific Railroad Company; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. RANDALL. I make the same point of order upon this bill. I desire to make a suggestion. If all the bills granting right of way to railroads, where the donation of land is only for station purposes and depots, are sent to the Committee of the Whole, I think there will be no objection after the holidays to considering them in their regular order. They ought all to go together and be upon the same footing. I am apprised that there are some railroads already constructed that absolutely have no right of way. I think the right of way should be granted to such roads because the money invested by those companies has certainly increased the value of the adjacent public domain; and the Government ought to be as liberal toward these companies as it has been to many others. I therefore suggest the propriety of letting all these bills go to the Committee of the Whole, and after the holidays we can fix some day and hour for the special consideration of them. The gentleman will see at once that my suggestion is in the direction of the wishes of the conmmittee reporting these bills.

Mr. ORR. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania insist upon his point of order on this last bill?

Mr. RANDALL. I do; and have made this statement in order to show that ultimately no injury will be done to these bills.

The bill was accordingly referred to the Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be printed.

DAKOTA CENTRAL RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. ORR, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4153) granting the right of way to the Dakota Central Railroad Company over the public lands; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the same point of order against this bill.

The bill was accordingly referred to the Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be printed.

SAINT PAUL AND SIOUX CITY RAILROAD.

Mr. ORR, from the same committee, also reported a bill (H. R. No. 4154) authorizing the Saint Paul and Sioux City Railroad Company to construct a branch line from Sibley, in Iowa, to Yankton, in Dakota; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the House of the following title:

A bill (H. R. No. 4144) providing for the authentication of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and for preserving the originals of all laws in the Department of State.

CHEYENNE, IRON MOUNTAIN AND PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. ORR, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4155) granting the right of way through the public lands to the Cheyenne, Iron Mountain and Pacific Railroad Company; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. CROUNSE. I would inquire why the committee find it necessary to grant twenty acres of land for these several stations? It seems to me it can only be in the interest of these roads, to enable them to build towns, to enter into town-site speculations, rather than for the actual use of the road.

Mr. ORR. In the original draught of these bills almost universally forty acres are asked for. The committee have cut the amount down to twenty acres for each ten miles of the road. That is the rule adopted by the committee, and that amount is regarded as necessary for depot grounds, station-houses, &c.

Mr. RANDALL. I insist upon the point of order against the bill.

The bill was accordingly referred to the Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 1043) suspending so much of the act entitled "An act reorganizing the several staff corps of the Army," approved June 22, 1874, as applies to contract surgeons.

PUBLIC LANDS TO ILLINOIS.

Mr. HEREFORD, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported adversely upon House bill No. 1288, to authorize the State of Illinois to select three hundred and sixty-seven thousand acres of the public lands to which said State is entitled by law.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the point of order against this bill that it appropriates public property and must receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HEREFORD. I have reported adversely upon the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. The bill would still go to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. It would not unless insisted upon by the gentleman.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not insist upon it.

The SPEAKER. Then the bill will lie upon the table.

Mr. COX. Will the adverse report be printed.

The SPEAKER. This bill is simply reported adversely without any accompanying report.

SWAMP-LAND INDEMNITY CERTIFICATES.

Mr. HEREFORD also, from the same committee, reported back adversely a bill (H. R. No. 187) to authorize the issue of swamp-land indemnity certificates and their location by actual settlers; which was laid on the table.

HOLY CROSS MISSION, DAKOTA.

Mr. HEREFORD also, from the same committee, reported back adversely a bill (H. R. No. 1509) for the relief of the Holy Cross Mission, in the Territory of Dakota; which was laid on the table.

MEMPHIS AND KANSAS CITY, ETC., RAILROADS.

Mr. BUNDY, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 2200) to declare the Memphis and Kansas City and the Kansas City and Memphis Railroads military and post-roads, and for other purposes, with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. HYNES. The most of that is an imaginary road.

Mr. BUNDY. Let it be read.

Mr. MAYNARD. I see no good reason for reading the bill when it will have to take the usual course of reference to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. This gives to the road the right of way to the extent of one hundred feet in width from the public lands, and brings it within the point of order.

Mr. MAYNARD. I do not make the point of order, but I presume it will be made.

Mr. RANDALL. I make the point of order.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRADLEY. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

TEMPORARY APPOINTMENT.

The SPEAKER. The members of the Committee on Enrolled Bills do not seem to be in the House to-day, and the Chair therefore appoints Mr. BURROWS to act temporarily for the purpose of comparing a bill which it is necessary to send to the Senate before the recess.

TROUBLES IN MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. CONGER. I move the adoption of the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and hereby is, directed to pay to the chairman of the special committee to investigate the troubles, &c., in the State of Mississippi, such sum or sums as may be necessary for the expenses of said committee while engaged in investigating as authorized by resolution of this House of December 14, 1874, and the receipts of the chairman of said committee shall be proper vouchers to the Clerk in the statements of his accounts at the Treasury.

Mr. RANDALL. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, there ought to be some limitation of the amount provided for in this resolution.

Mr. HOLMAN. The usual practice has been to provide for these expenses being paid by the deputy sergeant-at-arms, not by the chairman of the committee. Heretofore the practice has been to pay these expenses under the direction of the chairman of the committee, of course, but by the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. CONGER. On inquiry, I have followed the form necessary to provide the money for the payment of these expenses. The House passed a resolution that this should be paid out of the contingent fund, and the Clerk informs me the usual mode has been to pass a resolution authorizing him to pay it.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not think this has been the usual mode.

Mr. CONGER. I believe it has been done in other cases.

Mr. RANDALL. How much do you want?

Mr. CONGER. I do not know, but certainly we do not want more than is necessary.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest a limitation of $5,000.

Mr. CONGER. I do not object to the limitation.

Mr. RANDALL. Let the resolution provide for an amount not to exceed $5,000. I do not think we ought to pass any such resolution in such general terms. I understand the committee themselves do not ask for more than $2,500, and I therefore modify my motion to make it $2,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. CONGER. I do not object to the limitation of the amount to $2,500, and I modify my resolution in that way.

Mr. RANDALL. Now let the resolution be read as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and is hereby, directed to pay to the chairman of the special committee to investigate the troubles, &c., in the State of Mississippi the sum of $2,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary for the expenses of said committee while engaged in investigating, as authorized by resolution of this House of December 14, 1874, and the receipts of the chairman of said committee shall be proper vouchers to the Clerk in the settlement of his accounts at the Treasury.

Mr. GARFIELD. The ordinary practice has been to send a special officer of the House with the committee as disbursing officer. I have no objection especially, however, to the adoption of this resolution if the chairman of the committee is willing to take upon himself this trouble and responsibility. I think he will find it an onerous duty.

Mr. CONGER. I desired the Sergeant-at-Arms to take that responsibility, but he declines to do it.

Mr. MAYNARD. A deputy marshal, of course, will have to go with the committee.

Mr. GARFIELD. I believe no member of Congress ought to be required to become a disbursing officer in this way. I do not know of any such case heretofore where it has been done.

Mr. CONGER. Let the resolution be so amended as to provide for a disbursement of this money by the Sergeant-at-Arms or his deputy. I modify my resolution in that way.

Mr. FOSTER. I hope the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] will allow an amendment that will make a similar provision for the committee on southern affairs.

The SPEAKER. There is a committee also going to Alabama. Is there objection to including in this resolution the committee on southern affairs, and the committee which goes to Alabama?

Mr. RANDALL. With the same limitations.

The SPEAKER. With the same limitations. The Chair thinks the resolution had better be drawn anew so as to cover all the cases.

Mr. CONGER. If that be so, let the other gentlemen draw their own resolutions. They have not yet received authority, as this committee has, to have their expenses paid from the contingent fund.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan objecting, the resolution applies only to his own committee.

The resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

INTERNAL TAXES.

Mr. RUSK, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4156) to amend section 35 of the act entitled "An act to reduce internal taxes, and for other purposes;" which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. BURROWS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 4144) providing for the authentication of the Revised Statutes of the United States and for preserving the originals of all laws in the Department of State.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MAYNARD. I rise to move that the House proceed to the consideration of business on the Speaker's table. I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that a bill is lying upon the Speaker's table from the Senate on a subject that we have discussed very much at length in the present Congress, and a subject in which the country is very much interested. Every business man, every man who is at all concerned in the material interests of this country, is interested in the fate of this bill. In going to the Speaker's table my object is to reach that bill, in order that the House may take such action upon it as they may think proper to take at this time, so that we may not leave the bill lying dormant there and let the time pass unimproved in respect to it. If the House think proper to pass it at this time, they will do so. If they think proper to make other disposition of it, they will do so.

Mr. RANDALL. I would remind the House that the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee if carried would reach the civil-rights bill and some other offensive bills.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Tennessee is that the House proceed to the consideration of the business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. MAYNARD. I am willing to modify my motion so that it shall apply to no other bill than the one to which I have referred.

Mr. RANDALL. I would suggest that the motion in the form now suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee is out of order. Such a motion would require unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. If the House should go to business on the Speaker's table any bill can be taken up out of its order only by suspension of the rules or by unanimous consent.

Mr. RANDALL. And a suspension of the rules cannot be moved to-day.

Mr. MAYNARD. I suppose it is in order when we reach a bill for any gentleman to move that its consideration be postponed, and that the bill be laid aside and that we pass to the next bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. When a bill is reached on the Speaker's table, unless there be a general agreement otherwise it must be disposed of; it must be referred, must be laid on the table, or must be passed. It must have some definite action upon it except by general consent. It is very common for the House to go to the Speaker's table on an understanding, and in that case a bill may be laid aside without prejudice to it. But if the House goes to the Speaker's table under the rule, each bill as reached is entitled to be disposed of, and must have a definite disposition made of it.

Mr. BECK. Is it proper to inquire which is the first bill on the Speaker's table?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is a proper inquiry. The first bill on the Speaker's table is a bill (H. R. 1196) to alter and appoint the times for holding the circuit court of the United States for the fourth judicial circuit, and for other purposes.

Mr. CESSNA. I desire to make a parlimentary inquiry. If the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee shall prevail, is it competent for the majority of the House to pass by any bill that may be reached without prejudice to that bill?

The SPEAKER. It would not be, in the judgment of the Chair.

Mr. CESSNA. Could it not be taken up by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. Unanimous consent can do anything under the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. CESSNA. Then I ask unanimous consent that the civil rights bill may be passed by informally without losing its place. We have agreed in committee that it should not be disturbed until after the recess.

Mr. BECK. Why not until after the 4th of March?

Mr. DAWES. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Would it not be in order when any bill on the Speaker's table is reached to move that it be postponed to a certain day?

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly. That is a definite disposition of it.

Mr. DAWES. Then would it be in order as each bill comes up to postpone it until the 1st Tuesday of January?

The SPEAKER. It would; but that does not leave the bill on the Speaker's table.

Mr. DAWES. It disposes of it for to-day.

The SPEAKER. And very likely would dispose of it for all time. In that case the House is only competent to postpone; it is not competent to make the bill a special order.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Would it be in order to move to refer that bill to the Judiciary Committee?

The SPEAKER. It would be entirely so.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Then I desire to make that motion.

Mr. DAWES. If every bill on the Calendar is postponed until the 1st Tuesday in January next, the bills will then stand in the same order as they do now.

The SPEAKER. When they are reached?

Mr. DAWES. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Of course after the morning hour, then the motion to go into Committee of the Whole would leave them subject to any special order or any question of privilege or a motion to reconsider, or any other of the numberless motions which would take precedence.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would make this parliamentary inquiry: Suppose when we go to business on the Speaker's table, and each bill as it comes up is postponed by a majority vote until the 5th of January; then on the 5th of January we proceed to the consideration of business on the Speaker's table; would not this bill be in precisely the same condition then as now?

The SPEAKER. If the House proceed to business on the Speaker's table and upon reaching any bill a majority shall postpone it to the 5th day of January for consideration, that bill will no longer be upon the Speaker's table; that vote would take it off the Speaker's table as definitely as if the bill were laid upon the table. Of course the position upon the Speaker's table is a very advantageous one for a bill to hold.

Mr. MAYNARD. Then I submit this proposition, and ask unanimous consent for it, that we proceed to business on the Speaker's table, and pass by informally every bill until we reach the one last sent us from the Senate.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Why not simplify matters by asking unanimous consent to take the bill from the table for consideration?

The SPEAKER. That is what the Chair was about to suggest. The proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee is tantamount to asking unanimous consent of the House to take up the bill for consideration.

Mr. MAYNARD. I make that request.

Mr. BECK. Pending that I move to adjourn.

Mr. RANDALL. And I will call the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn, in order to ascertain if there be a quorum present. I think there is not.

The SPEAKER. That can be determined by tellers.

Mr. RANDALL. Very well; I withdraw my call for the yeas and nays and call for tellers.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. When we reach a bill on the Speaker's table, can it not be referred to the appropriate committee, with leave to report at any time?

The SPEAKER. That requires unanimous consent, for the times are assigned under the rules for committees to report. If you vary those times it is a suspension of the rules, which requires unanimous consent except on Monday.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. The majority can refer a bill to an appropriate committee?

The SPEAKER. It can.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. And would not a bill so referred occupy as good a position as it does on the Speaker's table?

Mr. CESSNA. Not by any means.

The SPEAKER. What the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SMITH] is aiming at is probably that the bill may be referred to a committee by a majority vote and a motion entered to reconsider. But that is a very long and weary road to travel, for there are a number of bills on the Speaker's table. The rules are very absolute in regard to the disposition of bills on the Speaker's table.

Mr. SENER. I insist upon the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is a motion to adjourn.

Mr. MAYNARD. I suggest that that be taken as a test whether we will go on to the currency bill or not.

Mr. BECK. Not at all.

Mr. ELDREDGE. The gentleman must not think that he is going to take up that bill and rush it through as they did in the Senate.

Tellers were ordered upon the motion to adjourn; and Mr. MAYNARD and Mr. BECK were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 49, noes 92.

Mr. RANDALL. Is that a quorum?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. DAWES. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD,] if he will listen. It is that this bill of the Senate, by unanimous consent, be referred to the appropriate committee with leave to report at any time. That will give the bill proper consideration.

Mr. DAWES. What is the appropriate committee?

Mr. RANDALL. Well, I will leave that for you to struggle about.

Mr. FOSTER. I think we had better go on with the roll-call.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 56, nays 121, not voting 113; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Beck, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Buckner, Caldwell, John B. Clark, jr., Comingo, Cook, Cox, Crossland, Durham, Eden, Eldredge, Giddings, Glover, Gunter, Hamilton, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hatcher, Hereford, Herndon, Holman, Kendall, Lamar, Leach, Magee, Marshall, McLean, Merriam, Milliken, Nesmith, Niblack, O'Brien, Perry, Randall, Read, Robbins, Milton Sayler, John G. Schumaker, Sloss, Stephens, Vance, Waddell, Whitehead, Whitthorne, Willie, Wolfe, and John D. Young—56.

NAYS—Messrs. Albright, Barber, Bass, Biery, Bradley, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Burrows, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Cason, Clayton, Clements, Stephen A. Thomas, Townsend, Wallace, Jasper D. Ward, Wells, White, Whitehouse, Whiteley, Wilber, John M. S. Williams, Ephraim K. Wilson, James Wilson, Wood, and Pierce M. B. Young—112

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. RANDALL. My colleague, Mr. MYERS, is absent by reason of a death in his family; and my colleague, Mr. SPEER, is away in connection with his duty on a special committee.

Mr. SHEATS. My colleague, Mr. HAYS, is absent on account of sickness.

Mr. CESSNA, who had voted in the negative when his name was called, subsequently said: I desire to state that yesterday I paired with the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. FINCK, upon all political questions. This question seems to have taken a political turn; and I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. RANDALL. What are the political sides to this question?

Mr. CESSNA. I think the record will establish that question.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. MAYNARD. I now ask that my proposition be submitted to the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it again.

Mr. MAYNARD. It is that by unanimous consent we now proceed to the consideration of the financial bill from the Senate.

Mr. RANDALL. I make a suggestion similar to the one I made before——

Mr. DAWES. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania object to the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD?]

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, sir; I object for the purpose of making a suggestion.

Mr. DAWES. Then I move to go to business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. RANDALL. Pending that motion I move that the House take a recess for one hour.

Mr. MAYNARD. I make another suggestion, if I may be permitted to do so. It is that, by unanimous consent, the Senate finance bill be made the special order in the House for the 8th of January next, at one o'clock, and from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. DAWES. If the gentleman from Tennessee does not desire to have the bill referred, why can we not act on it to-day?

Mr. LAWRENCE. It is a matter of too much importance to be disposed of in an hour or too.

A MEMBER. And without having the bill before us in print.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not hear of any objection to the last proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is it understood that on the day named the bill shall be subject to debate and amendment?

Mr. DAWES. Is not my motion pending?

The SPEAKER. If objection is made, the motion is that the House proceed to business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. HOLMAN. For my own part, I do not object to the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hear no objection to the proposition I have last made.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not wish to be understood as objecting; but it would seem reasonable that on a measure of this kind there should be full latitude for debate and amendment; and hence it would be suitable for consideration in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GARFIELD. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the question is on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] to go to business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. RANDALL. Pending that motion I move that the House take a recess for one hour.

Mr. DAWES. Pending my motion is it in order to take a recess?

The SPEAKER. Why not?

Mr. DAWES. I make the inquiry of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is.

Mr. DAWES. Then let us have the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. CESSNA. I would like to have the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. RANDALL. Now, Mr. Speaker, we are all ready to agree to the very fair proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD.] There is no objection to it whatever on this side.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the yeas and nays upon the motion to adjourn.

Mr. MAYNARD. I appeal to the House once more. My friend on the opposite side of the House [Mr. RANDALL] has interposed an objection to the consideration of the bill at this time.

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MAYNARD. But I understand that he and his associates are content that it shall be made a special order for the 8th of January next at one o'clock. As that seems to be the best we can do in the premises, I submit——

Mr. DAWES. What is to hinder our going to the Speaker's table now and reaching this bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know anything to hinder.

Mr. RANDALL. We may reach the civil-rights bill.

Mr. BECK. The objection to going to the Speaker's table is that the civil-rights bill will be almost the first measure that will come up.

Mr. DAWES. The civil-rights bill will be postponed by a majority.

Mr. BECK. We do not intend to risk the possibility of the passage of that bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. That bill shall not be an obstacle in the way of gentlemen on the other side; and as to the land-grant bills on the Speaker's table, (which are objectionable to some members,) they will go over on a point of order.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I hope the House will exhibit on this question a little of the backbone that has characterized the action of the Senate, and that we shall sit this matter out if it takes two weeks.

Mr. COX. Do I understand that the bill referred to by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] is before the House in any way so as to be subject to a point of order?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. COX. Then I ask the Chair this question: Is the bill liable to the point of order that it must go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union by reason of its authorizing the issue of bonds?

The SPEAKER. The Chair never rules on hypothetical points. When the bill is reached he will rule, if any point be made.

Mr. COX. I suggest such a point might be made.

Mr. CESSNA. I wish to give notice to the House that if the civil-rights bill should be reached when we go to the business upon the Speaker's table, I shall move to refer it to the Committee on the Judiciary, and then enter a motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman perhaps can get unanimous consent that it shall not be disturbed when reached.

Mr. CESSNA. Very well; I will ask unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks when the House goes to the business upon the Speaker's table the civil-rights bill shall remain without prejudice in its present position.

Mr. ORTH. I object.

Mr. CESSNA. Then I give notice if we go to the Speaker's table I shall move to refer the civil-rights bill to the Committee on the Judiciary and then enter a motion to reconsider.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. But some one may move to lay that upon the table.

The question then recurred on the demand for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 53, nays 112, not voting 124; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Beck, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Buckner, Caldwell, John B. Clark, jr., Comingo, Cook, Cox, Crossland, Durham, Eldridge, Giddings, Glover, Gunter, Hamilton, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hatcher, Hereford, Herndon, Holman, Kendall, Lamar, Leach, Magee, Marshall, McLean, Milliken, Nesmith, Niblack, O'Brien, Perry, Randall, Robbins, Milton Sayler, John G. Schumaker, Sloss, Stephens, Vance, Waddell, Whitehead, Whitthorne, Wolfe, and John D. Young—53.

NAYS—Messrs. Albright, Barber, Bass, Biery, Bradley, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Burrows, Cain, Cannon, Cason, Chittenden, Clayton, Clements, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Corwin, Crounse, Crutchfield, Curtis, Danford, Dawes, Dobbins, Donnan, Duell, Eames, Foster, Freeman, Garfield, Gunckel, Hagans, Eugene Hale, Benjamin W. Hazelton, Hendee, Hooper, Houghton, Hubbell, Hunter, Hurlbut, Hynes, Kasson, Lawrence, Lawson, Loughridge, Lowe, Lowndes, Lynch, Martin, Maynard, Alexander S. McDill, James W. McDill, MacDougall, McJunkin, McKee, McNulta, Monroe, Moore, Morey, Niles, Nunn, Orr, Orth, Packer, Page, Isaac C. Parker, Parsons, Phillips, Pike, Poland, Pratt, Rapier, Ray, James W. Robinson, Ross, Rusk, Scofield, Isaac W. Scudder, Sener, Shanks, Sheats, Sheldon, Sherwood, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloan, H. Boardman Smith, J. Ambler Smith, John Q. Smith, Sprague, Starkweather, Strawbridge, Christopher Y. Thomas, Thornburgh, Todd, Tremain, Tyner, Waldron, Walls, Marcus L. Ward, Wheeler, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, Charles G. Williams, William Williams, William B. Williams, Jeremiah M. Wilson, and Woodworth—112.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Albert, Averill, Banning, Barnum, Barrere, Barry, Begole, Bell, Berry, Bland, Brown, Burleigh, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Carpenter, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Clymer, Clinton L. Cobb, Cotton, Creamer, Crittenden, Crocker, Crooke, Darrall, Davis, DeWitt, Dunnell, Eden, Farwell, Field, Finck, Fort, Frye, Gooch, Robert S. Hale, Harmer, Hathorn, Havens, John B. Hawley, Hays, Hersey, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Hodges, Hoskins, Howe, Hunton, Hyde, Kelley, Kellogg, Killinger, Knapp, Lamison, Lamport, Lansing, Lewis, Lofland, Luttrell, McCrary, Merriam, Mills, Mitchell, Morrison, Myers, Neal, Negley, O'Neill, Packard, Hosea W. Parker, Pelham, Pendleton, Phelps, Pierce, James H. Platt, jr., Thomas C. Platt, Potter, Purman, Rainey, Ransier, Read, Richmond, Ellis H. Roberts, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Sawyer, Henry B. Sayler, Schell, Henry J. Scudder, Sessions, Small, Smart, A. Herr Smith, George L. Smith, William A. Smith, Snyder, Southard, Speer, Stanard, Standiford, St. John, Stone, Storm, Stowell, Strait, Swann, Sypher, Taylor, Charles R. Thomas, Townsend, Wallace, Jasper D. Ward, Wells, White, Whitehouse, Whiteley, Wilber, John M. S. Williams, Willie, Ephraim K. Wilson, James Wilson, Wood, and Pierce M. B. Young—124.

So the House refused to adjourn.

During the vote,

Mr. SHEATS stated that his colleague, Mr. HAYS, was absent on account of sickness.

Mr. CESSNA stated that he was paired with Mr. FINCK, of Ohio, who would vote in the affirmative, while he himself would vote in the negative.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question next recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] that the House take a recess for one hour; on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. MAYNARD. I again submit the proposition that this bill be made the special order for the 8th of January next, to the exclusion of all other orders; and I will annex to it a still further proposition that the Senate bill be printed. I ask that that order be made lest perhaps we shall overlook it. It is important the bill should be printed.

Mr. RANDALL. There is no objection to that.

Mr. MAYNARD. I suppose an order might be made to print the bill by unanimous consent.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. MAYNARD. I renew my motion to make the Senate finance bill the special order for the 8th of January next, to the exclusion of all other orders.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to give notice to gentlemen on the other side, that we will not agree to any motion which will reach the civil-rights bill.

Mr. COX. Who objects to the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. MAYNARD. Gentlemen on both sides suggest I name the 7th, instead of the 8th, of January next, and I so modify my motion.

Mr. DAWES. We have the power when we reach the civil-rights bill to postpone it to a day certain or to refer it to a committee.

Mr. RANDALL. But we have the power to prevent the bill being taken up now, and we do not intend that power shall pass from our hands into those of the other side.

Mr. DAWES. Would not a motion to postpone to a certain day be in order?

The SPEAKER. It would.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, as one of those on this side of the House who have voted against all motions to adjourn or delay business, I beg leave, nevertheless, to suggest to the friends of this currency bill that it is best to accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD.] It seems to me a very fair proposition indeed, and while I oppose motions for mere delay and avoidance, I must say, speaking for myself alone, that I will not vote for the currency bill in question to-day. I positively will not. I hope unanimous consent may be given to the motion to make it a special order for January 8.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks that the bill may be made a special order for consideration in the House for Thursday, 7th January, at the hour of one o'clock, to the exclusion of all other orders, and from day to day until disposed of. Is there objection? If there be no objection that arrangement will be ordered. It is ordered.

Mr. MAYNARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was made a special order; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. MAYNARD. I also ask that the bill may be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and required, as rapidly as practicable, to cause to be coined at the mints of the United States silver coins of the denominations of ten, twenty-five, and fifty cents, of standard value, and to issue them in redemption of an equal number and amount of fractional currency of similar denominations, or, at his discretion, he may issue such silver coins through the mints, the sub-treasuries, public depositaries, and post-offices of the United States; and, upon such issue, he is hereby authorized and required to redeem an equal amount of such fractional currency, until the whole amount of such fractional currency outstanding shall be redeemed.

SEC. 2. That so much of section 3524 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as provides for a charge of 1-5 of 1 per cent. for converting standard gold bullion into coin is hereby repealed, and hereafter no charge shall be made for that service.

SEC. 3. That section 5177 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, limiting the aggregate amount of circulating notes of national banking associations, be, and is hereby, repealed; and each existing banking association may increase its circulating notes in accordance with existing law without respect to said aggregate limit; and new banking associations may be organized in accordance with existing law without respect to said aggregate limit; and the provisions of law for the withdrawal and redistribution of national-bank currency among the several States and Territories are hereby repealed. And whenever and so often as circulating notes shall be issued to any such banking association so increasing its capital or circulating notes, or so newly organized as aforesaid, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to redeem the legal-tender United States notes in excess only of $300,000,000 to the amount of 80 per cent. of the sum of national-bank notes so issued to any such banking association as aforesaid, and to continue such redemption as such circulating notes are issued until there shall be outstanding the sum of $300,000,000 of such legal-tender United States notes, and no more. And on and after the 1st day of January, A. D. 1879, the Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem in coin the United States legal-tender notes then outstanding on their presentation for redemption at the office of the assistant treasurer of the United States in the city of New York, in sums of not less than fifty dollars. And to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to prepare and provide for the redemptions in this act authorized or required, he is authorized to use any surplus revenues, from time to time, in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and to issue, sell, and dispose of, at not less than par, in coin, either of the descriptions of bonds of the United States described in the act of Congress approved July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," with like qualities, privileges, and exemptions, to the extent necessary to carry this act into full effect, and to use the proceeds thereof for the purposes aforesaid. And all provisions of law inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

PACIFIC MAIL SUBSIDY.

Mr. DAWES. I ask that by unanimous consent authority be given for printing the evidence taken by the Committee on Ways and Means in the Pacific Mail subsidy investigation from time to time at their discretion.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

MRS. SUSAN A. SHELBY.

Mr. HAZLETON, of Wisconsin. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for consideration now the bill (S. No. 433) for the relief of Mrs. Susan A. Shelby. This bill has been considered by the Committee on War Claims, and I think there will be no objection to its passage.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Mrs. Susan A. Shelby, of Port Gibson, in the State of Mississippi, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $10,351.02, in full of her claim for cotton captured and sold by the United States.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read three times, and passed.

Mr. HAZLETON, of Wisconsin, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DEVELOPMENT OF MINING RESOURCES.

Mr. LOWE. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. No. 2032) to amend an act entitled "An act to promote the development of the mining resources of the United States," approved May 10, 1872, with an amendment by the Senate, be taken from the Speaker's table, and that the Senate amendment be concurred in.

The amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

In line 1 strike out "fifth section of said act" and insert "section 2324 of the Revised Statutes."

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman will explain the effect of this amendment.

Mr. LOWE. The objection made yesterday was withdrawn. I explained yesterday the object of the amendment, which is merely to refer to the Revised Statutes instead of to the original statute. It makes no new legislation, and it is of importance that it should be adopted before the 1st of January.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is merely a reference to the same law?

Mr. LOWE. Yes, sir.

The amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

Mr. LOWE moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senate was concurred in; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EXPENSES OF THE COMMITTEE ON SOUTHERN AFFAIRS.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee on southern affairs be authorized to draw, through an assistant sergeant-at-arms, $2,500 from the contingent fund of the House for the use of said committee or a sub-committee thereof, and that the assistant sergeant-at-arms be required to file vouchers, approved by the Committee on Accounts, to cover the amount expended by him.

Mr. RANDALL. I would suggest to the gentleman the insertion after "$2,500" of the words "or so much thereof as may be necessary."

Mr. FOSTER. I have no objection to that, and will modify the resolution accordingly.

The resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

RAYMOND'S REPORT ON MINING STATISTICS.

Mr. DONNAN. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the House resolution in reference to the printing of Raymond's report on mining statistics with an amendment by the Senate, that it may go to a committee of conference. The amendment of the Senate changes the number of copies to be printed and gives to Congress none whatever.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The quickest way would be to concur in the amendment. The Senate have reduced the number properly enough.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I do not.

There being no objection, the resolution with the Senate amendment was taken from the Speaker's table and ordered to be sent to a committee of conference.

SPECIAL DISTRIBUTION OF SEED.

Mr. CROUNSE. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for present consideration the bill (S. No. 1009) to enable the Commissioner of Agriculture to make a special distribution of seed.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I object to the present consideration of that bill.

Mr. CROUNSE. Then I move that the bill be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. It would not avail anything if it should.

Mr. RANDALL. Should not this bill go to the Committee on Agriculture?

The bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

ALABAMA INVESTIGATION.

The SPEAKER. The Chair names, as the special committee ordered by the House to make certain investigations in the State of Alabama, Mr. COBURN of Indiana, Mr. ALBRIGHT of Pennsylvania, Mr. CANNON of Illinois, Mr. BUCKNER of Missouri, and Mr. LUTTRELL of California.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the special committee to investigate troubles, &c., in Alabama be authorized to have the assistance of a deputy sergeant-at-arms, and that the expenses of such investigations be provided for out of the contingent fund of the House, and that the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and is hereby, authorized to pay to the Sergeant-at-Arms or deputy sergeant-at-arms the sum of $2,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the expenses of said committee while engaged in the investigation as authorized by the resolution of the House of December 18, 1874, and the receipts of the Sergeant-at-Arms or his deputy shall be proper vouchers to the Clerk in the settlement of his accounts at the Treasury.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUFFINTON,] the chairman of the Committee on Accounts, whether the contingent fund of the House will bear all these drafts?

Mr. BUFFINTON. That is a hard question to answer.

The resolution was agreed to.

CHARLES O. WOOD.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in relation to the claim of Charles O. Wood, of Vigo County, Indiana; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ABSENTEE SHAWNEES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, recalling his report dated 13th of April last, and the claims of absentee Shawnee Indians submitted therewith; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ENLISTED MEN IN ORDNANCE BUREAU.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in relation to the employment of thirteen enlisted men in the Ordnance Bureau; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

CONTINGENT FUND OF POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster-General, transmitting, in compliance with the act of June 8, 1872, a detailed statement of the expenditures made from the contingent fund of his Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REMOVAL OF MODOCS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting an estimate of appropriation to remove Modocs from Oregon and the Indian Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

CENTRAL INDIAN SUPERINTENDENCY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting an estimate of appropriation required to aid and instruct the Indians of the central superintendency; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

APACHE INDIANS IN ARIZONA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting an estimate of the appropriation for collecting and subsisting the Apache Indians in Arizona for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

CHEROKEE LANDS IN NORTH CAROLINA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, in relation to the lands of the North Carolina or Eastern band of the Cherokee Indians, including the draught of a bill for the benefit of said Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ROCK ISLAND BRIDGE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in relation to the clause of the sundry civil appropriation act of June 23, 1874, which appropriates $23,400 to the Rock Island bridge; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ADDITIONAL MESSENGERS IN WAR DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, recommending that the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill be so amended so as to include the employment of two additional messengers or laborers in his office; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

WHITE FEMALE CHILDREN CAPTURED FROM CHEYENNES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, recommending that $3,000 be appropriated from the annuities of the Cheyennes for the support and education of two white female children captured from said Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

INDIVIDUAL CLAIMS AGAINST CHOCTAWS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting certain information called for under the third section of the sundry civil appropriation act of June 23, 1874, in relation to amount of liabilities due from the Choctaw tribe of Indians to individuals; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

FREEDMEN'S AFFAIRS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of the freedmen's branch of the Adjutant-General's Office for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874; which was referred to the Committee on Freedmen's Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CUTTING TIMBER ON INDIAN RESERVATIONS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, in relation to the necessity that exists for some remedial legislation in behalf of Indian tribes or bands living upon reservations, and who by reason of recent decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States are prevented from cutting and selling timber from the land occupied by them; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

BARRACKS AND QUARTERS IN PENSACOLA HARBOR.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the draught of a proposed joint resolution for completing barracks and quarters in Pensacola Harbor, Florida; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CLAIMS FOR INDIAN DEPREDATIONS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with the act of May 29, 1872, sundry claims for Indian depredations; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at two o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Tuesday, January 5, 1875.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BELL: A paper for the establishment of a post-route from Gainesville to Cumming, Georgia, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. DONNAN: Memorial of George W. Cook, praying relief, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. HALE, of Maine: The petition of Mary L. Woolsey, widow of Melancton B. Woolsey, late commodore United States Navy, for relief, to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. ROBBINS: Resolutions of the Legislature of North Carolina, in relation to pensions of soldiers in the Mexican war, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, resolutions of the Legislature of North Carolina, in relation to the New River Canal Company, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana: The petition of Catharine Greybig, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. WADDELL: Resolutions of the Legislature of North Carolina, in relation to pensions of soldiers in the Mexican war, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, resolutions of the Legislature of North Carolina, in relation to the New River Canal Company, to the Committee on Commerce.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 5, 1875.

The Vice-President resumed the chair.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Wednesday, December 23, 1874, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLINTON LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 381) to create an additional land district in the State of Oregon, to be called the Dalles land district, and the bill (S. No. 433) for the relief of Mrs. Susan A. Shelby.

RESTORATION OF MICHIGAN LANDS TO HOMESTEAD ENTRY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 420) to amend an act entitled "An act for the restoration to homestead entry and to market of certain lands in Michigan."

The amendment of the House of Representatives was at the end of section 1 to strike out the words "restore to market" and insert the words "offer for sale at a price not less than $2.50 per acre."

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives. It simply provides that instead of the lands restored to market being sold at the minimum of $1.25 it be $2.50, double the present minimum.

Mr. THURMAN. What lands are they?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Lands reserved some twenty years ago under an Indian reservation and now proposed to be restored, to market.

Mr. THURMAN. Has the bill been before the Committee on Public Lands?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. The bill was passed by the Senate, and the House has passed it with this amendment, providing for the restoration at the price of $2.50 an acre instead of $1.25. There can be no objection to this proposed increase of the revenues.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Did the bill originally come from our Committee on Public Lands?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Yes, it did, and with its concurrence.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I think the bill had better be recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands. I move that it be recommitted to that committee.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I have no other objection to that than that it delays the bill. I think there can be no possible objection to the amendment. I will state in brief the condition of the case. The lands were reserved some twenty years since under a treaty made, I think, in 1855. The privilege of entry of thelands only by Indians expired in 1865, and the lands have been kept from market until this time. The bill provides that there shall be a year granted to actual settlers under the homestead law, and after the expiration of that year whatever land shall remain of the reservation untaken shall then be sold at public sale. The existing law provides that the minimum shall be $1.25. Inasmuch as these lands have been withheld from market for the space of twenty years, it is fairly supposed that the remaining lands are more valuable and will bring more than $1.25 an acre. Therefore the House, in its judgment, has seen fit to increase the minimum to double the present Government minimum. I think there can be no objection, since it will put into the Treasury a larger amount of money than the Senate bill would if passed without the House amendment.

Mr. THURMAN. Where is this land?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. In Michigan.

Mr. THURMAN. How much is there of it?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. There cannot be a great deal left. I cannot say exactly how much. Whatever the amount, the withholding them from entry or sale is prejudicial to the public interest. The bill has been considered by the Committee on Public Lands and reported, and this is an amendment of the House merely increasing the minimum to $2.50 an acre.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I hope the bill will be recommitted. I dare say it is all right, but it is a matter of some consequence.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I withdraw the objection to recommittal if the Senator persists. There is nothing else in the bill, as the committee will find.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move that the bill and amendment be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SPENCER presented the petition of Philip Henson, a citizen of Alcorn County, Mississippi, asking pay for his services during the late war as scout and spy; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SCOTT presented a memorial of the American Iron and Steel Association, protesting against the ratification of the proposed reciprocity treaty with Canada; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented the petition of Henry C. Watterson, of Pennsylvania, praying that the amount paid by him for certain internal-revenue stamps used in his business be refunded; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. LOGAN presented the petition and papers of Henry Greenbaum, president of the German Savings Bank of Chicago, asking a refund of taxes improperly collected on deposits; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of 10,000 soldiers of the late war residing in the State of Illinois, asking the passage of the bill reported from the Military Committee, equalizing bounties; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, presented the petition of Merritt Lewis, late of Company K, Seventh Regiment Michigan Cavalry, praying to be granted an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the petition of the mayor and common council of the city of Burlington, Iowa, asking an appropriation for the improvement of the harbor of that place; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented additional papers in support of the petition of Louis Sterne, of Boston, Massachusetts, praying compensation for services in breaking up whisky rings; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PRATT presented the petition of Lawrence P. N. Landrum, praying an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of Philip Lester, of Washington County, Indiana, praying to be allowed the pay of second lieutenant from the 31st day of March, 1863, to June 30, 1863; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of certain soldiers and sailors, and heirs of deceased soldiers and sailors, of the volunteer forces of the United States, living in the State of Indiana, earnestly urging the immediate passage of a law providing for the equalization of bounties on the basis of $8.33⅓ per month; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MITCHELL. I present the memorial of the Board of Trade of Portland, Oregon, in which they recite that there are vast tracts of unoccupied lands within the undeveloped portion of their State and the adjoining Territories, and that such extent of country can only be made available for settlement by direct railroad communication with those States lying east of the Rocky Mountains. They also say that the early completion of direct railroad communication will be an act of justice to our people, and greatly stimulate agriculture, mining, commerce, and the mechanical arts; will also furnish homes to thousands of immigrants, who will make our country rich by cultivation and by developing its mineral wealth. They conclude in the following language:

> We most respectfully petition Congress to extend such aid, by a guarantee of interest upon bonds or otherwise, as will most surely tend to secure to our people railroad connection with the Atlantic States.

I desire to state, in this connection, a fact that is lost sight of sometimes; and that is that Oregon is the only State in the American Union to-day that is not connected with the remaining States by railroad communication. I move that the memorial be printed and lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAGER. I present a memorial from the Associated Veterans of the Mexican War, memorializing Congress that a small pension be allowed to George W. Ross, and also one to Edward Cox. The memorial is signed by as respectable citizens as I am acquainted with, members of this association, and by others, setting forth the reasons why the pensions should be granted. I move the reference of the memorial to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAGER. I present a memorial from Lieutenant Duane M. Greene, of the Sixth United States Artillery, who was commissioned a captain by the governor of the State of California on February 17, 1863. He had his company, but was delayed being sworn in by reason of some desertions, although he was actually in the service of the United States four months and twenty-three days prior to the time that he drew pay. This is a memorial setting forth the facts, with accompanying vouchers, and asking that pay be allowed for these four months and twenty-three days, for which he has received no compensation, when he was actually engaged in the service of the United States. I move that the memorial and papers be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAGER. I have a resolution of the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco, setting forth the fact that they have been paying money on account of the United States to the extent of $7,383.33 for improving the property of the Government by paving and taking care of the streets in front of the public buildings, whereas by the laws of the State of California such expenses are charged upon the owners of the property. In default of the Government of the United States attending to this matter, the city of San Francisco has had to pay these charges, and this amount has been expended by the city of San Francisco in gold coin and paid on account of the Government, whereas it should have been paid by the Government itself. I move that this resolution be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. SARGENT. I suggest to my colleague that that memorial go to the Committee on Appropriations. The proper place for an appropriation is in the sundry civil bill, and there are a number of precedents for it, as for instance the case of Pittsburgh in a recent bill.

Mr. HAGER. I have no objection to that. I merely suggested the other, because I thought it appropriate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The memorial will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I ask the Senator from California if he knows of any instance where the Government of the United States has been called upon by any other city of the country to pay the taxes that accrue on the streets and avenues in front of the public buildings?

Mr. SARGENT. Yes, sir; I know of a case exactly in point, where the United States did pay, by the sanction of Congress in an appropriation bill, the city of Pittsburgh for improving the streets around the public property on that side of the street which the Government buildings occupied, which I suppose is the provision asked here for San Francisco. I will further state that I know of another precedent in the city of Washington where, the streets being improved in front of the Government property, payment has been made therefor not in one instance only, but in several. I remember another case in the city of Charlestown, Massachusetts, where a similar appropriation was made by the Government. I think I remember a fourth case, also in Massachusetts. The arsenal of the United States is situated at Springfield, and a similar appropriation was made for that. If the question of the Senator from Vermont is as to the justice of the United States paying for the improvement of the streets in front of its own property, streets of which it has the use continually and more use perhaps than the citizens living along them on account of the nature of the use that it makes, I say that I think it is entirely just and proper that such expenses should be paid.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I merely called the attention of the Senator from California, as this would evidently open a very great question and would call for the reimbursement of taxes that have been paid since the foundation of the Government, I suppose, for the improvement of streets in front of public buildings. I consider that the case of this city is not at all a parallel case; and if there are any other cases they are extremely bad precedents, and ought not to be followed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The memorial will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. INGALLS presented a memorial numerously signed by citizens of Dickinson County, Kansas, praying the passage of House bill No. 3281, relating to the issue of patents to land-grant railroads; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented the petition of Dickson Williams, praying to be allowed a pension on account of services rendered by his sons in the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CAMERON presented a memorial of a large number of tobacco dealers of the city of Philadelphia, protesting against any change whatever in the existing laws relating to the taxes on the manufacture of tobacco; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SARGENT presented a petition of citizens of California, praying that the late members of the California Hundred and the California Cavalry Battalion may be reimbursed for additional travel-pay paid by them from their place of discharge from the United States military service in Massachusetts to California; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the petition of John M. Dorsey and William Shepeard, praying for an allowance of a certain claim which they have for supplies furnished to the Government during Indian hostilities in the State of Nevada, then the Territory of Utah; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CONKLING. I present the petition of Moses Taylor & Co., Dollner & Potter, and others, citizens of New York, reciting that they were owners of merchant vessels lawfully pursuing their course on the ocean, which vessels were destroyed by the Boston, Georgia, and other confederate cruisers, among which was the Shenandoah before she arrived at Melbourne; that they, and owners of this description, are excluded by the law as it stands for the distribution of the Geneva award, although they were included in the bill as sometimes proposed. They ask an amendment of the existing law which will include them among the beneficiaries of that fund. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING presented a memorial of the Second Baptist church of New York City, signed by the pastor and officers, asking Congress to prohibit, by appropriate legislation, the manufacture, importation, and sale of all alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia and in the Territories of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. HITCHCOCK presented two petitions of over 100 of the principal dealers in the O street and K street markets, praying the passage of an act incorporating the Capitol, North O Street and South Washington Railway Company; which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. FLANAGAN. I presented a petition the other day for the relief of John G. Tod, captain United States Navy, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. I now ask that it may be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The order to print will be made, if there be no objection.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1068) to remove the limitation restricting the circulation of banking associations issuing notes payable in gold, reported it with amendments.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am also directed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 731) to reduce tax on circulation of State banks to an amount equal to that paid by national banks, to report adversely thereon and recommend its indefinite postponement.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] who is not present takes a good deal of interest in that bill, and I suggest that it go on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 739) to prohibit national banks from loaning money on money as security, and for other purposes, reported adversely thereon, and moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am also directed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 777) to amend the fifteenth and sixteenth sections of the act entitled "An act revising and amending the laws relative to mints, assay offices, and coinage of the United States," approved February 12, 1873, to report adversely thereon and recommend its indefinite postponement.

Mr. SARGENT. I would like to have that bill go on the Calendar, that I may have an opportunity to examine it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 975) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870, have instructed me to report adversely thereon, and I move its indefinite postponement.

Mr. SARGENT. Let that bill go on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1398) to fix the amount of legal-tender notes at $400,000,000, reported adversely thereon, and moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 593) to admit certain sculpture free of duty, reported adversely thereon, and moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1000) amending the concluding proviso to section 3262 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, to report it adversely and ask to have it indefinitely postponed. There is a communication from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue accompanying the bill.

The bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. PRATT, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3193) repealing the act granting a pension to William H. Blair, approved July 27, 1868, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3694) granting a pension to Rebecca W. Taylor, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2355) granting a pension to Ann R. Vorhees, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3017) granting a pension to Jacob Grosch, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2351) granting a pension to John B. Miller, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 580) granting a pension to Rosalie C. P. Lisle, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. SCOTT subsequently said: My attention has been called to an adverse report upon a pension bill made by the Senator from Texas in the case of Mrs. Rosalie C. P. Lisle. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was indefinitely postponed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves the reconsideration of the vote by which the bill was indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT. I now ask that the bill may be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and it will take that direction.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Mary L. Moore, widow of Robert Moore, Company C, Fifteenth Michigan Volunteers, praying for arrears of pension, reported adversely thereon, and asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Margaret C. Wells, praying for a pension, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 1070) granting a pension to Margaret C. Wells.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was recommitted the bill (H. R. No. 3668) for the relief of Smith & Matthews, of Illinois, reported adversely thereon, and moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of the widow of Captain Thomas C. Randolph, praying for a pension, reported adversely thereon, and asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3691) granting a pension to James Burris, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1820) granting a pension to Samuel Henderson, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1953) granting a pension to William D. Morrison, late captain of Company D, Seventh Regiment Maryland Volunteer Infantry, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SARGENT. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3819) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes, to report it back with certain amendments. I give notice that I will call this bill up at a very early day, as soon as I can get the attention of the Senate to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be printed and placed upon the Calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CONKLING asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1071) to advance Lieutenant A. H. M. Taylor, Nineteenth Infantry, on the rolls of the Army; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, that bill was sent to me with a request that I should introduce it. I do introduce it in deference to that request. I move its reference to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1072) making provision for an Oriental college; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1073) for the relief of John M. Dorsey and William Shepeard; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1074) fixing the pay and rank of civil engineers in the Navy; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1075) for the protection of the postal rights of the inmates of insane asylums; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1076) to facilitate the disposition of cases in the Supreme Court of the United States, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HITCHCOCK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1077) for the relief of Dwight J. McCann; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. INGALLS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1078) for the relief of S. K. Thompson, late second lieutenant in the Twenty-fifth United States Infantry; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PRATT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1079) for the relief of William M. Kendall, of Plymouth, in the State of Indiana; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1080) granting a pension to J. W. Caldwell, of Marshall County, Indiana; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MITCHELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1081) to reimburse the State of Oregon for moneys paid by said State in suppressing Indian hostilities during the Modoc war; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1082) granting to the Willamette Valley and Coast Railroad Company a right of way for a railroad through the public lands; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1083) granting the right of way for a railroad and telegraph line to the Puyallup Valley Coal Company, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1084) to establish a post-route in Baker County, Oregon, from Clarksville, via Humboldt Basin, to Rye Valley; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FLANAGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1085) for the relief of Edmund T. Ryan; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLINTON LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (S. No. 650) explanatory of the resolution entitled "A resolution for the relief of settlers upon the absentee Shawnee lands in Kansas," approved April 7, 1869.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 4119) authorizing the Commissioner of the General Land Office to grant a patent for certain land in the Territory of Arizona; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. E. BABCOCK, his Secretary, announced that the President had, on the 24th of December, approved and signed the act (S. No. 1054) reserving for the use of Congress one hundred and fifty copies of the Revised Statutes authorized to be printed by the act of June 20, 1874; and on the 28th of December the following acts:

An act (S. No. 974) to enable the supreme court of the District of Columbia to proceed with its jury business; and

An act (S. No. 1023) for the relief of certain settlers on the public lands.

The message also announced that the President had, on the 29th of December, approved and signed the act (S. No. 926) referring the case of Joseph Wilson to the Court of Claims.

The message also announced that the President had, on the 1st instant, approved and signed the act (S. No. 1043) suspending so much of an act entitled "An act organizing the several staff corps of the Army," approved June 23, 1874, as applies to contract surgeons.

USE OF THE ARMY IN LOUISIANA.

Mr. THURMAN. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States is hereby requested to inform the Senate whether any portion of the Army of the United States, or any officer or officers, soldier or soldiers of such Army, did in any manner interfere or intermeddle with, control or seek to control, the organization of the General Assembly of the State of Louisiana, or either branch thereof, on the 4th instant; and especially whether any person or persons claiming seats in either branch of said Legislature have been deprived thereof, or prevented from taking the same, by any such military force, officer, or soldier; and if such has been the case, then that the President inform the Senate by what authority such military intervention and interference have taken place.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask to hear that resolution read once more.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from Ohio who moved this resolution, although it seems to be here only a matter of form, that he had better conform to the customary phraseology "if in his judgment not incompatible with the public interests," which very likely the Senator means to imply; but that is the rule, and I think it had better be so stated.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not agree that that is the rule. I do not agree that, on a matter which concerns our relations with no foreign power, which merely concerns the domestic affairs of the United States upon a question in respect to the use of the Army of the United States to interfere with the organization of a State Legislature, there is any necessity or any propriety for saying that the President shall not make a communication unless, in his judgment, it is proper to do it. I say that it is for us, in our judgment, to know whether the facts are as suggested in that resolution, and if they are, by what authority this interference has taken place; and it is not for us to submit to the opinion of the President, or the judgment of the President, whether the Senate of the United States shall know the facts, and know by what authority such interference has taken place, if the fact be that there has been such interference.

This is not, sir, a case in which we interfere with warlike movements, although it has wonderfully the semblance of war—not war made by the people, but war made I will not say by whom; I will wait for the facts. It is not a case in which the public can suffer any detriment, in which the Government can suffer any detriment from the Senate of the United States knowing fully what are the facts of the case, and by what warrant of law or pretense of law this intervention, if it has taken place, has been made.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I had no idea of laying the Senator from Ohio under such obligation to me as that which now he owes. Very inadvertently I have given him the opportunity of delivering a most eloquent and perhaps somewhat oppressive speech—oppressive while it was undelivered. I had no idea of affording the Senator such an opportunity or the Senate such a gratification. Whenever this resolution comes to be considered—we have not yet waited to see whether any Senator will object to its consideration to-day or not—I will move, unless some other Senator anticipates me, to amend the resolution by inserting the words which I suggested to the Senator from Ohio, supposing that in this case, as in every other case that has occurred during my service in the Senate or during any period of time which my observation has covered, the suggestion would be readily accepted. I will ask a vote of the Senate upon it in order to see whether the usage ought to be maintained in this case or not. And while upon my feet I will occupy a moment in replying to an observation made by the Senator from Ohio.

He seemed to think that he distinguished this case not only from the mass of cases but from all other cases (for I undertake to say that this usage has not been departed from, when attention was called to it, in any instance) by observing that the topic to which the resolution relates does not concern our relations with foreign nations. Now, I humbly conceive that if there be sense and reason in the rule, which commits something to executive discretion, that reason is no stronger, nay it is less strong, in a case which may involve facts touching our foreign relationships, than it is in many a case, this one for example, touching our domestic affairs. To what does this resolution relate? To the turbulence, to the bloodshed, to the chaos, to the serious disorder of a great community in one of the States of this Union; a community from which the most recent tidings are suggestive and ominous—suggestive of something higher than the mere strife and competition of faction or of party—suggestive of considerations which address themselves to every Senator, not as a partisan, but as he stands upon his oath in conscience to represent the constituency behind him and to be true to the great trust committed to him. Here is a resolution aimed at facts touching such a subject, and the Senator from Ohio thinks that it is too much, even for to-day and for to-morrow, during that time when for aught we know turbulence and defiance to law stalk high-headed in the public way. The Senator from Ohio smiles. Perhaps, Mr. President, it is a very appropriate place and a very appropriate time for the Senator to smile. He said he would wait for the facts. That may be rather a dangerous experiment; because the facts may embarrass him; but as I am in the habit of imitating my distinguished friend from Ohio, I will wait for the facts too. I assert nothing. I say, for aught we know, peace, order, the security of life "and law," as my friend behind me [Mr. EDMUNDS] adds, while we deliberate, and while the Senator from Ohio smiles, are trampled in the mire in the streets of New Orleans. I do not know whether it is so or not; nor does the distinguished Senator from Ohio; but speaking on a day when our information is that uncertainty, danger, grave peril, surround the subject at which he aims his inquiry, the Senator says it is for us who are to wait for the facts—who have no facts upon which we can form a judgment—it is for us to say absolutely that in the twinkling of an eye, before the sun goes down to-morrow, with all the expedition of response to this resolution, it will be right for the President to so act that the telegraph will flash back to New Orleans and all over Louisiana the precise truth in respect of the employment, in respect of the location, in respect of the proximity of that power which, possibly, alone of all the powers that can there be felt, may be able to trammel up the consequences of a disorderly disposition on the one side or on the other.

I submit to the Senate that, unless we are to be driven by the gusts of party heat on the one side or on the other, this resolution is especially one invoking the reason, the prudence, the discretion, which, in all time, has led the Senate, when addressing an inquiry to the President of the United States upon a matter of large public moment, to say in its resolution "if in the judgment of the President this publication will be not incompatible with the public interests," thereby committing to his discretion without the hazard of a discourtesy, without the hazard of an apparent conflict with the Senate, the right to say "this information were better given day after to-morrow, or next week, or a fortnight hence, and not in the midst of the very emergency of this occasion." The Senator from Ohio says, "No; let us send a virtual direction to the President touching the Army of which, besides being President, he is Commander-in-chief; let us send a direction to him forthwith to make exhibit to us, and thereby to all the world, to-day, of what he has done and what officers have done, and what dispositions have been made necessarily foreshadowing what dispositions are contemplated."

Now, sir, regarding as I do very highly, as the Senator knows, his judgment upon all questions to which he applies it, I submit to him that so far from this being the case in which this rule of long continuance—"rule," perhaps, is an ill-chosen word, I had rather say "usage"—so far from this being a case in which this ancient usage, and modern usage, too, should be thrown down, it is conspicuously a case illustrating the fact that there is substance as well as ceremony in invoking the discretion and the responsibility also of the President upon the question whether at a particular day, promptly in response to a resolution, he shall publish, or for the time being withhold, some part of that information which is called for by the resolution. I say while it commits a discretion, it imposes a responsibility. So it does. If, in answer to such a mandate as that, the President sends here information which he knows it is unwise for a day or for a week to disclose, upon the honorable Senator from Ohio and upon me and upon every other member of this body is that responsibility which the occasion logically imposes upon the President of the United States. Therefore, as I say, when we come to consider this resolution, I shall move that it shall be so amended as to be in the customary form and customary substance.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator from Ohio will pardon me for a moment, the Senator from Vermont suggests that I move the amendment now. I do not know whether objection is to be made to considering the resolution or not; but before I take my seat, I will move to insert at the proper place "if in his judgment not incompatible with the public interest."

Mr. SHERMAN. That the Constitution fixes.

Mr. CONKLING. No, I take it, not.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New York, which will be read.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before that amendment is read, I ask the Chair if that precludes an objection to the consideration of the resolution to-day in case it is received?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us act upon it now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. An objection to the consideration of the resolution, the Chair thinks, is yet in order from any member.

Mr. CLAYTON. I do not propose to object to the consideration of the resolution, but I would ask the Senator from Ohio to allow it to be temporarily laid aside for the purpose of taking up the resolution I offered on the 23d day of December.

Mr. THURMAN. No; I will not agree to that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio has the floor.

Mr. CLAYTON. Then I think I must object.

Mr. EDMUNDS. O, no; I would not object.

Mr. CONKLING. I hope objection will not be made.

Mr. CLAYTON. I make no objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection to the consideration of the resolution at this time. It is before the Senate, and the question is on the amendment of the Senator from New York, which the Secretary will read before the Senator from Ohio proceeds.

The CHIEF CLERK. After the word "Senate" it is proposed to insert "if in his judgment not incompatible with the public interest."

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from New York seems to complain that I smiled during his remarks. Why, sir, the Senator is too well read, too well acquainted with the stage and with the drama, not to know that while we weep over the real tragedy, we always smile at the mock-heroic; and really it was the mock-heroic of the Senator, that air of tragedy, that tragic countenance of his without justifiable cause, as it seemed to me, which made me think that he expected us to laugh and not to weep.

But, sir, let us come to the substance of this matter. The Senator says that it is a rule or a usage to submit it to the discretion of the President of the United States whether he will answer resolutions of inquiry like this. Sir, if there is any such usage, I do not know it. I think I am tolerably familiar—not as familiar as the Senator, for he has been here longer than I have been—with the usages of the Senate; but I was familiar with the Senate long before the Senator was familiar with it, and with the usage in Congress long before he had a seat in Congress; and if there is any such usage, I must say I do not know it. In respect to our foreign affairs, it has always been the usage; but that in respect to matters of domestic concern, in a time of profound peace—not in a time of war, but in a time of peace—our resolutions of inquiry are to be subjected to the discretion of the President; and that he is to answer them or not, according to his judgment, or his will, or his prejudices, or his feelings, or his interests, I am not ready to admit. I do not, therefore, concede that there is any such usage as the Senator speaks of applicable to a resolution of this kind; for what is this resolution? Does it ask the President what is to be done with the Army in the future? No, sir; it relates simply to what has taken place, and asks the President to give us a piece of information as to what has taken place. What objection can there be to that? It is that we may not act upon mere newspaper reports; it is that we may not take mere telegraphic dispatches as the evidence of what has taken place, but that we may have official information of what has taken place. It relates entirely to what has occurred; not to movements of the Army contemplated in the future, but to what has occurred—the simple, naked facts. What are the simple, naked facts that are asked for? They are whether any portion of the Army of the United States has been used to interfere with or control the organization of the Legislature of a State. That is a matter of fact and nothing else; and there can be no possible public interest that could prevent the President from answering that question "yes" or "no." It is impossible to conceive of any public interest that could be even prejudiced by the President answering that question truly. How can there be any? You might as well say that the public interest would be prejudiced by asking the President whether or not he had taken an official oath on the 4th day of March, 1873.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY of Michigan, in the chair.) The Chair will remind the Senator that the morning hour has expired.

Mr. THURMAN. I ask that the regular order be postponed and that we proceed with the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and the Senator from Ohio still has the floor.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Subject to a call for the regular order.

Mr. THURMAN. Well, subject to a call for the regular order. I say then it is simply impossible to conceive of any injury to the public interest that can result from the President informing us what took place in New Orleans yesterday. If he answers the interrogatory in this resolution as to whether or not any portion of the Army interfered with the organization of either branch of the Legislature of Louisiana, he simply tells us what ten thousand people, nay, what fifty thousand in the city of New Orleans know. But we ask him to tell us; we ask him to give us official information upon which it will be proper for us to act. We ask him to tell us officially that which the whole people of the city of New Orleans know perfectly well. That is what we desire to know. How can the public interest be prejudiced by his telling us that fact? Then, if that interference did take place, we ask him further to tell us by what authority of law, if any, it took place. Where can there be any injury to the public service in the President pointing out the law under which he claims (if it is claimed that there was law for it) that this interference has occurred? No, sir; it is a wrong precedent to set; it is an abnegation of the right of the Senate for us to submit any such question as this to the mere discretion of the President. We have a right to request him to furnish us this information; and if there is any reason why he ought not to furnish it, it is for him to communicate to us that for reasons of public interest he does not think it expedient to communicate to us the information called for; or, if he see fit, he may send it to us under the seal of secrecy, to be considered by us in secret session. But it is not for us to anticipate any such thing as that.

But I say again, sir, it is impossible, and I defy the ingenuity of man to show me any prejudice to the public interest that can occur from the President answering the interrogatories in the resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask a question?

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish the Senator would inform the Senate if he knows of any instance in which a resolution of this character has been addressed to the President of the United States without the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York?

Mr. THURMAN. I believe that I could find a hundred if I were to take time to look over the Journals.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator remember one at the present time?

Mr. THURMAN. I do recollect more than one.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Name them. Give us one instance.

Mr. THURMAN. I shall give the Senator enough if we are to go into that matter.

Mr. EDMUNDS. One will satisfy me now.

Mr. THURMAN. No; I do not care about being interrupted by that inquiry now. I think I could find enough for the Senator. But if the usage were what the Senator says, it is time that it were abolished, for it is derogatory to the Senate that any such usage should exist. I deny that that has been the usage. It is for those who affirm that it is the usage to show that it is so. I want some Senator to point out to me any possible prejudice to the public interest that can accrue from the President answering this resolution. I want that to be done before I stand here to take my hat in hand and bow my knee before the majesty of the President and humbly solicit him to exercise his judgment, instead of my exercising my judgment, whether he shall communicate to the Senate of the United States facts of such grave moment as those to which this resolution refers.

Why, Mr. President, it does seem to me as if all sensibility on the subject of liberty was being lost in this land. Is Louisiana the only State in which troubles occur in organizing a Legislature? My colleague will remember when the Legislature of the State of Ohio was for more than two weeks without organization under circumstances very nearly similar to those in Louisiana, except that in that case there was no fraudulent returning board in Ohio; for, thank God, we never got to that depth of perdition in that State, and there was no military power; but there were two bodies in the house of representatives with two speakers and business going on before both in the very same chamber. For two weeks the Legislature of Ohio was unable to organize by reason of that state of affairs. What would have been said if the President of the United States, if Martin Van Buren had sent the Army of the United States into that chamber to expel some of the members who claimed seats and to seat the rest? I can tell you, sir, that that force would never have left Columbus if it had been sent there for any such purpose.

But that is not the only instance. Who has forgotten the scenes that took place in the Legislature of Pennsylvania? Who has forgotten the trouble about organizing the Legislature of Pennsylvania on a famous occasion? There what would have been said, what would the venerable Senator before me from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] have said, if at that time the President of the United States had sent the Army of the United States to Harrisburgh to put up one party and put the other down?

Well, sir, there is the same law for Ohio and Pennsylvania that there is for Louisiana. I know very well the excuse under which these things are done. I know very well that there is an idea afloat that, although Louisiana is one of the States of the Union, as much entitled to the rights of a State as Ohio or Pennsylvania or New York, yet she may be trampled into the dust; that a governor may be foisted upon her by usurpation, by the unconstitutional edict of a Federal judge supported by bayonets, and that that first fatal step is to be maintained, although liberty and the Constitution and law may all perish in sustaining it; and that what would not be tolerated in Massachusetts, or your own State, or Ohio, or Pennsylvania for a single moment, may be patriotism, forsooth, and the force of law in the State of Louisiana!

I want to see the facts. I want these facts to come here. I want to know who it is that has called for the use of the Army of the United States to organize a State Legislature. I want to know whether that call makes a case under the Constitution. I want this Senate to sit in solemn judgment upon it. I do not want this matter to be decided by clamor about tumultuous bodies or a tumultuous spirit. Great God, there would be a tumultuous spirit in New York, there would be a tumultuous spirit in Ohio, there would be a tumultuous spirit in Michigan, if either of these States were subject to the same outrage! There would be a tumultuous spirit anywhere. But I do not want this matter to be decided upon any such question as that. It is too grave. It is no less a question than whether this Federal Government shall interfere and deprive the people of a State of their constitutional rights, and shall organize the Legislature of that State not according to her constitution and her laws, but according to the will of a military ruler knowing no obedience to her constitution or her laws.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, it seems to me that the fervor displayed by the Senator from Ohio is rather uncalled for in view of the character of his resolution. He argues this resolution as if it was in the nature of a mandate, as if it was peremptory, as if the Senate of the United States had the power to issue an order to the President of the United States to make a certain report and that he was compelled to obey that order.

Mr. THURMAN. I said no such thing. The resolution is a request.

Mr. MORTON. That was the scope of the Senator's argument. He said we should not get on our knees and ask the President to do this thing. Why, sir, the Senator's resolution gets upon its knees in the very beginning. How does it read?

That the President of the United States is hereby requested to inform—

How is the President to determine whether he will grant that request or not? By simply considering the question whether it comports with the public interest. If in his judgment it should not comport with the public interest to grant this request, he will not do it. Therefore, why did the Senator object to the insertion of the customary phrase employed in resolutions of this kind, when the resolution, as it has been prepared by him, leaves it discretionary with the President whether he will respond to the resolution or not? Therefore, sir, there can be no objection, in point of logic upon the framing of the resolution itself, to the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from New York, because that is involved anyhow. When the President comes to consider the request made by the Senate—and that is all the resolution is—he will consider the other question, whether it is or is not incompatible with the public interest. This is, therefore, a play upon words; it amounts to nothing else.

Now, I come to another matter that, I think, is of more importance.

Mr. CONKLING. Will my friend from Indiana, before he leaves this point, allow me to read a passage from the Manual?

Mr. MORTON. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Ohio remarked that the onus was upon those who sustained this amendment to show that it had been the usage. The Senator from Indiana has asserted, as I did, that it is the usage; and now I will read to him, to show whether he is right or not, from the Constitution, Manual, Rules, and Barclay's Digest, 1874:

A proposition requesting information from the President of the United States, even where reported from a committee—Journal, 1, 31, p. 723—shall lie on the table one day for consideration, unless otherwise ordered by the unanimous consent of the House; and all such propositions shall be taken up for consideration in the order they were presented immediately after reports are called for from select committees; and when adopted, the Clerk shall cause the same to be delivered.—Rule 53.

[The form of resolution contemplated by this rule, as sanctioned by long usage, is: "Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform (or communicate to) this House, if not incompatible with the public interest," &c.]

Now, if the Senator from Indiana will pardon me one further moment, I read from the Journal of the Senate of the 15th of May, 1874, the very last instance that occurs to me in which this question could have arisen, and as my friend from Vermont reminds me, it happens to relate to just such a subject:

On motion by Mr. CLAYTON,

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by him, the 12th instant, calling upon the President of the United States for the correspondence relating to the troubles in Arkansas; and having been amended on the motion of Mr. CLAYTON, the resolution as amended was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interest, all papers and correspondence relating to the troubles in the State of Arkansas that may be in his possession, and not heretofore communicated to either House of Congress.

Inasmuch as here is one instance and a reference to a long usage, perhaps the onus in this case will be shifted now and the honorable Senator from Ohio will take occasion to inform us when it was that this was done in the way he proposes.

Mr. MORTON. The authorities cited by the Senator from New York bear out the argument. There the form states the reason upon which the President would otherwise determine whether he would grant the request or not. If he is requested, it is not a mandate, and he will grant the request or refuse it for the reason that is put in the form. So that my friend from Ohio will see the futility of his argument.

But, sir, I come to another, which I think is a more important matter, and goes beyond the mere phraseology. If we are to have information upon this subject, let us have the whole story, and not require the President to answer upon a particular point. Let us have the whole story; let the whole truth go to the nation, and I think we can bring that out by putting the following addendum to the resolution:

And whether he has any information in regard to the existence of armed organizations in the State of Louisiana hostile to the government of the State, and intent on overturning such government by force.

If the attempt to organize this house yesterday is a part of a conspiracy to overturn the State government of Louisiana, to again cover the streets of New Orleans with blood and with dead bodies, to continue the murders and the massacres which have prevailed in that State for months and for years past, and what the President has done has been in the interest of humanity and to preserve the public peace and to prevent a consummation of this conspiracy; if these are the facts, let the President tell the whole story. We do not want it by piecemeal.

My friend from Ohio treats this as if it was the beginning of trouble in Louisiana. He has not been reading the reports of the testimony taken before the investigating committee the other day. General Ogden—I believe general by virtue of a commission from Mr. McEnery—swore before the House committee the other day that he had an armed organization in the city of New Orleans of about twenty-five hundred men called the White League. I believe he admitted that that organization exists throughout the State of Louisiana. We know what that organization has done in times past; we know what took place on the night of the 14th of September last; we know what took place at Coushatta; we know what took place at Colfax; we know what took place at Vicksburgh the other day. We know that men have been massacred by the score and by the hundred, deliberately murdered. Shall the President shut his eyes to all these facts and permit a conspiracy to be consummated by the organization of a house of a Legislature in direct violation of the laws of Louisiana? If these are the facts, let us have the whole of them; let the whole story come; and if the President is called upon to state any part of it let him state the whole truth. We are always safer in the presence of the whole truth than of a part.

Sir, in view of the fact that murder has been rampant in Louisiana and there is no security for life or for liberty upon the part of a large portion of the population of that State, in view of the fact that the very men by whom they are surrounding New Orleans are covered with blood that has scarcely dried upon their garments and are ready to commit further murders, being duly organized for that purpose, drawn up for that purpose, ready at a moment's warning to precipitate the State into a bloody revolution, the President may have acted with due discretion in whatever he has done. Let us have the whole truth, and I shall be content.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, the times, I fear, are getting a little thick and dusty. I am very much afraid that in some quarters of the country, if they are not losing respect for law, they are losing sight of it. Yet I hoped there were some portions of the country left in which both the light and the love of law still remained. If there be any such portion of the country to be found, it ought to be near the capital. If there be any such locality where this light and this love yet exist, a rational American might hope to find it in the Senate of the United States; or if not so rash as to expect it generally to pervade the Senate, certainly we might expect it in the breast of the honorable Senator from Ohio. He has long shone in this country as a light of the law. It has been his business in various capacities to administer it, and he ought to be an example to the country, and to the Legislature of the country still of that abiding love for law. And yet has he not lost sight of it in a measure this morning? Sir, he has laid upon your desk a resolution calling upon the Executive of the United States for certain information. It is a peremptory request on the Executive to communicate certain information to the Senate. Well, sir, I am not about to say that in the language of the resolution itself there is anything particularly treasonable to law. There is something quite different from the ordinary forms of procedure here, I am very well assured; and in order to bring it more in harmony with the forms of procedure which have obtained here an amendment, very slight in effect I think, was suggested by the honorable Senator from New York. What amendment? Simply to incorporate in the resolution this condition; that the Executive of the United States is only called upon for this information upon the condition that in his judgment it is compatible with the public interest. "No, sir," says the Senator from Ohio, "no such condition as that; this is the Senate; our discretion guides; this call must go to the Executive not conditionally but absolutely; we want to know, and the Executive must therefore tell." Sir, who are we? A respectable body of men, I trust, whether we know anything about law or not; but we are the Senate of the United States, so nominated in the Constitution. What can we do? A variety of things; fill that chair, sir, where you now sit, when it is vacant and the people have neglected to fill it; make some committees; do a variety of things; but we can make no laws for the guidance of anybody; least of all can this Senate make a law which shall guide the acts of the Executive of the United States. And I guess on the whole we had better not try to do that. Let your call go to the President in any terms you please; he will respond to it or not as he pleases. If he judge that it be not compatible with the public interest to give you the information you ask for, he will not give it; and should he withhold the information, "what are you going to do about it?"

Since, therefore, it is pretty evident that you have got to depend upon the discretion of the Executive of the United States for this information, it occurs to me, independent of all questions of law, it is the better part for sensible men simply to address yourselves to that discretion at once. Therefore, when called upon to vote on the amendment of the honorable Senator from New York, I shall vote for the amendment and not against it. And yet, sir, I do not want to forget to say before I sit down that I heartily re-echo one declaration made by the honorable Senator from Ohio. He says there is no reason, there can be no reason why we should not have the information, that it cannot prejudice the public interest for the President to communicate this information to the Senate. I concede that the honorable Senator from Ohio is entirely right. I want the information. I believe giving the information will promote the public interests and not prejudice them. I do not know what that information is; I do not suppose the President knows yet accurately. I trust he will be fully informed on the subject before long.

I am well persuaded from reading the morning papers that a portion of your Army found employment yesterday in the city of New Orleans where it ought to have found no employment. I do not know what it was about. The language of the resolution seems to assume that it was employed to prevent the organization of the Legislature of Louisiana. I hope it will not turn out so; but if it was so, I want to know it. I very much fear it will turn out either that your Army was employed in New Orleans yesterday to prevent the organization of the Legislature of that State, or that it was employed for that other purpose, to expel from the State-house of Louisiana the miscreant mob collected there, in defiance of all law, to override the Legislature of Louisiana. I guess when you get the facts before you, it will turn out that the Army was employed for one or the other of these two purposes; and for whichever it was, the people of the United States have a pressing and an urgent need to know. So I want the resolution to go to the Executive if it is thought better to address it to the Executive. I myself should have thought it best to address such a call to the Secretary of War; but I have no sort of choice. I want the facts.

Mr. President, there has been a great deal said in the press, on the hustings, and about the hotels within the last few years about Federal usurpations here and there in the States. The honorable Senator from Ohio, if I did not misunderstand him, seemed just now to take it for granted that the Army of the United States, or a portion of it, yesterday was employed in New Orleans for a purpose for which if it had been employed in the capital of his State it would have left baffled and defeated. It may be so; but I hope it will turn out—and I have an abiding faith that it will turn out—when you get the facts that the Army of the United States executed no duty in the city of New Orleans yesterday that it would not have executed just as promptly in the city of Columbus, in the State of Ohio. If it did expel a Legislature from the State-house yesterday, then it did a great wrong; and I should hope it would never be called upon to discharge that duty and never would attempt it in the city of Columbus; but I say again that I have an abiding faith that the Army was not employed for any such purpose in New Orleans yesterday.

I am not going to attempt to sum up this mass, this mountain of contradiction which is called "the Louisiana question," this morning; but I am not going to leave the floor until I have said that I have seen no evidences of Federal usurpation in the State of Louisiana. I am ready to see that evidence whenever you show it to me. But as yet proof has not been forthcoming; and, having paid some very careful attention to the history of these transactions, I have come to the very settled conviction that there can be no proof adduced of such usurpation.

But I take my seat simply remarking once more that I want no delay in calling for information. I want the fullest information. I will abide by my share of responsibility, no matter what the facts may show that share to be; and I hope every other Senator will be equally ready to shoulder his share of the responsibility. I want to say also before I sit down that if it should turn out, after all, that the Army was not employed yesterday in New Orleans to prevent the organization of a Legislature, but simply to aid the organization of a Legislature, and that it was put in motion upon the direct call of the executive of that State, the Legislature not being in session; that the President was simply discharging a duty which he has sworn to discharge and which the Constitution delegates to him, I hope the honorable Senator from Ohio, although he does not belong to that political party which elected the present Chief Magistrate, will not be among those who will cry "on" to all the party dogs which are willing to bark when they hear the cry. If it shall turn out that the Executive has been simply trying to discharge according to the best light furnished him a duty which the Constitution, as the Senator knows, devolves upon him, I take it he will allow him undisturbed by clamor to go on with the discharge of that duty.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, the resolution offered by the Senator from Ohio, I presume, is predicated upon the information which is contained in the public press of the country that there was yesterday in the city of New Orleans military interference with the organization of the Legislature of Louisiana. That information has been communicated to the country by telegrams sent from New Orleans, and published in almost all the papers of the country this morning; and the Senator from Ohio very properly, as I conceive, not desiring to act upon mere newspaper rumors of the day, offers in his place in the Senate Chamber a resolution respectfully requesting the President of the United States to communicate to this body information on that subject, to tell us whether there was any interference by the military authorities of the country for the purpose of preventing or interfering with the organization of either house of the Legislature of Louisiana; and then, if that has been the fact, what is the authority, where is the law which justified such intervention? That is the purport, the sum and substance of the resolution offered by the Senator from Ohio.

I repeat, sir, that in my judgment that resolution was not only proper in itself, but it was eminently proper in the uncertainty of the information we possess and demanded by the circumstances in which we find ourselves placed this morning. If the facts stated in the newspapers be true, then I apprehend the duty devolves on the Senate and the Congress of the United States to provide a remedy against the recurrence of similar action hereafter, and it was eminently proper, therefore, in the Senator from Ohio, before proceeding to take any steps looking to the correction or application of a remedy for such an evil, to know definitely from the President himself whether the information contained in the newspapers was true.

But, sir, says the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE,] the President of the United States would answer at his pleasure, and if he concludes not to reply to your mandate, "what are you going to do about it?" Sir, that is strange language to be used in the Senate of the United States, that if a public officer of this country, high or low, has violated the law of the land, has trampled upon the Constitution of his country, has attempted a usurpation which subverts liberty and tramples it in the dust, forsooth, because he may fail to respond to a respectful inquiry of the Senate of the United States, we are to be contemptuously inquired of, "What are you going to do about it?" Why, sir, I hope the time has not come in this country when any ambitious Cæsar may bid defiance to the popular will of the country or may bid defiance to the will of the Senate and of the other House of Congress.

"What are you going to do about it?" I say to the Senator from Wisconsin, if the facts be as alleged in the papers, if the statements intimated and suggested in the resolution of the Senator from Ohio be true, whether the other side of this Chamber is willing or not to apply a remedy, the American people will find a way to deal with the question. I hope the time has not yet come when any Cæsar may clothe himself in his robes or his purple and bid defiance to the American people or to the Senate of the United States.

"What are you going to do about it?" Why, sir, if Cæsar attempts to wrap the purple about him, I say in the name of public liberty let the American people tear the robes from him.

The Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] in discussing this question, refers to the action of the 14th of September. Ah, sir, I do not wish to enter into that question now; but I say that when the people of this country are attempted to be reduced to slaves, whether it be in Louisiana or Indiana, whether it be in New York or in Delaware, I shall glory in that spirit of freedom that will impel them to rise in the majesty of their own strength and assert their own rights in defiance of Federal interference.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Certainly.

Mr. HOWE. I simply want to understand the honorable Senator from Delaware. He is attempting, if I understand him, to answer my inquiry, which was, in case the President should refuse to answer our call for information what would we do about it? Do I understand him to say that in case the President refuses to answer he would call upon the people to take his robes off?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have answered the Senator's question. I said the American people would find their own remedy. I did not say that I would call upon the American people to do anything. It is not necessary to call upon the American people for any purpose. The American people have a way of dealing with their own questions. But the Senator says——

Mr. HOWE rose.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I dislike to be interrupted. But the Senator says he has heard of no Federal interference; he has seen no interference. I believe that was his language. I retort "there is none so blind as he who will not see." Has there been no Federal interference in Louisiana? Was not Kellogg placed by the decree of a Federal court, sustained by Federal bayonets, upon the throne that he occupies? Has there not been Federal interference for the last two years in sustaining the usurping government over the people of Louisiana? And yet the Senator from Wisconsin is so oblivious to every fact that he can see no Federal interference. Sir, the people of this country have seen it; the people of this country have responded to it, and in the elections which occurred last fall the very usurpation of the President in the Southern States had much to do with forming public opinion in opposition to his party and with casting the ballots of the people in condemnation of it. The Senator from Wisconsin may not have seen it. The people of this country have seen it and have replied to it. And if the Senator cannot see that there has been any Federal interference, I do not know how I can hopefully at least address myself to him; but I say this resolution ought not to be amended; it ought to go at once to the President, and I have no question that the President, as in duty bound, will promptly respond to a respectful request on the part of the Senate of the United States.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I had not intended to discuss the merits of this resolution or to say one word in this debate; but the remarks of the Senator from Delaware, at least one or two sentences which he uttered, carry me back some days beyond this time; and it seems to be an attempt at a revival of the revolutionary sentiments which were uttered in this Chamber in days gone by.

What is the question we are considering, and why should that question draw forth sentiments of the character that we have heard expressed here this morning? A resolution of inquiry is offered requesting the President of the United States to give certain information to the Senate of the United States, with the amendment proposed "if not incompatible with the public interest," which is in accordance, as I understand, with precedents and the usage of the Senate; and another amendment is to be offered, I understand, asking that the President shall give all the facts not only in connection with the use of the Army or a portion of it yesterday in New Orleans, but the facts in connection with that which has transpired in Louisiana preceding the action of yesterday.

I was struck this morning with the anxiety which seems to weigh on the minds of some of our friends on the other side of the Chamber in reference to the outrages in the State of Louisiana perpetrated yesterday. I was struck with the facility with which they came forward with their resolutions of inquiry to ascertain why the power of the Army was used yesterday, whether in sustaining the law, whether the Army was used in sustaining an officer of the Legislature of Louisiana in performing his duty, that a Legislature might be organized, when the mob was so fierce that the officer would not be permitted to perform his duty; and not that merely, but why it was used at all; and its use is charged as an interposition on the part of the Army, at the instance of the President or some officer of the Government, without any authority of law whatever.

If our friends had advanced to the work as courageously a few weeks ago or when this session was first organized as they have this morning, there would be some reason for us to believe and to have confidence in the fact that they were in earnest and desired to ascertain where the right or the wrong exists in the State of Louisiana. But was either the Senator from Ohio or the Senator from Delaware so prompt when the news came that one hundred men were slain—slain without any provocation; murdered in cold blood while emerging from a court-house where they had been barricaded? Who then offered a resolution to know where oppression was, where wrong existed, and why it existed, and why these outrages were perpetrated? Not from that side of the Chamber, Mr. President.

When Mr. Penn, with ten thousand armed men in rebellion against his State, overturned a State government, and assumed an authority there not delegated to him by law, assumed authority unauthorized entirely, who on that side of the Chamber asked to inquire why Mr. Penn had not been arrested for treason? Who on that side of the Chamber asked the question why a rebellion in a State had been permitted without some attempt, at least, on the part of the authorities, to have men tried for the crimes they had perpetrated against the laws of the country? Not one, sir! Silence pervaded that side of the Chamber as it does the grave. No voice was heard then to inquire why treason against the State should stalk forth in the land. Not a voice was heard then, sir.

A few days ago some seventy-five unfortunate colored people were murdered, who I presume it would be said were running hastily against bullets that the people having guns in their hands could not avoid discharging on account of their running headlong against them; but they were murdered, and a portion of them, according to the testimony taken, remain unburied until this day. What voice, then, was heard on that side of the Chamber to check the wrath of the White Leagues, and to stop the murders that were practiced against men merely because they believed in republicanism in this country?

I ask those Senators why it is that while murders are being perpetrated by "White League" democrats (for democrats they are) against men whose only offense is that they believe in the perpetuity of republican institutions, that no voice is heard in this Chamber to challenge the wrong that is perpetrated by their friends? Men cannot say either here or elsewhere that these wrongs are perpetrated by republicans. You, gentlemen, sit silent here; and your silence and your acquiescence and your defense of every wrong that is perpetrated upon the unfortunate man, poor though he may be, colored though he may be, indicate what there is in your hearts.

It is unnecessary, if I may be permitted to say it, for men to keep it disguised here to-day that there is an organization in some of the Southern States as determined now as they were in 1860 and 1861 to overthrow either this Government or at least some of the State governments; yes, determined to usurp the power at the ballot-box, determined to take possession of those States, determined to murder and slaughter for the purpose of getting political power in their hands. While men acquiesce in it, while men sustain it by their silence, while men defend it by their actions, there is no use in talking to this people about love of country or about patriotism.

The Senator from Delaware said that if a Cæsar has risen his purple robe should be torn from his body. Has the Senator from Delaware become the Brutus of this day that he should be the man to tear the purple from around Cæsar that the country may applaud? "Noble Brutus" might be expressed by some, but the murmurings of the mass would be too loud for his pleasure. Again he said that if——

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator allow me a word?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am very much obliged to the Senator at all times for noticing what I say; but I do not care that the measure of my patriotism shall be determined by the Senator from Illinois. I hope my acts and not the judgment of the Senator from Illinois will be the measure of my patriotism.

Mr. LOGAN. I am only dealing with the expressions of the Senator. I do not know what his meaning was. I only understand the import of the language he used.

But again he remarked—and he can have an opportunity to explain this remark—that unless these usurpations, as he called them, ceased to exist, the people would rise in their power and shake off this oppression that now exists. What does he mean by that? Does he mean they will do it through the ballot-box, or does he mean a revolution will take place and those in power will be driven from power by force of arms? Is that what he means? I should like to know.

On the 14th of September, Penn, with his ten thousand men arose, as the Senator suggests, and overturned the State government of Louisiana. Is that what he means? Does he mean that rebellion and revolution are to be indorsed in this land at this day? I desire to know. We all would like to know. The people everywhere would like to know whether he means that the forms of law shall be observed in changes of power in this country, or whether he means that force shall be resorted to for the purpose of producing results that gentlemen desire.

Now, Mr. President, I am as much in favor of having that information asked for as any Senator in this Chamber, without giving any opinion as to the right or wrong, for I have none to give until I hear the facts, and I should like to hear them for the purpose of forming a judgment and deciding thereon. This is a question in reference to the exercise of certain power, whether delegated to the officers or authorities of the Government or not, or if delegated whether exercised in accordance with that authority. I should like to know myself as to that; but at the same time that we ascertain that, I should like to know, as the Senator from Indiana has indicated by his amendment, the other facts in connection with this, and to know what the meaning of all their conduct is. Let me now say that I do not propose myself any means of arriving at power in the people or in a portion of the people except through legalized and constituted modes. I am no revolutionist in any sense; but I warn my friends on the other side of the Chamber against one thing: Your friends have got to stop their bloodshed and murder. If they do not, I tell you they will be made to do it; and if your friends do not stop their murders, their assassinations, and the bloodshed that they are causing in the Southern States, the Army or any other lawful power should be used to make them do it; and the men that stand by and sustain them in these horrible and damnable crimes are no better than the perpetrators of the offense. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

Mr. TIPTON. Mr. President——

Mr. THURMAN. Will my friend allow me one moment to read an authority or two which I was challenged to produce?

Mr. TIPTON. I yield.

Mr. THURMAN. I read a resolution adopted by the Senate of the United States on the 11th of December, 1833:

The following motion, submitted by Mr. Clay, was considered:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate a copy of the paper which has been published, and which purports to have been read by him to the heads of the Executive Departments, dated the 18th day of September last, relating to the removal of the deposits of the public money from the Bank of the United States and its officers.

On the question, "Shall this resolution pass?"

It was determined in the affirmative—yeas 23, nays 18.

On motion by Mr. Forsyth,

The yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative, are—

Messrs. Bell, Bibb, Calhoun, Chambers, Clay, Ewing, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, Mangum, Naudain, Poindexter, Prentiss, Prestou, Robbins, Silsbee, Smith, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson, Webster.

Those who voted in the negative, are—

Messrs. Benton, Brown, Forsyth, Grundy, Hill, Kane, King of Alabama, Moore, Morris, Rives, Robinson, Shepley, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tyler, White, Wilkins, Wright.

The Senate will perceive that there is no such qualification in that resolution as the Senator from New York contends is necessary.

Mr. CONKLING. Was any attention called to the point? Was the question under consideration at all?

Mr. THURMAN. I do not suppose it was, because it was not the usage at that day to insert any such thing, as the Senator will see if he looks into it. Now I will come down to another resolution, and I beg the Senator from Vermont to give his attention while I read this, which is of a little later date—1868. Certainly no one knows the usages and rules of the Senate better than the Senator from Vermont. I read from the Journal of 1868:

Mr. EDMUNDS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate whether he has established or ordered the establishment of any new military department since the 1st day of August, 1867; and, if so, what department or departments, and under what statute or other authority.

That is directly in reference to the Army.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Did anybody raise the point then?

Mr. THURMAN. Nobody imagined that if the Senator from Vermont offered a resolution it was not in due form. It would have been a contempt of the Senate for anybody to have made such a suggestion. [Laughter.]

Now, I offer another precedent, though the Senator from New York said—or perhaps it was the Senator from Vermont—said that one would suffice. Here is a resolution offered by another Senator who has been a long time a member of this body and who is quite remarkable for his knowledge of its rules and its usages:

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate any information in his possession relative to the unauthorized occupation or invasion of, or encroachment upon, the Indian Territory, so called, by individuals or bodies of men, in violation of treaty stipulations.

I believe I could verify what I said before, that I could produce a hundred such resolutions from the Journals of the Senate. I was told that if I could produce one, it would be sufficient.

Mr. CONKLING. If I may be allowed by the Senator who has the floor—I think the Senator from Nebraska—I should like to occupy a moment in reply to the Senator from Ohio.

The Senator from Ohio always has the ability to astonish the Senate, and but a very small part of the genius he universally displays would be enough to astonish me. Therefore I have no right to claim attention to the fact that I am surprised at the last performance of the honorable Senator from Ohio. He sat long upon the bench; he adorned it. He decided a great many cases. I should think from the spirit he evinces this morning that he may have sometimes regretted that he could not beat both sides; and I have no doubt he always did beat the side which he thought should be defeated. Now I wonder what that honorable Senator sitting upon the bench, with judicial distinction covering him as I know it used to do, would have thought of any man with a sheep-skin in his pocket who had risen before him to demonstrate a point upon authority and had cited cases in which the question never was raised and never was thought of at all. Had he been able to cite a long succession of instances amounting to a current of authority in the language of the books, establishing a uniform, settled usage, then the honorable Senator from Ohio would not have been surprised at such citations; but suppose some enterprising counsel, searching over a period from 1833 to 1875, had been able to find three sporadic instances in which the ordinary form of a writ or a precept or an order had been varied by the omission of certain words, and had then proceeded to convince the court and summon the court to surrender to the conclusion that these omitted words, although stated in a rule, although observed in the usage of the court, although commonly found in its judgments and its records, and although uniformly planted in its proceedings whenever attention was called to it, were really not only matters of "tithe and cumin" having no reference to weightier matters but were really a foreign substance wherever they appeared and had no business to be found!

Mr. President, I ventured to say to the Senator from Ohio that I would like to see an instance when the point was in question, when it was a point in judgment, where the Senate ever acted otherwise. In reply to that he reads three random cases where nobody seems to have thought of it one way or the other, and he commences in 1833. Now let me begin in 1827 on the 3d of January:

The following motion, submitted by Mr. Parris, was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate, (so far as may be compatible with the public interest,) any information in his possession relative to any alleged aggression on the rights of the citizens of the United States by persons claiming authority under the government of the Province of New Brunswick.

Now, the Senator from Ohio wants to say that this touched our foreign relations, and therefore I save him the trouble of rising by calling attention to that fact. He wants to put this case now upon that ground. Let us see. On the 17th of April, 1862, this very question that we are now discussing arose in this Chamber. It was not an instance in which a certain form unobserved passed sub silentio, as this might have done. A Senator near me remarked that he did not observe at all that these words were omitted, and assumed that they were there until attention was called to their absence, although he had heard the resolution read twice. It was not an instance, I say, of a form being adopted sub silentio, perhaps by inadvertence in the draughtsman of the resolution; but it was this case:

Mr. GRIMES. I offer a resolution calling for information, and ask that it be considered now:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate the testimony and judgment of the recent naval court of inquiry in the case of Lieutenant Charles E. Fleming, of the United States Navy—

The Senate will observe that that was not very foreign in its relationship—

Also the testimony and finding of the naval retiring board in the case of said Lieutenant Fleming; and that he be also requested to inform the Senate whether or not the judgment and finding aforesaid have been approved by him.

Mr. SUMNER. Should not that be with the limitation, "if not inconsistent with the public interests?" I believe it is not the habit of the Senate to make a positive call on the President without that limitation.

There was a Senator, too, of somewhat long standing in his service here and somewhat instructed in the forms of parliamentary proceeding, and in the substance as well as the properties of parliamentary law. Further on in the debate—

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I understood the Senator from Massachusetts to suggest that the resolution should be so amended as to embrace the words which are ordinarily used when this body addresses the President, asking for information, as an independent and co-ordinate branch of the Government—

Not "when they ask about foreign affairs," but "which are ordinarily used when this body addresses the President, asking for information, as an independent and co-ordinate branch of the Government—"

I move that the resolution be amended by inserting the words "if in the judgment of the President it shall be deemed compatible with the public interest."

The amendment was agreed to.

There I present the Senator from Ohio a case, as he as a lawyer uses that term—not an instance, in which it seems that no attention was attracted to a point and no consideration given to it and which therefore proves nothing one way or the other beyond the inadvertence of an occasion.

The Senator read quite recent authorities. I will read one—an authority which should be of the very highest standing, a resolution drawn by a Senator who, I read in the public prints, disputes with the honorable Senator from Ohio the leadership of that great organization in which he shines as such a lustrous light. On the 10th of February, 1874—

Mr. BAYARD submitted the following resolution for consideration; which was ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That the President be, and hereby is, requested to inform the Senate, if not inconsistent with the public interest, whether any commissioned officer of the United States Army, while on duty in the State of South Carolina, has received or attempted to procure, &c.

I need not read the body of the resolution. That was as late as the 10th of February, 1874.

Now, Mr. President, I submit that the Senator from Ohio is in this position: He started with denying that there was such a usage, denying that there was such a rule; he started with denying that precedents could be found; he hears read a rule of the House establishing this form; he hears read a commentary of the compiler of the Manual of the House that that is the usage; he has presented him a record showing that whenever attention has been called to it the Senate has so affirmed, and he retreats and perches upon the position of an advocate who finds a sporadic case in which the point was omitted altogether and seeks to vindicate himself in that way!

This is not a very important matter. The Senator from Wisconsin struck through the bark into the marrow of this subject when he reminded us that we, one-half of Congress, are calling upon the whole of another branch of the Government, with rank in the Constitution equal to both Houses of Congress put together, for information touching his ministration of duties committed to him and not to us by the Constitution. I know that that magistrate has the courage as he has the truth to send this information to the Senate or to withhold it temporarily, just exactly as he judges upon his conscience or his oath will best conserve the public interests. And therefore this question degenerates into one of form; but as I have some respect even for the forms and the methods in which the Senate proceeds, I thought it worth while to move, and I think it well for the Senate to adopt this amendment; and before taking my seat I beg to say a word to the Senator from Ohio, who observed, if I remember rightly, about "mock-heroics." That observation was made so long ago that as far as it is possible to me to forget anything that falls from the illustrious Senator from Ohio, it was growing somewhat faded in my memory. He talked about mock-heroics and seemed to think that somebody was playing a part, or preparing to play a part, to dissemble or cloak something touching this matter in the State of Louisiana. I say to that honorable Senator now, for the sake of brevity and relieving him from any prolix discourse, that he is no more anxious than I am that the truth, the very truth to the uttermost, shall be known seasonably and in order, touching the doings in the State of Louisiana and the mighty murders that have there proceeded. There may be some mock-heroism about that; but when I remember the history of the last few months, I think I shall be pardoned for speaking in a grave tone of voice of what is supposed to have occurred in the State of Louisiana. I say to the Senator that he is no more anxious than I am to know the truth, and if possible to have the truth carried to the habitations of the rich and to the cabins of the poor, from sea to sea and from the North to the South, so that all will know the truth. I have no doubt of the valuable contributions to just history which will be made by the honorable Senator from Ohio, and I say to him that when we have a response to this resolution, or when otherwise we possess ourselves of the facts touching the condition of things in the South since the adjournment of the last session of Congress, I venture to predict that that honorable Senator will not be compelled to stand alone in the discussion of the question involved, and that he will not find those whose political sympathies are with the Administration retreating to the wall, or indulging in mock-heroics, or endeavoring by any trick or device to stifle the most thorough discussion which the honorable Senator will give if he puts this whole subject upon the anvil and hammers it out so thin that it can be seen in its nakedness and reality not only in the Senate, but far beyond the assemblage which the honorable Senator from Ohio seems so ready and so anxious to address on this subject.

I will vote for the resolution; I will assist him to get all the information; and should the honorable Senator need any aid of a character which I can possibly afford him in illuminating and bringing out in bold relief the facts after we get them, I promise him he has only to command me and I will follow, at a distance and with unequal footsteps of course, but still zealous, in the direction in which he goes if the publicity of the truth be really his purpose.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I have no doubt whatever that when the debate shall take place, which I imagine is inevitable, on this question, we shall hear from the Senator from New York, for power yet never lacked advocates, and we all know that the Senator from New York is the leader here on the side of power. But notwithstanding that, and notwithstanding his notability, I say to him that the gage that he throws down will be accepted and that this matter will be discussed, and discussed too with a determination to arrive at the truth, and discussed too with a determination to have a judgment upon the truth whenever it shall be ascertained. So much for that.

Again, Mr. President, a great deal has been said here about murders, outrages, and the like. Why, sir, liberty never has been overthrown yet in a free country, except under the pretense of putting down anarchy. The world over, wherever free institutions have been destroyed and despotism has taken their place, it has always been under the pretense of putting down anarchy; and it is nothing but this old pretense, old as history, or at least old as free institutions, that we hear now in this Chamber to justify the most plain and flagrant usurpation, and the most plain and flagrant violation of the Constitution, if the facts are as they are said to be, that was ever seen in this land or in any other free country.

Sir, there is nothing new in this cry of anarchy, murder, and the like. It is the old cry, the old pretense, and the old defense of despotism ever since history was written, or at least ever since free institutions existed. I am not terrified by that. I do not stand here to defend outrages of any kind. I do not stand here to defend homicides that are unjustifiable. No member of the Senate, on this side or on the other, has stood here for any such purpose as that; and it will not do to attempt to defend or to evade the condemnation of flagrant infractions of the Constitution and overthrow of the rights of a State by talking about homicides that have been committed in violation of law. When those homicides come to be investigated, and when the state of society out of which they grow comes to be understood, and when the causes for that state of society come to be known to the American people, I do not undertake to say what will be their judgment, but I do know that they will find that there are two sides to the question.

But enough of that. I did not rise to speak on their merits now, but upon this incidental question. I know the skill with which my friend from New York always diverts attention from the main question to get up some side issue, and he rolls this matter about the form of the resolution under his tongue as if it were a sweet morsel. I thought I was challenged to produce a single instance in which a resolution had passed the Senate asking for information of the President without the qualified remark, "if compatible with the public interests." I produced three. The Senator says they are sporadic cases, random cases. Did the Senator listen to the first, to the resolution offered by Mr. Clay in 1833, in what was known as "the panic session" of Congress? Perhaps the Senator is too young to recollect, but I can recollect when it was talked of in the streets of Baltimore and Philadelphia that armed men would march to this capital to compel a restoration of the deposits or to depose Andrew Jackson by force from the presidential chair. It was at that time, when a state of feeling existed in the Senate that never existed before and never has since, when nearly one-half of the Senators did not speak to each other, so strong was the excitement—it was at that session, which Mr. Clay commenced, I might almost say, with that memorable clause of his speech arraigning Jackson, "We are in the midst of a revolution, bloodless as yet, but tending fast to the concentration of all power in the hands of one man"—it was in that fiery season, when Clay was forging his weapons of attack against the Administration, that he offered the resolution which I read and which was to furnish him with one of the chief instruments by which he was to assail the President of the United States. And yet the men who defended the President, such men as Benton, such men as Grundy, never for one moment suggested that that resolution needed any qualification, although it was in relation to a paper read by the President to his Cabinet and which it might be supposed the Senate would not ask him to communicate to it. Was that a random resolution? Was that a sporadic case? Was that a thing that would pass sub silentio, without any observation or notice—that resolution which was debated and debated furiously, upon which the yeas and nays were called and which passed only by a strict party vote? No, sir, that will not do.

But let us note a few more instances. The Senator says it has been the usage of the Senate to insert this qualification. How does he prove that it has been the usage of the Senate? By producing a long series of resolutions containing this qualification? No, sir, but by reading an extract or scrap from Barclay's Manual. I believe it is a book that was compiled for the House of Representatives. It may be a very good book, for aught I know. I do not trouble myself much about rules. The Senate has such good sense as not to trouble its members much about rules, but puts each man on his honor and propriety as a gentleman, which is a great deal better than having a body of rules; and therefore I cannot undertake to say what value is to be attached to that book. But did the Senator produce a long series of resolutions in the Senate showing that it was the usage to put any such qualifying words in? Not at all. He only assumed it. I showed some to the contrary. Let us look at a few more. I will not detain the Senate long, because I agree this is not much of a matter, and I do not want our attention diverted from the main subject to this side-play. Here, sir, is a resolution of the 14th of February, 1868, offered by him who now presides over this body, our honored Vice-President:

Mr. WILSON submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to report, for the information of the Senate, whether any new military department, division, or district has been authorized under orders issued by the President of the United States; and, if so, under what authority of law.

There is a resolution in reference to the Army, offered by a Senator who had held his seat here almost as long as any Senator on this floor, and who now presides over this body, asking what the President had done in reference to the Army, without any such qualification, and adopted without a single word of objection. Ay, but Andrew Johnson was President of the United States at that time, and it was not considered necessary to treat him with such distinguished consideration, you may say. That was in the days when you had a plain man for President of the United States, and no very humble language was considered necessary on the part of the Senate of the United States when they addressed to him a respectful request for information! Let us pass on. Here is one offered in 1857:

Mr. Davis submitted the following resolution; which was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the Senate all correspondence between the executive department and the present governor of Kansas, together with such orders and instructions as have been issued to said governor in relation to the affairs of said Territory, together with the constitution and schedule referred to in the annual message.

Was that a sporadic resolution? Was that a random resolution? Why, sir, it was in the midst of what was called the Kansas-Nebraska war almost, the Kansas-Nebraska difficulty, when this country was agitated from one end to the other by the terrible strife which was going on within the borders of Kansas—a subject upon which the American people felt more sensitively, perhaps, than upon any other that ever was mooted in Congress; and that was the form of the resolution in which President Buchanan was requested to communicate that information. Does it stop there? Let us see. On the 17th of December, 1857, Mr. Trumbull offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the Senate all correspondence between himself or any of the Departments and any governor or other officer or person in the employment of the Government in Kansas Territory, not heretofore communicated, together with all orders and instructions which have been issued to the governor of said Territory or any other officer or person in said Territory in relation to Kansas affairs.

The first resolution was offered by Mr. Davis, a friend of the administration. Here is a resolution offered by Mr. Trumbull, an opponent of the administration. Neither contained the limitation, and each was adopted by the Senate without putting any such limitation upon it, and each was upon that most delicate subject which then so agitated Congress and the public mind. But, sir, it does not stop there. On the same day Mr. Pugh submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the Senate copies of the following documents.

Then follows a list of eight documents, or I might say eight classes of documents, in relation to Kansas, which Mr. Pugh's resolution called for, all on the same subject, and without one single word of limitation or qualification in the resolution. What next? On May 19, 1858, a resolution was offered by Mr. Doolittle, a remark by whom was quoted by the Senator, as follows:

Mr. Doolittle submitted the following resolution; which was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the Senate all correspondence, instructions, and orders, not heretofore communicated to either branch of Congress, connected with the arrest of William Walker and his associates, by the naval forces under the command of Commodore Paulding, including all the correspondence between him and the Navy Department since the arrest of Walker in relation thereto, or in relation to the property or persons seized by the forces under his command, and including, also, copies of any letters, orders, or instructions, if any, addressed to Commodore Paulding, which may have been subsequently withdrawn from him by the Navy Department, and the reasons for such withdrawal.

I have shown you resolution after resolution relating to the organization and distributions of the Army. Here is one relating to the Navy, and relating to the acts of the Navy, and inquiring why it was that the Navy seized certain persons and certain property, and we all know to what that resolution referred. We know that then, as it related to a force that invaded a foreign State, Walker and his associates having undertaken to set up a government in a foreign country and having been seized by the Government of the United States, as it had this look of foreign affairs about it, there might have been good reason for putting in the limitation which is now suggested; but no such thing was done. It does not stop there. On the 19th of May Mr. Doolittle moved another resolution calling for further information upon the same subject, and without any such qualification; but I will not fatigue the patience of the Senate any further.

I deny that I am wanting in respect to the Chief Magistrate of the United States or ever will be. I deny that I wish to depart from any usage, a departure from which might be considered disrespectful to the Chief Magistrate of my country. I do not depart from it when I politely request him, in language such as was used for at least fifty years of the history of the Senate, to communicate to us information which we know, positively know, can be communicated without any prejudice to the public interests.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, this discussion has taken a very wide range, and I presume a range hardly anticipated on the part of the gentleman who offered the resolution. I, for one, am glad that the discussion has taken place. It will present to the country a most remarkable state of facts as existing in the Senate at this day. If it be true that the Executive of the United States, because he is the Commander-in-Chief of the Army of the United States, and acting solely under the oath which he has taken to support the Constitution, is never to be interrogated with regard to the movements of the Army, this Government has ceased to be republican, and is nothing more nor less than a naked military despotism. We all know that but a short time ago the second officer of the Army of the United States was ordered with his staff to proceed to the city of New Orleans, not by the order of the Secretary of War, not by the order of his commanding officer, General Sherman, but the President, disregarding the established organization represented by the War Department and the chief of the Army, sends to the city of New Orleans his faithful personal adherent to command that portion of the Army which happens to be in that city. That fact is known throughout this nation. In the course of time a Legislature is to assemble in the State of Louisiana. At this time and critical moment we find the President assuming the immediate command of the Army, and through his faithful lieutenant thereby is enabled to control the organization of the Legislature of a sovereign State with his armed soldiery tramping the halls of the house where the Legislature met. And when a Senator on this floor offers a resolution asking of the Executive who has thus brought about this military state of affairs to give to the Senate, and through the Senate to the country, the reasons for his action, we are told that the resolution must be couched in language of submission; that if he deems it compatible with the public service he is to give us that information, and if he deems it not to be so compatible he is to refuse to answer.

Suppose the President of the United States was organizing an army under our eyes in the city of Washington, which we could see with our own natural vision, for the purpose of invading one of the sovereign States of the Union, he as Commander-in-Chief of the Army having the right, in accordance with the arguments made on this floor, to move the Army at his will, and we were to address him a resolution to know what he proposed to do, would it be proper to try to amend that resolution by inserting "provided he thought it compatible with the public interest?" As a matter of course he would say that he did not believe it to be compatible with the public interest to avow the motives which impelled him to the accomplishment of his fell purpose.

By the amendment you refer the whole subject to his discretion, and you give to the Executive of the nation, in virtue of the fact that he is the Commander-in-Chief of the Army, a discretionary and unlimited power. History is full of such cases. Had an Englishman asked Cromwell, when he was marching with his Invincibles to drive the Parliament away, what was his object, and to give the information if he believed it compatible with the public interest, what would Cromwell have answered? He would have replied, "I do not think it compatible with the public interest of England; I am the sovereign judge of the occasion, and I refuse to give the information." Go back step by step in the long line of history, if you leave it to the person who is exercising despotic powers to answer or not at his discretion, you will never obtain an answer.

But, Mr. President, it seems to me, regardless of what might have been the usage heretofore, at the present day under the present circumstances, when events of so singular and unheard of, and I may say unprecedented character are occurring from day to day, we must change our manner of communicating with the Executive of the nation, observing all the time those courtesies and rules of politeness which should exist not only between the co-ordinate branches of the Government, but between individuals as gentlemen. The Executive of the nation, as a matter of course, must be treated by the Senate of the United States with becoming respect. But here is involved a great principle, not one of mere courtesy, but one of right. Has the Senate of the United States the right to know whether certain things are being done by the military at this day in the city of New Orleans and by whose authority and the reasons for the doing of it? I say the Senate has a right to know it, whether the President deems it compatible with the public interests or not; and in this case the knowledge of the Senate becomes the knowledge of the country; it becomes public property. The people of this nation have a right to know why to-day the city of New Orleans is in possession of an armed soldiery. It will not do to argue this question on one side that there is a mob in New Orleans, that murders have been committed, that bad men exist there. It will not do to carry out the idea advanced by the Senator from Indiana.

There are two sides to the question. The people of Louisiana have rights too, and they claim (and I believe the country will sustain them) that the Legislature elected a short time ago was elected in opposition to the views entertained by the gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber. I think the country will sustain that assertion, and that in the organization of that Legislature these men were only exercising the right which men born in this land have as a birthright, no more and no less. When we wish to ascertain why this right has been subverted, we are told we have no right to know it unless we go in a very submissive manner to the Executive and ask if he deems it compatible with the public interest to let us and the country know why he and his subalterns have deprived the citizens of this State from the exercise of a right dear to all men who love liberty.

Sir, sentiments have been avowed on this floor during this discussion that will not only surprise the country, but in my estimation will astound the public mind of this nation—sentiments showing a determination to sustain executive power which I had no idea existed here. I was astonished to hear gentlemen assert that it was competent for the President of the United States, as the Commander-in-Chief, and restrained by nothing but his oath, to do just as he might deem proper with the Army of the United States. I deny it. He may abuse his power and do it, but he does not do it because he has a right to do it. It is an abuse of power, and not a right.

Another Senator says, "Suppose you do ask of the President to communicate to you certain information and he refuses to do it, what are you to do then?" What are we to do then? Has it come to this, that the idea can be entertained by a Senator on this floor that he would sustain and vindicate the course of an Executive who would thus violate his oath of office? Has it come to this? History, sir, is repeating itself from day to day, and it has repeated itself in this Senate to-day most eloquently. The Senator from Illinois charged those who, as he chose to say, encouraged and abetted murders and the violation of law in the State of Louisiana and throughout the South as being no better than the murderers and violators of the law themselves; and this sentiment was applauded in the gallery of the American Senate and not restrained by the Presiding Officer who sat in your chair at that moment. Sir, it is not true that the party to which I belong are apologists for murder or violations of law; but it is true, and I am glad it is true, and it is one reason why I love the party to which I have attached my fortunes, that we will vindicate the rights of the people and assert the great bir hright of resisting tyranny and oppression whenever the effort may be made to tyrannize and oppress. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Order.

Mr. BOGY. I do not vindicate murder; I do not vindicate the violation of law; but on the other hand I do hope that the people of all countries, including Louisiana, will never tamely submit like cravens and cowards to be oppressed without a show of resistance. [Renewed applause in the galleries.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The galleries will preserve order.

Mr. BOGY. Sir, what would become of liberty here or elsewhere if that spirit did not all the time exist in the human breast? If all men were apologists of presidents and of kings and of tyrants, vindicating at all times and everywhere the assertion of power in the heads of government, what would become of liberty? The spirit of liberty is kept alive by these men who are called murderers and maranders by the Senator from Illinois. They are brave men who risk life, property, fortune, and all in the vindication of freedom. I am not for murder, but I am for vindicating the right even at the peril of life and property; and the Senator from Indiana is wrong when he states that the people of New Orleans are a set of murderers and violators of law, and that all the effort that has been made by the President has been to preserve peace and order in the city of New Orleans and State of Louisiana. The efforts made by the President have been to keep in power a governor not elected by the people, and to organize a Legislature in violation of the public will of the people of that State; and hence the people of that proud and former great State are trying to resist that terrible oppression. Now, sir, we wish to know under what law these proceedings in Louisiana have taken place.

I had intended early, and even before this discussion, to propound a question to my friend from Ohio as to what law orlaws now exist authorizing the President of the United States to carry on war in any State of this Union, independent of that wide, undefined, undefinable power as Commander-in-Chief of the Army of the United States. I had intended to ask the Senator from Ohio whether there was any such law in force at the present day. I know of none.

The so-called reconstruction laws of the 2d of March, 1867, and their supplements are functus officio. They have accomplished the object for which they were passed, which was to reorganize the Southern States that had just come out of the war, and to enable them to come back into the Union. Having accomplished their object, they are, I say, functus officio. But at this day, as informed by the public press, the President of the United States is carrying on war in one of the States of this Union, under no specific law, but under that wide, unlimited power that kings and emperors and tyrants the world over have always claimed and have always exercised; and, I regret to say, in all ages of the world have always found apologists to sustain them. Cæsar had his friends in Rome when he was aiming at absolute power. Mark Antony was a willing and most eloquent apologist. Cromwell had his friends in England and his apologists in every part of the British islands. Napoleon had his friends and adherents in France when on the 18th of Brumaire he dispersed the French Chamber. And why should not Grant have his friends also? He has friends in this Chamber, and I am sorry to say that sentiments have been avowed here which if carried out are destructive to all liberty in this land, and we may as well quit our respective seats and go to our homes and let the President of the United States carry on the Government restrained only by his oath of office.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, it is inevitable, I suppose, that in the discussions which take place elsewhere, in the ex parte debates which transpire on the hustings, in the ex parte debates which ring through partisan presses, misrepresentations shall be made now and then which cannot be adequately and promptly met. But I submit that the first duty of every Senator who undertakes to debate a public question in this Chamber is to acknowledge the existence of truths which lie right before him.

Now, Mr. President, I rise for the purpose of calling the attention of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BOGY] to some observations which he has thought himself at liberty to make in the course of this debate. He charges that the President yesterday assumed command of the Army of the United States. Did he assume command of the Army of the United States yesterday, or was that a command with which he had been charged by the people of the United States for many years? Does the Senator from Missouri think himself quite authorized to utter a complaint in the Senate Chamber that the President was in command of the Army of the United States yesterday? What day has there been since you first had a President that the President of the United States has not been in command of the Army? I know there was a period in the history of this country when he would have been deprived of that command if it had been in the power of certain politicians to do it; but the fact remains that there has been no day since you had a President and a Constitution that he has not been in command of the Army of the United States. I hope the Senator from Missouri will not feel called upon to complain if he finds the President in command to-morrow, not only in Louisiana, but in Missouri. But what use did he make of that Army? Unquestionably being in command, he may abuse that command, he may misuse or he may rightfully use it. What use did he make of it yesterday in New Orleans? The Senator from Missouri felt himself authorized to tell the people of the United States that he controlled with the Army the organization of the Legislature of Louisiana. Does he mean to stand upon that declaration? What does he mean by saying that the President controlled the organization of the Legislature of Louisiana? That he put into the State-house a body of men who were not the Legislature, or that he turned out of the State-house men who were the Legislature?

Mr. BOGY. I believe that he did turn out men who were the Legislature, and put in men who were not.

Mr. HOWE. Very well. I want to know if the Senator means to be responsible for that statement.

Mr. BOGY. I do.

Mr. HOWE. For the direct declaration?

Mr. BOGY. From the information which has been received, and from my knowledge of that country individually, I am willing to be responsible for what I say, that he did exclude from the halls of the Legislature men who were rightfully elected to the Legislature, and through the military installed a body of men who were not elected as the Legislature. I believe so.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, let us restrain this applause, not until we get out of the Senate Chamber; the rule may require that; I do not. If intelligent men think when this debate is closed they find any fitting occasion for applause, if they find occasion to applaud such sentiments as the Senator from Missouri has just uttered, I do not want you to enforce the rule so far as I am concerned. Let it break, but let us see whether that is a sentiment to applaud or not. If the Senator means simply to say that he believes from the information before him that the Army under the command of the President yesterday turned out members of the Legislature duly elected, he has a perfect right to say that. Nobody is responsible for his opinions but himself. When he undertakes to charge it as a fact that the President did so, I do not stand here to contradict him, for I do not know but that the fact is so; but I do beg permission to remind him that he is making the charge somewhat in advance of the day that he can by possibility know whether it is true or not. Why, what are we about here? We are asking for information upon that very point. We are calling on the President to tell us what he did with the Army, and what authority he had for doing whatever he did; and until that inquiry is answered, either by the President or by somebody else, I take it the Senator from Missouri will not, on cool reflection, think himself authorized to charge as a fact that the President sent out of the State-house of Louisiana the true Legislature, or that he inducted into it men who were not the true Legislature.

Sir, what is the pending question? Simply whether we shall amend the resolution. Let no Senator think himself authorized to say here or elsewhere that there is the slightest objection on the part of the friends of the President to his being called upon for information. If all you want is light, God grant that you may have a flood of it. You will find no friend of the President standing here to withhold a single ray. You can have information. When the Senator from Ohio had his resolution read at the desk, no Senator on this side arose with a single word of objection to the adoption of the resolution. The honorable Senator from New York arose, not to assert anything, not to object to anything, but in the mildest way in the world to ask of the Senator from Ohio if it were not usual to incorporate into resolutions of inquiry addressed to the Executive the condition that he should give the information if compatible with the public interest. It was put in the form of an interrogatory; but the Senator from Ohio felt called upon almost to resent that suggestion. "No, sir," said the Senator, "not at all." Thereupon the Senator from New York thought himself authorized to move that language as an amendment; and the question now pending is simply whether we shall incorporate those words as an amendment upon the resolution or not.

The Senator from Missouri complains "that if you put that language in, then you submit to the discretion of the President whether he shall answer or not; the Senate bows before the President;" and that is made a cause of accusation against the majority in this Chamber. Is it a just cause of accusation? Do we by the terms of the resolution subject the Senate to the President? Is it our doing? Will it follow simply because of the terms which you employ in this resolution, or does that subjection simply follow because of the terms which our forefathers employed in the Constitution of the United States? I put it to the Senator from Missouri, can we command the President to make answer or can we not? Often such resolutions have passed and attention not been called to the form of them; but when the question is raised, and it is distinctly asserted here on the floor of the Senate that you must not put such language into a resolution because that will submit to the discretion of the President whether he will answer or not, then I put it to Senators, I put it to the Senator from Missouri, if that is not the precise predicament in which the Senate is placed by the Constitution? Can you command the President to answer? If you cannot, what is the use of trying? I did ask the Senate "suppose the President refuses to answer, what are you going to do about it?" I will put the question again to the Senator from Missouri, what will he do about it?

Of course you can get this information from other quarters. If the President has violated his official duty, you can prove it by others; but the Senate of the United States cannot, by force of any authority which the Constitution has vested in it, put him upon the stand and make him impeach himself. You tried to make a newspaper correspondent, a few years ago, answer a question; but he told you he would not do it, and he did not. I do not know whether the Senator from Missouri was here at the time, or not, but I see a great many Senators about me who came to the conclusion that the Senate could not make that witness answer. And, if you could not make a private citizen answer a question, I do not think, if I understand the constitutional relation between the President and the Senate, that you can make the President answer; and you cannot punish the President for not answering. You may punish him for any violation of his official duties, but not for not answering your mere inquiry, simply because you cannot force him to answer. So I put the question, "What are are you going to do about it, if he does not answer?"

The Senator from Missouri with a look of horror declared his astonishment at hearing it asserted on the floor of the Senate that the President of the United States, being Commander-in-Chief of the Army, could do as he pleased. Well, sir, I should feel some astonishment at hearing that declared in the Senate. I suppose he is deadsure he has heard that declared, and therefore I shall not say he did not hear it. I only say that I have not heard it declared myself, and I do not expect to hear it until we get a different style of President in the White House from what we have got to-day. I am in hopes the Senator's ears deceived him. I am in hopes it will turn out, when the RECORD is read to-morrow, that no such declaration has been made, at least on this side of the Chamber; but I do not undertake to say that it has not been.

Mr. BOGY. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. HOWE. Certainly.

Mr. BOGY. I can save the Senator a great deal of useless trouble. He need not take so much concern as to what I may have said as to anticipate any false position in which I may be placed. I take all the responsibility of what I said. The Senator may save himself the trouble of expressing great anxiety about the declarations which I made. I stand by them and am willing to repeat them.

Mr. HOWE. Repeating what the Senator has said does not save me from any anxiety or any labor. I took occasion to comment upon it because I supposed the Senator did take those positions deliberately and meant to stand by them. I want to submit the question to the Senate and to the people whether he or any other Senator can afford to stand by them, or rather whether the American people will accept them. He can undoubtedly afford to stand by them; but I ask whether the American people can afford to accept them. Among other things that I understood the Senator to assert, and which I have no doubt if he did once say he will say again, in reply to the charge of the Senator from Indiana that murder was regularly employed as a political agent in many States of the South——

Mr. BOGY. I made no such statement, and no statement which would justify the Senator in coming to any such conclusion.

Mr. HOWE. Why, Mr. President, the Senator does not understand me. I was about to refer to what the Senator from Missouri said when replying to the statement of the Senator from Indiana, which statement of the Senator from Indiana substantially was—not the statement of the Senator from Missouri—that murder was regularly employed as a political agent to carry elections, that blood was shed in torrents, deliberately and for a partisan purpose. That was the charge which I understood the Senator from Indiana to make; and replying to that the Senator from Missouri thought he was making a sufficient answer when he said, "We will resist oppression." Mr. President, I have not a word of fault to find with the disposition of any man who assumes to himself the privilege of resisting oppression. I suppose that is a right we have, each one of us and any number of us. But let me say to the Senator this one thing, that if I understand our constitution of government, not he nor myself nor any dozens nor any few thousand of us are clothed with the prerogative of deciding for ourselves conclusively when we are oppressed and when we are not. Those questions are delegated by your laws to different tribunals, and although you may say when the last tribunal has decided that that decision is oppressive and tyrannical and wrong, and may revolt against it and take up arms to resent it, do not make any mistake about the character of that transaction. That is rebellion in the eye of the law. If I understood the Senator from Indiana, his charge was, not that blood had been shed and that murder had stalked abroad at noon-day to resent or to rebuke or to relieve against oppressions actually perpetrated, but that these agencies were employed to prevent a free expression of opinion on the part of the people of a State. It may be that if the people had been allowed to speak freely and fully they would have decided very foolishly. After all, if I understand our laws, it is not exactly what may be called oppression for them to claim and assert the right to speak so fully and to speak freely.

Sir, I understood the Senator from Missouri also to say—I am not making any issue with that honorable Senator on which I propose to take one side and leave him on the other; I am simply calling attention to some little declarations which he made, doubtless deliberately, for I understand him to say that he will repeat them all—calling attention to them for the purpose of saying, not that they are not true, but, so far as they bear upon the conduct of the majority in this Chamber, I for one do not admit their truth. He said, as I understood him, that the President was actually now carrying on war in a State, and in defiance of law. If the Senator means to say that he simply believes that, undoubtedly he is justified in saying so; but if he means to say that is the fact, while I do not tell him it is not the fact, I must be allowed to tell him that we have not seen any adequate evidence of it yet. We are waiting for the evidence. If the fact exists, I am as ready to hear it as any man in this Chamber; and if the fact does not exist, I suppose the Senator from Missouri is perfectly willing to see it contradicted. Therefore he and I will unite in voting for this call; therefore he and I will vote for ransacking every possible receptacle where truth can be supposed to be lodged. As I said before, I say again, I will take my share of the responsibility. If this investigation shall show that the Army of the United States was employed yesterday to overthrow a legal Legislature and to inaugurate an illegal one, I will say that I was responsible for one vote in electing the President by whose hands that wrong was committed, and I will answer for that one vote, for I voted for him. When I voted for him, I knew that he would be Commander-in-Chief of the Army if he was elected, for I had read the Constitution which said so, but I did not suppose that he would make any such use of the Army. Perhaps I ought to have known better if it should turn out that he did actually do so. On the contrary, if it should turn out when the facts are fully ascertained that he did not make any such use of the Army, if it should simply turn out that upon the call of the executive of a State complaining that the lawful authorities of the State were surrounded by illegal forces to which his resources were not equal, he merely employed the Army, or any portion of it, to disperse those illegal forces, I do not know what the Senator from Missouri will feel called upon to do, but I think on the whole he will admit then that he was slightly mistaken in some of his statements this afternoon.

The last grave charge against the majority in this Chamber was that Grant had friends in the Chamber. I think he recalled some other historic characters preceding the life of the present President of the United States, and of whom he undertook to say that they had friends severally. I do not know but that Cæsar was one of those men who had friends. I think Cromwell was another. I do not remember the catalogue. Perhaps Napoleon was another. I do remember that he concluded the schedule by saying with a good deal of emphasis that Grant also had his friends in this Chamber. Yes, at last—no I do not mean that; I mean to say that whatever may have been the accuracy of the preceding statements, the Senator from Missouri concluded his remarks by the utterance of an unquestionable truth. Grant has friends in this Chamber yet. He has earned every friend that he has in this Chamber by the most indubitable and by the most enduring public service, if service for the country can earn friends. And so I am happy to be told by the Senator from Missouri that Grant has friends in this Chamber. I hail that fact with a great deal more satisfaction than I fear the country will hail the fact with which I conclude my remarks, which is that in spite of all his great and enduring service for the country, if not because of such service, Grant still has enemies in the Senate Chamber of the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I should like to say a word or two upon this subject, and first touching the amendment of the Senator from New York, which the Senator from Ohio so much opposes. The Senator from Ohio has discovered, as he states, that it is not of much consequence whether the amendment be adopted or not; that the President of the United States will furnish this information at the earliest possible moment, and it is a mere question of etiquette and orderly procedure whether we shall put it to him conditionally or absolutely as a request. Upon that topic it is not worth while to spend a great deal of time; but inasmuch as the Senator has cited one precedent with which I, it seems, was connected—he calls it a precedent—and one or two others, it is perhaps necessary for the rightful proceeding of the Senate that we should say something about them.

When the Senator was first speaking he was speaking upon the question of whether it was right for the Senate to introduce these words into the resolution. He was not asserting that resolutions without this clause had sometimes passed. If he had, probably he would have found nobody to dispute it, because, as my friend from New York said, it often happens that rules are waived tacitly even in courts, with which the Senator from Ohio himself, I believe, says he is much more familiar than he is with the rules of this body; because he does not believe in rules, as he states it, and if he does not believe in rules, I suppose it is just possible that like the Senator from Missouri he does not believe in laws; but he has not said that. Now, then, the point is not whether some resolution has passed through this body that did not contain these words, but whether the Senate has ever refused to insert such words when they were proposed. Upon that point I think I can safely challenge the great learning of my friend from Ohio and the great industry of the dozen people who may have been employed to hunt up these precedents, as he calls them, to produce one. He has not done it. I did not challenge the Senator from Ohio to produce one instance in which a resolution had passed without these words; but I did endeavor to ask him if he could name then an instance when the Senate had declined to do what the Senator from New York proposed should be done here. I do not know whether the language that I adopted was particularly well adapted to convey that idea or not, because I was somewhat shy of interrupting the Senator from Ohio at all, but that was the substantial point. Upon that point the Senator from Ohio, having exhausted all his ammunition, has not yet been able to show that in any instance in which the attention of the Senate was called to the topic, and such words were proposed to be inserted, the Senate ever failed to insert them, and that without a division. I suppose on this occasion we shall have a division, and we shall find on one side the solid phalanx of the excusers and the apologists and the defenders of what they call the rights of the people in the Southern States, which means the same body of people whose rights their predecessors defended in 1860 and 1861, the old aristocracy of white men and nothing else, and white men of one political opinion and nothing else. So they will be again in solid array as they were fourteen or fifteen years ago to do the same thing. I think I can say for one, and for the people whom I in part represent, that they are quite welcome to begin.

It is high time, Mr. President, that the people of this country (and by that term I mean the whole people, those who have become people under the amendments of the Constitution as well as those who were citizens before) should ascertain now and forever whether these amendments for liberty and for human rights are to live and have a vitality, or whether, to use a western and a democratic phrase, they are to be frozen out, and frozen out by Ku-Klux for which there were apologists in this Chamber, in respect to whom there were denials by the minority in this Chamber of the existence of any such body, and in respect of whose conduct in assassinations and murders, which the honorable Senator from Ohio so gently calls "homicides without authority of law"—a most sweet and gentle phrase, one that would not touch the coat-tails of any murderer in the South with the slightest derogation—and men stood up in this Chamber and with similar gentle phrases characterized that widespread conspiracy of four years ago. And now, when by a new name "Ku-Klux" has transferred itself to "White League," and a military organization, created, organized, ramified, extended, for the sole purpose of making war upon their fellow-men because they stand up to assert the rights that the Constitution of their country and the laws of God have given them, are again extending their hands and their forces everywhere, we find the same old story repeated by the same old allies or their successors, that these assassinations, and murders, and cruelties, when they come to the ultimate termination of death, are "homicides without authority of law!" And from another Senator, they are "the spirit of liberty resisting oppression and despotism;" and, as the Senator from Ohio puts it himself, a statement of these circumstances that are known here of all men is only the cry of despotism endeavoring to shield itself in its war upon liberty by saying that it does it in defense of law and order!

Mr. President, the despotisms of which we have any account in human affairs, until this of most recent times, have been despotisms whose forces were put in play against the rights of men, against the preservation of life, against the defense of liberty; and yet here we have what the honorable Senator styles a despotism which exerts the power of government to protect defenseless and innocent men against an organized conspiracy to deprive them of liberty, and of life, and of right, because they happen to assert their right to be citizens of this Republic as well as the white race. The honorable Senators, so far as I am concerned, are quite welcome to open an issue of that kind to the people of this country. It is a momentous one there is no doubt; it involves in its solution large sacrifices, it involves in its solution still larger consequences; but I think I can tell Senators that they need not rely upon what they suppose to be a triumph at the elections if they suppose they are going to cover up or to maintain for a single year any excuse for or recognition of that state of things which the southern "White League" is the exponent of, and, which its dreadful and unpunished crimes are one of the means of carrying its notions into execution, without an expression of opinion by the people of the United States—I will not say of the North or of the South, but I will say without an expression of that portion of the people of the United States who fifteen years ago rallied to the unity and the liberty of the Government and its citizens, which they will learn to their satisfaction or dissatisfaction has not fallen asleep for any great length of time. I can tell Senators I think with some safety that the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments of the Constitution of the United States are intended to be, and will be, whether we all live to see it or not, just as firmly planted in practice in this country as they are now in theory; and "it will not do," to use a phrase so favorite with my honorable friend from Ohio, for him or any other Senator to say that the people of this country, who love law and order and liberty combined, are going to sit down and see thousands and tens of thousands of their fellow-citizens in any part of this country made the victims of oppression and assassination and every species of wrong, merely because of the fact that they wish in an innocent and a lawful way to assert their constitutional rights, without resisting it.

So then, Mr. President, the question is not precisely whether despotism is to cover itself up by acting under a pretense of supporting law, but the question is whether a powerful government, armed by the Constitution with the authority to maintain itself and protect every constitutional right of every citizen, shall exert its power in order that every right of every citizen may be respected, and that an honest and an innocent man who lives in any State shall have a right to call upon the government of his country to protect him in the rights that the Constitution of that country has made sacred to him.

When I see, Mr. President, as I have not yet seen, that the people as they call themselves, the white-leaguers, or the white democrats, or the white conservatives, or whatever they may be, of any State in this Union, when they find that any of their associates have committed assassination or murder or wrong upon their fellow-citizens for no cause but opinion's sake, turn upon him as in Ohio they would turn upon him, or in Vermont, without respect of party, and bring him under the heavy hand of justice, then I shall begin to have some faith that our southern brothers, who it seems have not yet forgotten the old manners and ways of semi-barbarous times, have thought better of it; and then I shall begin to have some faith that whatever irregularities or wrongs may exist in the autonomy of any of those States will be properly corrected.

But the difficulty is, Mr. President, and it is perfectly useless to disguise it, that there is upon the one side there the constant and organized effort of a minority of the people, which same minority had always governed those States until the end of the war, to force their opinions upon the majority without any respect to the means by which they are to do it; and inasmuch as mere voting will not do it, then there must be whipping; inasmuch as mere whipping will not accomplish it, then there must be slaughter; and inasmuch as education will not do it, then let the school-houses be burned up; and inasmuch as religion will not do it, then let the churches go; and until that notion is reversed or is exterminated by the hand of fire, just so long you must expect that there will be resistance and aggression on the part of this body of white-leaguers, as they are called, that really represent, according to the testimony, southern society, as they call it, and the organized forces of free government. Let me repeat to the Senator from Ohio that it will not do to affect a great horror of what is called fraud, a great horror of what is called despotism, a great horror of anything that may be conjured up or may exist, until you reach the fundamental fact that there shall be legal protection to every citizen of the United States in every right that the Constitution of his country guarantees to him. When that comes to be the case, I repeat, there will be no difficulty in respect to Cæsarism, or despotism, or oppression, on the part of the Government.

Mr. President, as I have said, this is the first time, I think, in human history when any man has raised his voice to condemn what he calls despotism on the part of the Government, where, when you look to find what that despotism is, you find on one side the Government exerting all the power that it is able to exert to protect human life and human liberty, instead of, as in the despotisms we have read of, exerting all the power that it possesses to imprison and to get men out of the way and to destroy them and exile them, or kill them, in spite of the law and against the law. That is what the white-leaguers are endeavoring to do, and it is to resist that aggression upon government and good order and upon liberty that the forces of the Government are brought together. That is the difference, and it is a difference, I must say, that I think naturally grows out of the condition of things that existed in the Southern States. It is a difference that would not be tolerated, that could not exist, in fact, in any Northern State where society is homogeneous and intelligent and educated; and it is a difference that necessarily almost grows out of the circumstance that a hundred years of slavery, a hundred years of oppression and of wrong have created such a state of opinion in the body of the governing classes in those States that whatever they see is done that does not suit them is to be redressed at their own free will without any regard to law at all.

Now, Mr. President, I am as anxious as the honorable Senator from Ohio is that we shall have this information. I am anxious on the particular topic to which he refers to know whether the white league and its aiders and abettors in Louisiana undertook in defiance of the laws of the State of Louisiana, with which the United States have something to do with respect to the organization of the State, and to which in such respects we are not strangers by any means, to set up a Legislature which the statutes of that State forbade them to set up and to turn out and to ignore the only persons to whom the law intrusted the duty of receiving the certificates of election, counting them, calling the roll of the men who were certified, and organizing that body of people. That is what I wish to know, and if I am rightly informed we shall then have the spectacle of the use of power to repress an illegal but organized mob that, in defiance of law, in defiance of justice, in defiance of usage, undertook to set itself up as a Legislature to the exclusion of the right one. If that should happen to be the case, I trust that the honorable Senator from Ohio and the honorable Senators from Missouri and Delaware, and all the other honorable Senators of that ilk, will be as glad as I shall be to know that such an operation was prevented by the exercise of legitimate constitutional power; for I suppose these lovers of liberty on the other side of the Chamber, though they seem to have somewhat queer notions of what liberty is, have not yet got so far as to be willing to maintain that it is not the business of constituted power to resist illegal aggressions, and therefore that it would not be the right thing for the Government of the United States to uphold the rightful Legislature of the State of Louisiana. If it should turn out that those whose friends are here found maintaining their cause were themselves the illegal and wrongful aggressors, not having a shadow of right to stand upon under the laws of Louisiana, then I hope we shall have taken back in this august presence all those talks about despotism and Cæsarism and oppression which we have heard so much of to-day. But perhaps it is too early to anticipate what is to be the fact.

Here is one little circumstance which, however, I think we might pay attention to. I see a telegram in the public prints addressed to the Secretary of War, an official telegram, evidently a public one, for the man who has sent it has not been accustomed to hide his operations in a corner or to cover them under a cloud of confidential secrecy. He is a man whom many of the Senators on the other side of the Chamber have seen undoubtedly. I have seen him very rarely; but wherever he has been seen he has been regarded as a brave, an honorable, and an upright man. I think his testimony at this present juncture is worth something. I do not say it is conclusive, but from his character, his history, and his position, I think his testimony is of some value. Let us hear what he says:

NEW ORLEANS, January 4.

Hon. W. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.:

It is with deep regret that I have to announce to you the existence in this State of a spirit of defiance to all lawful authority, and an insecurity of life which is hardly realized by the General Government or country at large. The lives of citizens have become so jeopardized, that unless something is done to give protection to the people, all security usually afforded by law will be overridden. Defiance to laws and murder of individuals seem to be looked upon by the community here from a stand-point which gives impunity to all who choose to indulge in either, and the civil government appears powerless to punish or even arrest. I have to-night assumed control of the Department of the Gulf.

P. H. SHERIDAN,
Lieutenant-General.

Now, it may be that the honorable Senators will smile again and say: "O, that is despotism; and what is a homicide without authority of law now and then? It only kills a negro, or a republican, or a carpet-bagger, or some citizen of the United States who does not happen to think just as we do; what of it?" and if there is nothing of it in case one is killed, what is there of it if there be a thousand? The more the merrier. Ah, Mr. President, I have been taught to believe that the protection of human life and of human liberty was the chief business of government; that whatever other evils men may suffer under government rightfully or wrongfully administered, there were none so great as those which assailed the liberty or the life of the citizen; and if it should turn out to be true under the information we are to obtain, either by this resolution or otherwise, or by both, that it always happens that the slaughtered man was a negro, or a republican, or a citizen of some other State who under the Constitution of his country had taken up his abode there, it will present a subject of inquiry for the learned casuists and homicide gentlemen on the other side how it happened that all murder, all assassination, all restraint of liberty, all disorder, fall upon the heads of that particular class of people. It will be worth knowing; and when it is known we shall find that the simple answer is what I believe is well known to every person in this Chamber, that it flows out simply of a spirit of resistance to the theory and the practice of the free Constitution of the United States that has been given to this people in spite of themselves by the armies and the people of the North; and if that is to be overthrown, it will be overthrown, as the honorable Senator from Illinois has said, in spite again of the power and the arms of the people of the Northern States. They do not wish to oppress any Southern State; quite the reverse; they do not wish to oppress any man in the Southern States; quite the reverse; but they do intend, if I understand their spirit and their purposes, that every man in the Southern States shall be equal to every other man in respect of his right to protection, to life, and to liberty.

And, sir, this system of disguise, this forgetting what is the necessity for the employment of the power of the Government, this blinking everything which transpires day by day, as General Sheridan reports it, or when it is forced upon your attention, for you never notice it unless it is, then turning it off with the sweet phrase, "A possible homicide not justified by law," will not answer. Mr. President, the time will come when a homicide not justified by law, which deprives a citizen of the United States of his life because his skin does not happen to be of the right color, or, the more important now, because his opinion, which we have all thought was a thing that a man had a right to, did not happen to correspond with that of my honorable friend from Ohio, is rather a sad state of things, and we should speak of it rather in grief and in pity than in resentment and in anger, it may be; but if the truth be as it seems to be upon what we know, then I say it is time that the people of the United States who have been so loudly referred to upon the other side should have their attention drawn to the subject, because I believe that the opinions and the purposes of the people of the United States in respect of the defense of life and of liberty everywhere within the borders of this nation are precisely what they were when they adopted these amendments; and any man, be he North or South, who fancies that he is to drive these great principles of liberty out of the Constitution by letting them become obsolete, or by overriding them without punishment, will find in a very short time that he has made a great mistake.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, during the five years that I have held a seat in the Senate, speaking from recollection, according to the very best of my memory, I have heard precisely the same speech that has just been delivered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] at least half a dozen times, and I have no doubt the people of Vermont have heard in every parish and corner of that State this same screed of hatred preached by that Senator. What is it, sir? It is that there is a difference that necessarily exists down South between the black and the white races, out of which these troubles arise, if I understand the Senator's proposition, and that therefore that fact, which should make us do all that we could to conciliate, shall be a reason for the General Government usurping powers not conferred upon it by the Constitution and putting the people of the South, or at least the white people of the South, under the heel of a despotism worse than exists in any portion of this globe. That is the real solution which the Senator from Vermont would give to this difficulty, which he declares is necessary and inevitable.

What have the Ku-Klux outrages or the White League to do with the subject-matter before the Senate in the resolution which is now under consideration? Suppose there have been murders; call them murders, and gross murders, if you please; call them assassinations; use the choice language of your vocabulary whenever you speak of the people of the South; denounce the people of the South as assassins, thugs, Ku-Klux, as you do; do all that; and suppose that such were the fact, what has that to do with the question whether the armies of the United States were yesterday used to organize a Legislature of a State without any authority of the Constitution or the law for that use? What has that to do with it? Why, sir, crimes have existed everywhere. Crimes have existed in New England as well as at the South. People have been hung in New England without judge and jury as well as at the South; and people have been sentenced there by judicial sentence whose punishment and execution are now looked upon as a blot upon the civilization of the age in which they were executed. Such things have taken place everywhere; but what has that to do with the question whether the Army of the United States, in violation of the Constitution of the United States, and without any authority of law, has intervened to determine who are the rightful members of a State Legislature and to organize it not by the law but by the bayonet? That is the question before the Senate. But whenever you touch any such question as that, whenever you point to a violation of law, the old answer, the stereotyped answer, the only song the bird can sing is "Ku-Klux," "murder," "assassination," "outrage!" That is the whole of it, sir, and I have no doubt that if the President of the United States to-morrow were to overthrow any government in the Southern States and institute martial law there without authority of Congress, he would be defended exactly by the same cry of "Ku-Klux," "White League," "murder," "homicide."

But, sir, that will not do. The time has passed by in the United States when plain violations of law, plain violations of the Constitution, can be defended or justified by the cry of "southern outrages." The gentlemen on the other side attempted to work that up last summer. There was a "southern outrage" mill started; the Attorney-General of the United States was the head miller; the grist was ground out; but the people rejected the product of that mill, and set their seal of condemnation upon the reiterated attempt to keep alive the fires of the late civil war and to still stimulate the hatred of one part of the country toward the other. What do you want to do with this country? What is your duty? Your duty to your country is to harmonize the people all over the Union, and not to preach sectional hatred. Your duty is to bring peace and prosperity upon the country, and not to set the people of one portion against the other by an eternal iteration and reiteration of the doctrine that the people of nearly one-third of this Union are a set of assassins and murderers.

What warrant has the Senator from Vermont for charging the people of Louisiana—I say the people of Louisiana—with being a set of assassins and murderers? Because there have been some lives lost down there, does that make the whole people of that State assassins and murderers? Because there have been bad men down there, because there have been men down there reckless of their own lives and reckless of the lives of others, does that make the whole community of that great State a set of thugs and assassins? Are the people of Nevada a set of thugs and assassins because bands of men have roamed through there and destroyed the lives of people?

Mr. EDMUNDS rose.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator rises. I will hear his question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to ask the Senator to be good enough to repeat what I said touching the body of people down there being thugs and assassins.

Mr. THURMAN. If the Senator says they are not, then what justification is there for the General Government to interfere in this manner?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have not said they were not or said they were. I am only asking the Senator from Ohio to quote me correctly.

Mr. THURMAN. What was the whole inference to be drawn from the Senator's speech? Why does he attempt to picture as he has pictured before——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Ah, that is another thing.

Mr. THURMAN. Does he mean to paint for the purpose of showing that there is a little band here or a little band there of bad men or murderers in Louisiana? Did he not lay it, in effect, at the door of the whole white population of that State? Did he not say, in effect, though not in words, that the whole white population of Louisiana were in revolt against the Constitution of the United States, and carrying out their revolt by assassination and murder? If not, what was the use of his speech? What was the use of talking about murders and assassinations if they were casual occurrences that have happened in all communities, and especially have happened after the end of a great civil war in every land where such wars have prevailed? But the Senator says that there are necessary differences with the white population owing to the existence of a black population after the previous existence of slavery down there. I deny that that is any justification, nor is it true in point of fact that there is any such necessary and inevitable antagonism. Where is there a more peaceful State than Virginia? Where is there a more peaceful State than North Carolina? And so of Missouri, my friend [Mr. BOGY] says; and so I might name State after State. Where is there a more peaceful State than are those States—States that were slave-holding States—that contain still a large amount of negro population?

No, sir; it will not do. The Senator knows the reason why Louisiana is agitated. The Senator knows that over two years ago a government was foisted upon the people of Louisiana which was not elected, that the State-house of Louisiana was seized under a midnight order of a Federal judge, an order which our Committee on Privileges and Elections have unanimously declared to be without a parallel in judicial proceedings and utterly void, which he had no jurisdiction to make, which was not even an order of the court, but was the order of the judge at his private house at midnight, without any parties before him, without any motion made for the order, and the order itself not verified as every order must be to have effect; that under that order troops of the United States, at 2 o'clock in the morning, seized that State-house, or what was used as a State-house, and that under that order and under a subsequent order made in the case of Antoine, which our committee also reported, and as every lawyer knows who has looked at it was wholly without jurisdiction and utterly void, not a man was permitted to go into that State-house but such men as a returning board, declared by our same committee to have had no authority whatsoever in the premises, should say were entitled to take seats in that body; and that that returning board counted in Kellogg for governor, Antoine for lieutenant-governor, and a majority of the Legislature, without ever having a single return before them, upon newspaper reports and other rumors, as they swore themselves before our committee, and in some cases without any reports at all but according to their own estimate of what ought to have been the republican majority in those parishes. And, sir, was it to be expected that you would have peace after such a usurpation as that? When that man Kellogg was put into that chair, when that Legislature was inaugurated, when those illegal proceedings took place, then were the seeds of the troubles of Louisiana laid. Had the choice of the people, the men who were elected State officers by more than ten thousand majority, been allowed to take their places in the executive offices, had the Legislature elected by the people been allowed to assemble, Louisiana would be as peaceable a State to-day as is the State of Vermont. That is the truth about it. But in violation of the rights of that people, in utter disregard of free institutions, trampling under foot the elective franchise, and by the exercise of power which your own committee have unanimously reported was unconstitutional, a usurpation was set up there, and that was the first fatal step, that fatal step of the President—that fatal step taken without waiting for the remonstrances of the people of Louisiana to be heard, without waiting for their committee on its way here to appear and represent the true state of the facts—that usurpation and that recognition of the usurpation is the source from which these terrible evils have flown; and therefore we need not be surprised that now, two years afterward, when another election comes, another returning board is found to count out the democratic or conservative majority of twenty-four members and count the minority into a majority in the house of representatives of the General Assembly of that State.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What authority has the Senator for saying that that is the fact?

Mr. THURMAN. I have this authority for saying it, the authority of just as good men and a great deal better men than that returning board. I will show the Senator at the proper time the authority I have. After we get this information the Senator shall see something that has the odor of authority.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You seemed to have the authority now.

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, sir; I will show by the apologetic defense of this returning board itself that it has counted out a majority of twenty-odd against the republican party, and counted in a republican majority, and counted out the State officers who were elected and counted the republican candidates in. Now, when such things as that take place and such conduct is sustained by the Army of the United States, Senators instead of being shocked at seeing it, Senators instead of feeling that their country and her institutions are aggrieved and wronged by such conduct, are here palliating it if not defending it, diverting attention from it by talking about Ku-Klux and white leagues and homicides. Sir, it will not do. The question before us is a question of constitutional law and of statute law, and it cannot be blinked, and it cannot be overshadowed, and it cannot be pushed aside by appeals to the passions of men or by a threat of a still greater degree of despotism upon the prostrate necks of the people of Louisiana.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I wish not to occupy time in reply to the very eloquent effort of my friend from Ohio, and which, I am sure, I never heard before; because I have got so familiar with it that I generally go out when it has been pronounced latterly, but to call the attention of the Senate and of the Presiding Officer to one fact that the honorable Senator has stated, which has a great deal to do with this question.

The honorable Senator says that this returning board, to whom by law the returns were sent, has counted out a democratic majority in the house of assembly of Louisiana and counted in a republican majority, which he says is a very bad thing. If they have done it contrary to law, it is a very bad thing; but I believe we both agree that by the laws of Louisiana it was the business of that board to count one way or the other, and determine for the time being. Then we have, on the Senator's own statement, the fact that a republican majority of that house of assembly had their certificates and attended at the State-house to organize their Legislature; and yet we find him complaining of a violation of law because a mob, headed by his friends, were not allowed to organize themselves in spite of that majority who had certificates.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BOGY] this afternoon seemed to argue that there was an unwillingness upon our part to have this resolution passed asking the President for information. I beg to disabuse the mind of my friend on that subject. I welcomed this resolution, and my friend, if he will reflect for a moment, must know that we all did, because a single objection would have carried it over until to-morrow and prevented its consideration to-day. I welcomed the resolution, but I wanted it enlarged somewhat.

I agree with the Senator from Ohio that this question cannot now be blinked. I am glad we have now come to the point where the ten thousand lies which have been systematically sent up from Louisiana as an apology and an excuse for the numerous murders that have been committed there can no longer blind the people and prevent them from seeing the exact condition of things. Sir, there has been a system of lying in regard to affairs in Louisiana that has had no parallel in this or any other country. Every murder that was committed required a thousand lies to conceal it or to justify it; and hundreds of murders that have been committed have first been denied, and when that could not be done, have then been justified and excused by every species of falsehood that guilt could invent.

And now I want to make reference to one or two statements made by the Senator from Ohio, in conclusion, and I want to refer to the last returning board that he says has made a false return. I ask him how he knows it. I tell him that I deny it. I believe I have good authority for denying it. I have official action, at least upon one side, of men acting under oath; and on the other side we have the statement of white-leaguers, men covered all over with murder and crime; and men who will commit murder will lie. Men who will commit murder, will commit perjury and forgery and arson, and every minor crime for the purpose of covering up their guilt.

Now, I submit one proposition in regard to this last election to the consideration of the Senator from Ohio. I believe they only claim upon the other side that counting all their votes they carried the State by about three thousand. If they have only carried the State, conceding it to be true that they have carried the State, by three thousand after all the murders committed, the intimidation at New Orleans, the hundreds of men killed at Colfax and at Coushatta, and all the murders over the State—if with all the intimidation that these murders brought about, they have only carried the State by three thousand, it presents overwhelming evidence that Kellogg was elected in 1872.

Why, Mr. President, will you tell me that murder does not produce intimidation? Is it to be gravely asserted upon this floor that negroes can be killed by the score and by the hundred, and singly here and there all over the State, and no terror be produced by it? That is absurd. You may make that assertion, but you convince nobody. We know that these murders have kept thousands of men from the polls; and if the democrats have then only by three thousand carried the State, it would be conclusive testimony that Kellogg was elected in 1872. But they have not come within three thousand of carrying the State, even with the intimidation. They have no evidence of it except the statements of these white-leaguers, men who are interested in covering up murder by perjury and falsehood. We have no evidence of it except the statements of the agents of the Southern Associated Press, and it has now come to be a maxim "to lie like an agent of the Southern Associated Press."

Sir, so far as this last returning board is concerned, I know nothing about the particulars of their action. I simply know that they sat for weeks, almost for months, hearing witnesses on both sides, lawyers on both sides going before them and presenting the cases from different parishes and from different precincts, and then trying to make up their minds, honestly, I believe, from the evidence submitted; and when they have come to a conclusion, an attempt is made by force, by fraud, by arms, and by conspiracy to subvert their mature action and to install a Legislature that is to be organized not in accordance with, but in defiance of, the laws of the State of Louisiana.

Now I want to say one word in regard to the Kellogg election. I am sorry to hear one so distinguished as the Senator from Ohio, at this late hour insist upon McEnery's election. The Senator ought to know that to insist on the election of McEnery is to insist upon the most monstrous fraud that has been attempted at any election in modern times. What was the attempt in the election of McEnery? An attempt to overthrow by fraud a majority of not less than twenty thousand people in the State of Louisiana—a notorious and acknowledged majority; and if McEnery was elected, it was because of the most monstrous fraud that was ever practiced. When the Senator insists upon the election of McEnery, he is simply insisting that the arts of fraud and corruption were sufficient to overcome a majority of twenty thousand people in the State of Louisiana. The Senator says that the Committee on Privileges and Elections made a unanimous report to that effect. Not so; I at least dissented from it; therefore it could not be called unanimous.

But I would remind him of another thing that he forgot, and that is that the rest of that committee declared, in so many words and in the strongest language, that the whole election was void for fraud; that McEnery was not elected. The Senator cannot quote that report to prove the election of McEnery, when that committee declare that the election was so tainted and so tinctured with fraud that there was nobody elected. I differed with the committee on that point. There were but two candidates, Kellogg and McEnery, and I was satisfied that one of the two was elected, and that that one was Kellogg, and that Kellogg on the day of his inauguration represented a popular majority in the State of Louisiana of not less than twenty thousand people, and does to this very day. Therefore I want to hear no more about McEnery's election, because McEnery's election claimed or insisted upon is the most monstrous fraud in the history of elections.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator has mistaken what I said about the committee. I said the committee unanimously reported that Judge Durell's orders were without jurisdiction and void; and that is all that is necessary. The Senator shall have enough of this report about McEnery's election before the debate is through.

Mr. MORTON. I think that is rather begging the question on the part of my friend just now. It comes very far short of the statement he made awhile ago I think.

But, sir, a few words more and I am done. The Senator attempts by his remarks to belittle the crimes that have been committed in Louisiana. Able as he is, he is not able to do that. "O," he says, "some lives were lost down there!" Yes, there were some lives lost. There have been as many men murdered in Louisiana for political causes in the last six years as fall in most modern wars. Men have been slaughtered by the dozen, the score, the fifty, and the hundred; and yet this is belittled; it is attempted to be jeered and laughed away by talking about "the outrage business!" I tell my friend that that has passed by. These murders can no longer be concealed, they can no longer be excused by attempted merriment over "the outrage business!"

He says "the outrage business" did not pay last fall. Well, these statements were published, and then there came ten thousand times ten thousand lies, denying them, or excusing them, or justifying them, until the public mind in many places was confused and confounded by the innumerable lies that were told. What was the remark of Talleyrand? "The same lie never wins a second victory;" and a victory won by these innumerable falsehoods cannot be held by the same instrumentalities.

The Senator says that the question of murders in Louisiana has nothing to do with this resolution. He simply wants to know whether the Army was employed down there for the purpose of preventing the organization of a Legislature, and says the murders have nothing to do with the resolution. O, yes, the Senator would exclude them; he would ignore the murder, the systematic murder and crime, but he would keep other outrages in the front that are, if true, confessedly of a minor character. I want to know by my amendment how these fifteen hundred of the Army of the United States came to be in New Orleans; I want to know what took them there, and I want to know if the streets of New Orleans for the last three months have run with blood, the blood of innocent men, shed by men in a rebellion against the State government, and men who are as hostile to the Government of the United States to-day as they are to the government of Kellogg, and who fight one just as cheerfully as they fight the other. I want to know if there is an armed conspiracy in Louisiana to-day that has been going on for months increasing in strength and power in the city of New Orleans and in every parish, threatening from day to day to overturn the State government, every day threatening the life of every white and of every black republican in that State. Let us have the whole truth.

If this be the state of facts, then the country will say "amen" to the presence of the Army in the city of New Orleans. Republicans have a right to be protected whether they are white or black. Men have a right to protection without regard to their political opinions; and the question now comes, and it is a question I submit to my democratic friends on this floor, is murder to become an established institution in this country?

Mr. THURMAN. It will as long as it is the interest of the republican party to say that is the case.

Mr. MORTON. O, "the interest of the republican party!" The republican party commits these murders! Does the Senator mean to say that? I do not deem it necessary to contradict him on that point. No; it is the enemies of the republican party who commit these murders; but they say the republican party aggravates them, drives them to it! We drive them to commit these murders because we do not give them power! And the Senator refers to the fact that Virginia is peaceable, and Georgia is peaceable, and other States where they have the power are peaceable. O, what a confession is this, Mr. President, that where they have the power there is no necessity for murder, but where they have not got the power, there they murder to get the power! That is what the Senator confesses upon this floor by his argument.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator from Ohio confesses no such thing, and the Senator from Indiana has no right to put any such words in my mouth.

Mr. MORTON. I did not put the words in his mouth, but that is the effect of his argument; and I submit it to those who heard him. That is the effect of it, and my friend cannot evade the force of it. His argument is that where they have the power, there is no murder. It is only where they have not got the power that murder prevails. That is a confession, though not so intended, that this murder is for the purpose of procuring the power. Can the Senator deny his own logic?

Ah, the Senator said we ought to bring peace and fraternal love. I say so too, but before you have peace and fraternal love you must stop the murder business. Murder is an enemy of love. It always was. It is a great barrier in the way of friendship. You cannot very readily get the friendship of those whom you murder, or of their families, or of their friends, or of those who are associated with them socially or politically or in any other way. Therefore if you would establish fraternity you must first stop the murder business; and I say to my democratic friends in the North, you cannot handle pitch without being defiled; you cannot acquiesce in murder, you cannot connive at it without being affected by it. Blood is the most demoralizing thing in the world; it contaminates the very soil and makes it barren; and you cannot tamper and trifle with murder without having it come home, as a curse does, to roost. It comes back to those who smile at it, those who favor it, or those even who refuse to condemn it. It is the interest of the democratic party of the North as it is of the republican party of the North and everywhere to condemn it, frown upon it, and bring those who perpetrate it to punishment.

Therefore, Mr. President, I welcome this resolution. I hope the President of the United States will give us all the information he has, and I am glad that the country is awakening to the true condition of things in the South; for if things go on as they are now going on, murder is to become a fixed political institution in this country as it formerly was in some of the countries of Europe.

Sir, we will ask the President of the United States to give us this information. We will get all we can from other sources. We are told this question is to be debated again. I say so and I hope it will be kept before the country. It will be debated until the mists that have been created by the ten thousand lies that have been sent abroad denying or covering up murder shall have been fully dissipated, and the people of this country shall see upon what a brink they stand, upon what a fearful precipice we are now treading.

Ah, Mr. President, this armed organization which the leader confesses exists all over Louisiana exists in other States. It is in Mississippi; it is in Alabama; it is in other States that I might mention—perhaps I might say more or less in all the States of the South. How many men are under arms now, armed with Winchester rifles, in every Southern State? There are independent companies, it is said, but all would spring to arms at the tap of the bell just as the fire-engine comes out here at night on the ringing of the fire-alarm. Men are now under arms in the South, ay, sir, more than there were before the rebellion, ten to one.

What is the ultimate purpose of these armed organizations? Is it simply to carry an election? They do not need it in Kentucky for that purpose; they do not need it in Georgia now for that purpose. I will not now undertake to say what is the ultimate purpose of these armed organizations in the South that now number hundreds of thousands of men in their ranks; but they have a purpose, and that purpose will in due time be fully revealed. I am glad that the people of the United States are being aroused to the exact condition of things.

Mr. CONKLING. It being the usual hour of adjournment, and the convenience of some members of the Senate being concerned in an adjournment now, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and thirty-eight minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 5, 1875.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of Wednesday, December 23, 1874, was read and approved.

SWEARING IN A MEMBER.

Mr. CESSNA presented the credentials of Hon. John M. Thompson, a member-elect from the Twenty-third district of Pennsylvania, to fill the unexpired term of Hon. Ebenezer McJunkin, resigned.

The credentials having been read, Mr. THOMPSON presented himself and was duly qualified by taking the oath prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the morning hour begins at fifteen minutes after twelve o'clock; and reports are in order from the Committee on the Public Lands.

RELIEF OF GRASSHOPPER RAVAGES.

Mr. TOWNSEND, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back without amendment the bill (S. No. 1009) to enable the Commissioner of Agriculture to make a special distribution of seeds.

The bill was read. It appropriates $30,000 to enable the Commissioner of Agriculture to make a special distribution of seeds to the portion of the country which has suffered from grasshopper ravages during the past summer.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I make the point of order that this bill, containing an appropriation, must receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I trust the gentleman from Vermont will not insist on that point. Everybody in the House knows the suffering condition of these people out West; and if we are to do anything at all, it must be done promptly. This is but a small measure of relief at best; and it should be agreed to at once, that the Commissioner of Agriculture may take the necessary action in the case.

The SPEAKER. The point of order not being withdrawn, the bill must go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

LANDS IN ARIZONA.

Mr. TOWNSEND also, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 4119) authorizing the Commissioner of the General Land Office to grant a patent for certain land in the Territory of Arizona.

The bill was read. It authorizes the Commissioner of the General Land Office to include, under the patent for the town site of the town of Yuma, county of Yuma, and Territory of Arizona, that part of the Fort Yuma military reservation (not exceeding five acres of land in all) restored to the public domain under the act of Congress entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of War to relinquish and turn over to the Interior Department such parts of certain reservations in the Territory of Arizona as may be no longer required for military purposes," approved June 22, 1874.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I send to the Clerk and ask to have read a letter from the Commissioner of Public Lands.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., December 28, 1874.

SIR: I have examined House bill No. 4119, entitled "A bill authorizing the Commissioner of the General Land Office to grant a patent for certain land in the Territory of Arizona."

The land involved has recently been released by the Secretary of War from military reservation under authority of the act of June 22, 1874, and lies within the town site limits, as shown by the survey on file in this office. From what examination I have given the subject it clearly appears that the land is necessary for the town as furnishing a water-front, and worth little for any other purpose. So far as is shown by the records of this office there is no adverse applicant for the tract. I have no hesitation in stating that I deem the appropriation of the land to the purpose indicated in said bill as being advisable and in the public interest. I would suggest—as the actual area of the tract will somewhat exceed five acres—that the word "ten" be substituted for the word "five," occurring next after the word "exceeding," in the seventh line of the printed bill.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. S. BURDETT,
Commissioner.

Hon. R. C. MCCORMICK,
House of Representatives.

Mr. TOWNSEND. In accordance with the suggestion made in the letter just read, I move to amend the bill by striking out "five" and inserting "ten;" so that the clause will read "not exceeding ten acres of land in all."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I would like to hear a word of explanation in reference to this bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I will explain it. This is a small tract of land at the junction of the Colorado and the Jila Rivers, which was held as a Government reservation; but as such it has been abandoned and has been turned over to the Interior Department. It is now proposed to give it to the city of Yuma, to be sold in lots for the benefit of the people of that city. It lies immediately along and on the banks of the Colorado River, and unless disposed of in this way it might fall into the hands of speculators and be held by them to the detriment of the people of the city.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. Does the Government realize anything from this?

Mr. TOWNSEND. The tract will go to the city of Yuma under the law concerning town sites; under that law it will be sold at $1.25 per acre. The bill therefore is not required under the rule to go to the Committee of the Whole. I trust there will be no objection to its passage.

Mr. MCCORMICK. It is not proposed to give this land in excess of the town site, but as a part of it, and it will be paid for under the regulations of the Land Office.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TOWNSEND moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RELIEF OF GRASSHOPPER RAVAGES.

Mr. TOWNSEND. My friend from Vermont [Mr. WILLARD] is willing, I understand, to withdraw his point of order upon the bill (S. No. 1009) to enable the Commissioner of Agriculture to make a special distribution of seeds. He desires to occupy a few minutes in an explanation.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. At the personal solicitation of some Representatives from the section of country interested in this measure——

Mr. KASSON. I wish to have the point of order reserved so that it may be insisted upon after the gentleman's explanation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Vermont, if he speaks upon this matter, does so by unanimous consent, and of course if he withdraws the point, any other member is competent to renew it.

Mr. KASSON. I renew the point, but reserve it that the gentleman from Vermont may make his explanation.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, I was going to give my reasons for making the point of order. I agree at this period of the session a Senate bill, which is not particularly objectionable, but only objectionable because it contains an appropriation, might fairly ask to be considered on the report of a committee, and not be sent to the Committee of the Whole, and so should not have made that point on this bill had it not been that its merits seemed to me to require some consideration more than they were likely to receive this morning.

I desire now to call the attention of the House to this bill; and it is a rather melancholy fact when committees are reporting as the Committee on the Public Lands is reporting this morning not very general attention is paid by members of the House to the bill itself which may for the moment be read at the Clerk's desk. This is a bill, Mr. Speaker, directing the Commissioner of Agriculture to make a special distribution of seed to the region of country which has been afflicted with what is known as the "grasshopper plague" the past year. I am totally unable to see any ground whatever upon which Congress can justify such an appropriation. It is certainly unknown to any provision of the Constitution.

Mr. KASSON. Is the gentleman from Vermont going to withdraw his point of order?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I am, after making a brief explanation; but if the gentleman from Iowa proposes to renew the point of order I will not make my remarks at this time.

Mr. KASSON. I do propose to renew the point of order.

Mr. TOWNSEND. If, then, the point of order is to be insisted upon, the Committee on the Public Lands does not wish the hour allotted to it to-day for reports shall be unnecessarily consumed.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I understand the gentleman from Iowa proposes to insist on his point of order, and I will not therefore detain the House further at this time.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, I have a communication from the grasshopper country protesting against this mode of affording relief. But I do not wish to detain the House now. As the bill goes to the Committee of the Whole, I will only say there are good reasons why this mode of relief should not be adopted.

Mr. CROUNSE. I hope the gentleman from Iowa will not insist on his point of order, because if the bill is to be passed at all it ought to be passed now. It will be worthless if postponed till late in the session.

Mr. KASSON. I would not insist on my objection unless from a sense of duty. It is an extravagant way of giving relief, and besides it is not the mode which the people really want, according to the evidence coming to me in a particularly lengthy communication, the importance of which is such that I must insist on my point of order.

Mr. CROUNSE. I ask unanimous consent the bill may be considered now without being charged to the time of the committee. As I have said, the bill should be acted on now if at all. I do not understand the gentleman from Iowa objects to the bill being considered at this time as in Committee of the Whole without prejudice to the time allotted to the Committee on the Public Lands for making reports.

The SPEAKER. That requires unanimous consent.

Mr. TOWNSEND. If the bill is to be considered now, I do not wish it to be taken out of our time.

Mr. CROUNSE. Nor do I want it to be done, but that it shall be taken up without prejudice to the time of the Committee on the Public Lands.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know how that can be done in the morning hour without taking it out of the time of the Committee on the Public Lands. The gentleman from Nebraska can renew his motion at the close of the morning hour.

Mr. CROUNSE. Would not a motion be in order at this time, by unanimous consent, to bring the bill up for consideration?

The SPEAKER. The point of order being insisted upon, the bill has gone to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. If the House now goes into committee, of course the special order will first require attention. It is the duty of the Chair to advise the gentleman from Nebraska that the bill going to the Committee of the Whole places it where it will practically require a two-thirds vote to pass it. The bill, under the point of order, has gone to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

REORGANIZATION OF THE GENERAL LAND OFFICE.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, there is lying upon the table in Committee of the Whole a bill (S. No. 260) to reorganize the clerical force of the General Land Office. It provides for the creation of more offices, and as it will meet, I suppose, with objection, I therefore ask there may be a special assignment for it—say this day week, to the exclusion of all other orders.

Mr. RANDALL. I object to that, as it creates new offices.

Mr. TOWNSEND. All I desire is to get it before the House, in order that the committee may be relieved of the responsibility of the bill, which has been hanging there for a long time to the great detriment of the public service. Every gentleman who has a land district must feel that it is right and proper that the bill should come up for discussion, whatever may be its ultimate fate. I trust there will be no objection.

Mr. RANDALL. The reason I object to this bill is that it creates new offices, and should have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I ask that it be considered as in Committee of the Whole on the day I have named, so that every member on that day may have as large an opportunity for debate upon it as he desires.

Mr. RANDALL. That does not reach my point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TOWNSEND] asks unanimous consent that the bill for the reorganization of the General Land Office be considered this day week, after the morning hour, as in Committee of the Whole. His colleague [Mr. RANDALL] objects to that arrangement.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I now yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. BRADLEY.]

WAHSATCH AND JORDAN VALLEY RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. BRADLEY, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported as a substitute for the bill (H. R. No. 3308) a bill (H. R. No. 4155) granting to the Wahsatch and Jordan Valley Railroad Company the right of way through the public lands for the construction of a railroad and telegraph line; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. RANDALL. I make the point of order that this bill appropriates public property, and must have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I wish to explain to my colleague what I presume he does not know; that this road has been built through nearly its whole extent, and that now all that the company want is the right of way, in order that they may mortgage the road. The House has on no occasion objected under such circumstances to granting the right of way.

Mr. RANDALL. I believe I can tell my colleague something he has forgotten; that we agreed when we were last in session that when bills of this character come up they should all be referred in this manner. And there was then a general understanding—my colleague, perhaps, was not here when it was made; he tells me he was not—that there should be a day assigned when all these bills might be considered together. There should be no favoritism shown to one over another, as would be the case if this bill were not objected to as others have been heretofore. I therefore insist on my point of order.

The SPEAKER. The bill goes to the Committee of the Whole.

ABSENTEE SHAWNEE LANDS IN KANSAS.

Mr. PHILLIPS, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (S. No. 650) explanatory of the resolution entitled "A resolution for the relief of settlers upon the absentee Shawnee lands in Kansas," approved April 7, 1869.

The bill was read. In its preamble it recites that several tracts of land ceded to the Shawnee Indians by the treaty concluded between them and the United States which was proclaimed November 2, 1854, were erroneously set apart and allotted to various individuals of the Shawnee tribe of Indians, and which said allotments were subsequently canceled, and therefore form a part of the residuum of the land which by the treaty aforesaid was to be set apart for the absentee Shawnees.

The bill therefore provides that the terms of the resolution approved April 7, 1869, for the relief of the settlers upon the absentee Shawnee lands in Kansas should be extended to those settlers who now occupy and have improved tracts of land known and described as the east half of the northeast quarter and the southwest quarter of the northeast quarter of section 29, in township 12, of range 23 east of the sixth principal meridian; the south half of the southwest quarter of section 5; the south half of the southwest quarter, the north half of the southwest quarter, and the northwest quarter of section 8, in township 13, of range 22 east of the sixth principal meridian; all located in the State of Kansas, within the boundaries of the tract ceded to the Shawnees by the treaty proclaimed on the 2d November, 1854.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I desire to ask the gentleman from Kansas a question. What class of settlers does this bill relieve? Are they white settlers?

Mr. PHILLIPS. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. How came white settlers on this tract?

Mr. PHILLIPS. These settlers were upon the lands at the time. They were upon them supposing them to be open to settlement, and had been upon them seven or eight years. The Shawnee Indians never occupied the lands in question. I send to the desk to be read the joint resolution which was passed in 1869 for the relief of these settlers, and this bill extends the provision of that act to several tracts, amounting to six or seven hundred acres.

The Clerk read as follows:

A resolution for the relief of settlers upon the absentee Shawnee lands in Kansas.

Whereas a large tract of lands set apart by a treaty with the Shawnee tribe of Indians, dated May 10, anno Domini 1854, and proclaimed November 2, anno Domini 1854, for the benefit of certain absentees of the said Shawnee tribe, is now, and for many years past has been, occupied by a large number of white settlers and citizens of the State of Kansas; and whereas the beneficial interest of the said absentee Shawnees in said lands was and is absolutely forfeited by reason of their continued absence and non-affiliation with the said Shawnee tribe; and whereas the said lands were ordered to be publicly sold at the United States land office at Topeka, August 3, 1863, by Abraham Lincoln, President, by his proclamation dated March 20, anno Domini 1863, and by reason of the absence of large numbers of said settlers from their homes in the Federal armies the sale was indefinitely postponed: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That each bona-fide settler now occupying said lands and having made improvements thereon, or the heirs at law of such, who is a citizen of the United States, or who has declared his intention to become such, shall be entitled to purchase the land so occupied and improved by him, not to exceed one hundred and sixty acres in each case, at the price of two dollars and fifty cents per acre, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior shall prescribe: Provided, however, That the proceeds of said sales shall be applied in accordance with the provisions of the treaty between the United States and the said Shawnee Indians, proclaimed November 2, anno Domini 1854.

Approved April 7, 1869.

Mr. PHILLIPS. The tracts of land affected by the bill before us were by error or fraud patented to parties who had double entries, made under different names. These entries were canceled for that reason, and these tracts ought to have been included under the provisions of the first act, and this measure merely extends it over them.

As my colleague [Mr. COBB] is more familiar with the case, as it is in his district, I yield to him for any other explanation that may be desired.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. By the provisions of the Shawnee treaty of 1854, to which the subject of this bill relates, the land ceded under the treaty was disposed of in this way: First, two hundred thousand acres were set apart to be divided in severalty among the more civilized portion of the tribe residing upon this reservation; second, another portion of the reservation, embracing about thirty-three thousand acres, was set apart in a body for what was known as the Black Bob band of Shawnee Indians, a band of the tribe which chose to retain their lands in common. After all this land was disposed of there was still left several thousand acres of the reservation, which was given by the treaty to what is known as absentee Shawnees—Indians who had left the tribe and gone away from the reservation into the Indian Territory. This absentee Shawnee land, so called, embraced by the terms of the treaty all of the reservation not disposed of in former grants. These absent Indians remained away, and this land was taken possession of by settlers and sold to them by the act just read from the Clerk's desk.

Now, in dividing the land in severalty, it so happens that by mistake or fraud four of the settlers under the treaty obtained patents for an allotment each more than they were entitled to. This bill simply provides that those double allotments shall be disposed of the same way as the absentee Shawnee land was disposed of, to actual settlers under the law referred to. It simply follows in the line of precedent established for the sale of similar lands belonging to this tribe.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the bill will be again reported.

The bill was again read.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PHILLIPS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

THE DESTRUCTION OF FORESTS.

Mr. PHILLIPS, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 2540) for the appointment of a commissioner for inquiry into the destruction of forests and into the measures necessary for the preservation of timber.

The bill was read.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I make the point of order that this bill creates a new office, and should have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The point of order being made, the bill goes to the Committee of the Whole.

OREGON CENTRAL PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. ORR, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4162) granting the right of way and depot grounds to the Oregon Central Pacific Railway Company, through the public lands of the United States, from Winnemucca, in the State of Nevada, to the Columbia River, via Portland, in the State of Oregon; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Unless the gentleman from Iowa consents to a modification of that bill, I shall be obliged to make the point of order upon it.

Mr. ORR. What is the modification?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The bill provides that there shall be twenty acres granted every five miles.

Mr. ORR. No; only every ten miles. This bill is exactly in accordance with the other bills of the same character which have been reported by the committee.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The last bill reported only gave ten acres.

Mr. ORR. Every five miles.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. There is another point in the bill which I think is objectionable. It provides that stone and timber may be taken from the public lands anywhere by this company. I ask for the reading of that clause of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the Oregon Central Pacific Railway Company shall have the right to take from the public lands of the United States timber, stone, and other material necessary for the construction of the road.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Let that provision be so modified that they may take these materials only within the right of way.

Mr. ORR. I have no objection to that.

Mr. HOLMAN. I must object to this bill unless a provision is added, which I will reduce to writing, providing that the State or States through which the said road shall be constructed shall have the right to regulate the cost of transportation over the same.

Mr. ORR. I will consent to that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must remark that there is great irregularity in this mode of proceeding.

Mr. RANDALL. I thought some understanding was come to with the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands as to a special day being assigned for the consideration of these bills.

Mr. NESMITH. I appeal to my friend from Pennsylvania not to make a point of order on this bill. It is very important that it should pass at once.

The SPEAKER. It is too late to make a point of order on the bill; but the Chair directs attention to the fact that gentlemen cannot make conditional points of order.

Mr. NESMITH. Does the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WILLARD] withdraw the point of order?

The SPEAKER. There is no point of order pending.

Mr. RANDALL. Why will not the chairman of the committee fix upon some day when all bills of this class can be considered?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the gentleman having charge of the bill is waiting for the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to write his amendment.

Mr. NESMITH. While the gentleman from Indiana is doing that, I would suggest that this is a matter of great importance to a people who have no railroad connection with any other State in the Union; and if the bill goes over now, I am satisfied that that will be the end of it.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman is not indebted to me at all; he has his bill before the House.

RIGHT OF WAY TO RAILROADS.

Mr. TOWNSEND. While the gentleman from Indiana is writing his amendment, I beg to move that Tuesday, January 12, be set apart for the consideration of all bills already reported from the Committee on the Public Lands granting the right of way to railroads, and all other bills that may be reported in the mean time.

Mr. RANDALL. O, no; not all other bills.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I mean bills of the same character.

Mr. RANDALL. I think that motion ought to be agreed to as to all bills that were reported and referred at the last session.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TOWNSEND] limits his motion to all bills giving the right of way; and he asks that Tuesday next be set apart for the purpose of considering such bills.

Mr. RANDALL. It relates only to bills where no land grant is involved beyond station grounds.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will construe it in that way. The Chair will not hold that any bill comes within this order that goes further than to grant the right of way through the public lands, with the ordinary amount of land for stations.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I want to say that we have on the Calendar, or if we have not on the Calendar we propose to report a general bill granting the right of way, which will save the introduction of all these special bills; and I should wish that bill to be considered.

The SPEAKER. That would come within this vote.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I wish it also to include all bills granting the right of way that we may report before that day.

There was no objection, and the order was made.

OREGON CENTRAL PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of the first section of the bill:

Provided, That the State or States within the limits of which said road or any part thereof shall be hereafter situated shall have power to regulate the cost of transportation of persons and freight over the same.

Mr. ORR. I will agree to that amendment, as I wish this bill to pass.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ORR. I now ask the previous question on the bill as amended.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ORR moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RIGHT OF WAY TO RAILROADS.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It is understood that the assignment of Tuesday next for the purpose proposed was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think that was not so understood.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TOWNSEND] to get unanimous consent that on Tuesday next after the morning hour the House would proceed to consider bills reported from the Committee on the Public Lands which merely granted to railroads the right of way over the public lands with the general allowance for stations, &c., and also a bill which might be a general law regulating the manner in which railway companies might obtain the right of way over the public lands.

Mr. GARFIELD. With what limit of time?

The SPEAKER. For that single day only.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not think we should take a whole day for that purpose.

Mr. RANDALL. We agreed to it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it was fairly agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. Besides we have given a great deal of time to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is not for myself that I ask the time.

Mr. RANDALL. For your bills.

Mr. GARFIELD. We must have time enough for the appropriation bills.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Committee on the Public Lands have no further reports to make.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

When the Committee on Indian Affairs was called,

Mr. AVERILL said: It is so near the conclusion of the morning hour to-day I ask that the Committee on Indian Affairs have the right to submit their reports to-morrow. The committee would have been ready to submit reports to-day, but there was not a quorum of the committee in attendance this morning.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour of to-day can be terminated by moving to go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to proceed to the consideration of business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. WHEELER. I move to suspend the rules, and that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will state the reason why I moved to proceed to business on the Speaker's table. There is one bill known as the Senate civil-rights bill now upon the Speaker's table; and in order to get that disposed of so that it may be out of the way of other business, I desire now to proceed to the consideration of business on the Speaker's table. As chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, I have the right to report a civil-rights bill at any time; but I desire to get this Senate civil-rights bill out of the way.

Mr. RANDALL. Anything which the gentleman has a right to do we cannot help his doing; but anything he has not the right to do I for one object to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] has the right to move to proceed to the consideration of business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. ELDREDGE. There are quite a number of members who desire to make remarks upon the civil-rights bill when it comes up.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Whenever the civil-rights bill comes up I propose to give a reasonable time for debate. I do not think it will come up on this motion. I desire to do nothing without a full understanding. My proposition is to go to the Speaker's table, take up the Senate civil-rights bill, and then I will move to amend it by substituting for it the bill which has been printed for the use of the Committee on the Judiciary, and which is on all your files. Then I propose to put the bill so amended upon its passage, under the right given the committee to report at any time, and to allow reasonable time for debate.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I think the gentleman had better have the bill set down for some day certain than to endeavor to take it up at this time.

Mr. RANDALL. I think this civil-rights bill had better come in the other direction. Let the Committee on the Judiciary report a bill. I for one do not see the propriety of going to the Speaker's table, when by so doing we will reach other bills which, according to the ruling of the Chair, must be considered and disposed of before we can reach the civil-rights bill.

Mr. CESSNA. I understand that there is but one bill upon the Speaker's table that has priority over the civil-rights bill.

Mr. RANDALL. That gives force to my remark. Whether there be one or twenty bills that have priority they must be first disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The civil-rights bill is the first Senate bill upon the Speaker's table. There are two House bills with Senate amendments on the table which will have priority of the Senate bill. The first motion is to go to business on the Speaker's table; pending which the gentleman from New York [Mr. WHEELER] moves that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. WHEELER. Before the vote is taken on that motion, I move that all general debate upon the Army appropriation bill be limited to five minutes, unless there is a disposition to discuss the bill for a longer time.

The question was taken upon the motion to limit debate, and it was agreed to upon a division—ayes 94, noes 58.

Mr. WHEELER moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The question was then taken on the motion to suspend the rules and go into Committee of the Whole on the Army appropriation bill, and upon a division there were—ayes 88, noes 44.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, and Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 99, nays 93, not voting 96; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Bass, Beck, Bell, Berry, Biery, Blount, Bradley, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Bundy, Burchard, Caldwell, Chittenden, John B. Williams, and Ephraim K. Wilson—96.

So the motion of Mr. WHEELER that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to proceed to the consideration of the Army appropriation bill was agreed to.

During the roll-call Mr. MARSHALL said: My colleague, Mr. EDEN, is necessarily absent from the city, having been called away by sickness in his family.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3820) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes.

Mr. WHEELER. Unless the Committee of the Whole desire that the bill shall be read at length, I ask that its first reading be dispensed with.

Mr. BECK. I object.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the bill will be read through.

The bill was read.

Mr. WHEELER. Before we enter upon the consideration of the bill by paragraphs, I want to state that this bill, so far as it appropriates money, is almost a literal duplicate of the Army appropriation bill of last session; there is but a trifling difference in the amount appropriated. The Committee on Appropriations adheres to the policy of keeping the enlisted force of the Army at twenty-five thousand men; and the appropriations now to be considered by the Committee of the Whole are based upon that estimate. The experience of the current fiscal year, so far as we have progressed, demonstrates that the efficiency of the Army has not been impaired by the reduction; and the committee are of opinion that twenty-five thousand enlisted men judiciously distributed throughout this country are the entire military force that will be needed.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him whether he takes into consideration the state of affairs in Louisiana—whether if things go on as at present, and the Army is to be used to control the organization of State Legislatures, it may not be desirable to greatly increase the number of our military force?

Mr. WHEELER. I do not take that into account. I say that in my judgment an increase will not be necessary or desirable. We hope that the question to which the gentleman refers will be settled irrespective of the Army of the United States.

Mr. ELDREDGE. But it is not being settled in that way.

Mr. WHEELER. It will be a sorry day for the Republic when we must depend upon the Army alone to maintain permanent peace in Louisiana.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Already the Army is being used to drive men out of a Legislature while that body is in course of organization.

Mr. WHEELER. That is a matter foreign to this appropriation bill.

Mr. ELDREDGE. It seems to me that it is not.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, the Army appropriation bill of last session contained several provisions not of an appropriative character.

Mr. ELDREDGE. There are eighteen hundred men now engaged in organizing the legislative body at New Orleans.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not know but twice that number may be required; if so, the Government will furnish them.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Then the gentleman should take that into consideration and make these appropriations accordingly.

Mr. WHEELER. I believe that with twenty-five thousand United States troops we can keep even the State of Louisiana in order.

I was remarking that the bill of last session contained several provisions not of an appropriative character. Among them was one suggested by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] relative to military transportation upon railroads. The committee have retained that provision, although they think that in some respects the legislation of last session went beyond the intention of Congress. The Solicitor-General has decided that under that statute the Government must withhold compensation for transportation to all railroads which have received land grants upon any conditions whatever.

Now, to illustrate, here is the case of the Northern Pacific Railroad, which had a grant of land upon the condition solely it should charge no more for transportation of Government property than for the transportation of the property of individuals. The Solicitor-General holds that condition is one which comes within the scope of the legislation of last session.

Another of these extraordinary provisions in the appropriation bill related to the traveling allowance to officers of the Army. Congress provided hereafter actual expenses should be allowed to Army officers traveling on duty. The committee adhere to that policy, although the Secretary of War and the Quartermaster-General recommend we should change back to the old rule of mileage. The committee think this experiment ought to have a fair trial, and we ought to see at least the results of one fiscal year so as to institute comparison.

With this brief explanation, unless something further be required, I ask the bill be read by paragraphs for amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. The inquiry I wish to put to the gentleman from New York is whether in his judgment there may not be further reduction of the Army to twenty thousand men, in view of the number now stationed in the Northeast and Northwest, without really embarrassing in any degree the public service?

Mr. WHEELER. My own judgment is if there be further reduction of the enlisted force of the Army, it must take company organizations with it. We cannot maintain company organizations with a less enlisted force than we now have. That the Army has been diligent during the past summer upon frontier and other duty no gentleman can deny. And it ought to be kept diligent, my own idea of the enlisted force being it is better it should be kept busy than lying around in idleness.

Mr. ELDREDGE. They are kept now very busy in New Orleans.

Mr. WHEELER. And probably they will be kept more busy still.

Mr. TREMAIN. They are not half busy enough.

Mr. BECK. The question I wish to ask the gentleman from New York is why this bill is now laid before us and we are required to pass upon it in advance of publication of the reports of the Secretary of War and of his Bureau officers?

Mr. WHEELER. I will say to my friend from Kentucky, while I do not know how it may be with him, that I have received the printed reports of the Secretary of War, of the Commissary and Quartermaster-General, and of the other heads of Bureaus. They are on file, I believe, and accessible to anybody who may desire them.

Mr. BECK. In reply I will state I have sent twice to the document room to-day and went in the last fifteen minutes myself, and have been assured that none of those reports are there and none have yet been sent there.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not know how that is, but I have received mine in due course of mail.

Mr. BECK. I sent for them for the purpose of being able to ascertain what modifications ought to be made in this bill; and if the gentleman from New York will send to the document-room, he will find they cannot be had. I suppose no gentleman outside of the Committee on Appropriations has ever had them, ever seen them, or ever been able to procure them.

Mr. WHEELER. I can only say to my friend from Kentucky they came to me through the mails. I had proof-sheets sent to me, of course, during the preparation of the bill. The reports came to me through the mails, and I supposed every other member had received them.

Mr. BECK. They are not in the document-room—have not been, and cannot be had. We are now asked to legislate in the absence of official documents showing the action of the Army during the last year. We do not know, of course, what modifications should be made in the absence of reports from the heads of Bureaus of the War Department. We are absolutely in the dark. I had occasion during the last session to call attention to the withholding of reports from the Navy Department when the Navy bill was under consideration. They were withheld when we passed the Navy bill before the holidays. We have not now the reports from the War Department when the Army appropriation bill is under consideration. In my judgment, Mr. Chairman, Congress should refuse to vote a dollar of this money until these reports are laid before us. Here are two volumes of last year's reports and one volume of the same size from the Engineer Department, but not one word of this year's reports to tell us why we should vote this money in the way proposed. If I am mistaken about these reports not being in the document-room I easily can be corrected. It is not fifteen minutes, after having sent two pages without success, since I went to the document-room myself and learned the documents could not be procured. I venture to say nobody outside of the Committee on Appropriations has ever yet seen them.

Mr. NIBLACK. If the gentleman from New York will allow me, I wish to ascertain whether the Committee on Appropriations have had any conference with the Committee on Military Affairs with regard to the Army bill and the general military condition of the country; if so, whether it is contemplated that we shall be called upon to legislate for either an increase or a diminution of the Army or for its reorganization at this session of Congress. It is always a matter of some importance in making appropriations to take into consideration what Congress is likely to do upon the subjects to which the appropriations apply. I know it has been in years gone by customary for the Committee on Appropriations, or at least the sub-committee which has had charge of any particular branch of appropriations, to confer with the other committees of the House who have charge of the particular subjects in connection with which we are called upon to appropriate, so as to be able to state to the House upon what basis the appropriations should be made and what changes ought to be made if the existing laws are insufficient, in order to make the appropriations effective. This, I think, ought always to be done by the Committee on Appropriations, that we may have the legislation necessary for economy on the one side and efficiency on the other. I hope, therefore, the gentleman from New York will be able to state to us what information he has in regard to the probable legislation of Congress on the subject in connection with which appropriations are made in this bill, and whether we are to anticipate any changes as to the organization of the Army during the present session.

Mr. WHEELER. I will inform the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] that this is an appropriation bill, pure and simple; that it does not respect the organization of the Army; that it does not seek even to interfere with what is by law the maximum of the enlisted force. It simply appropriates for the next fiscal year for twenty-five thousand enlisted men. I am not aware that the Committee on Appropriations has had any conference with the Committee on Military Affairs in reference to this bill. If we had sought to interfere with the organization of the Army or to affect it in any other manner than as a matter of mere appropriation, then courtesy would have required that I should have consulted that committee. I have not done so, nor am I aware that other members on the Committee on Appropriations have done so.

Mr. NIBLACK. The gentleman from New York stated that there had been certain new legislation and some of it was ingrafted on the appropriation bill of last session.

Mr. WHEELER. By the House, and not on the recommendation of the committee.

Mr. NIBLACK. I understand that the gentleman says some legislation is contemplated this session. I think the opportunity was given to the committee to propose certain amendments.

Mr. WHEELER. Not on this bill.

Mr. NIBLACK. I understand it was in connection with the legislative appropriation bill. But I think it fair that whatever legislation of an independent character may be attached to this bill, if any, should have the concurrence of the Committee on Military Affairs, or at least that that committee should be consulted in regard to it.

Mr. WHEELER. I think so too. But the Committee on Appropriations do not contemplate anything of the kind. They have not had the rules suspended with a view to offering an amendment to this bill, and I am not aware that there is any necessity for doing so.

Mr. NIBLACK. I find that I was mistaken as to the authority given to offer amendments to this bill.

Mr. BECK. I desire to say just one word further. When I rose to inquire about the reports from the War Department, on which alone we can act intelligently, I did it in good faith; because I do not intend, so far as I am concerned, to vote a dollar to carry on the military operations of this Government until the facts which by law are required to be laid before Congress, and on which we can act, are laid before us. Those facts have been withheld, and are now withheld, for what purpose I do not know, but the presumption is that they are withheld for no good purpose. Those reports will show, at least they ought to show, all the movements of the Army during the past year. These are facts we ought to know, as they may influence our action. I see by the newspaper report of the testimony taken in New Orleans the other day that General Emory, in command of the Army there, swore before our committee that the Army of the United States had been brought into operation in the affairs of Louisiana by order of the Attorney-General of the United States. If he has sworn that, and he is so reported, then I would not vote one dollar to keep up an Army that has been or shall be surrendered to the Attorney-General of the United States. On the contrary, I want those facts to appear, if they are true, so that articles of impeachment shall be brought against that official for daring to take command of the Army of the United States unless called upon by the Chief Executive to do so. If General Emory's statement is true, as reported, we ought to know it—and the reports of his subordinate officers will show—that the Attorney-General has been so interfering, then, instead of making appropriations of money to maintain an Army to be so used we ought to deal with the heads of Departments who are thus prostituting their offices and prostituting the Army and guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors in office. I do not know whether it is true or not. The papers state that General Emory so swears. The reports of the Bureaus of the War Department will show whether it is true or not. I want to know this, and have a right to know it, before I am called upon to vote the money of my constituents to maintain this Army. The facts are withheld from us now. If the statement be a slander, and if the Attorney-General has not interfered in this way, then let the country know it; but if he has done as the papers say that General Emory has sworn, let that fact appear, and then let the consequences follow; but until we have these reports I shall steadily vote against every appropriation, right or wrong, because it is my right to know the facts before I vote.

Mr. WHEELER. I concede most fully the right of the gentleman and of every other member of the committee to know the facts before they vote. But my friend from Kentucky was so eager to go into Committee of the Whole that I supposed he was prepared to consider the bill.

Mr. BECK. Let me say that I was desirous to do anything to defeat the civil-rights bill.

Mr. WHEELER. O!

Mr. BECK. And, if necessary, I will filibuster from now until the 4th of March to defeat that bill.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Let the republican side of the House take notice.

Mr. BECK. We will try our best, at any rate.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Permit me to say that the fact about the report of the Secretary of War is that we have the report itself, but we do not have yet printed the accompanying documents.

Mr. WHEELER. I have sent to the document-room and ascertained that the report is not there, and it is not only due to every member that he should have the report before being called upon to vote on this bill, but we cannot legislate fairly and candidly unless we have it.

Mr. LAWRENCE. One word more; we all have the report, I suppose, but not the accompanying documents. The report was transmitted to Congress at the proper time, and it is no fault of the Secretary of War that the accompanying documents have not been printed. That belongs to another Department.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not stop to question where the fault lies. It is sufficient for my purpose that the House has not the information on which we can legislate before it, and to the end that it may attain it, and read it diligently, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. CESSNA having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 3820) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

BUSINESS ON THE SPEAKER'S TABLE.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move that the House now proceed to business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. RANDALL. Pending that motion I move that the House take a recess for one hour.

Mr. BECK. I desire to know if the motion to go to business on the Speaker's table is now a privileged motion, business having intervened since the expiration of the morning hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion is clearly in order and the two motions are pending. The Chair recognizes them. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] renews the motion that was pending before the House went into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House do now adjourn, and on that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BECK. Pending that motion I move that when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Thursday next.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I object to that motion. The gentleman cannot interrupt the roll-call.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will not entertain any further motion. There is already a motion pending to take a recess, and a further motion that the House do now adjourn, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered; and until that question is decided the Chair will entertain no further motion.

Mr. RANDALL. There is no haste about this matter, gentlemen. There are plenty of motions that we can make.

The question was taken; and decided in the negative—yeas 63, nays 123, not voting 102; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Beck, Bell, Blount, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Caldwell, John B. Clark, jr., Cook, Cox, Crossland, DeWitt, Durham, Eldredge, Finck, Giddings, Glover, Gunter, Hagans, Hamilton, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hatcher, Hereford, Herndon, Holman, Hunton, Knapp, Lamar, Leach, Magee, McLean, Milliken, Mills, Neal, Nesmith, Niblack, Hosea W. Parker, Pelham, Randall, Read, Milton Sayler, Schell, Sloss, Southard, Stone, Swann, Waddell, Wells, Whitehead, Whitthorne, Willie, Wolfe, Wood, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—63.

NAYS—Messrs. Albert, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Bass, Begole, Biery, Bradley, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Carpenter, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Clayton, Clements, Stephen A. Cobb, Comingo, Corwin, Crounse, Crutchfield, Curtis, Danford, Dobbins, Donnan, Duell, Eames, Farwell, Field, Fort, Freeman, Frye, Garfield, Gooch, Gunckel, Eugene Hale, Harmer, Harrison, Hathorn, Havens, Joseph R. Hawley, Hays, Gerry W. Hazelton, Hodges, Hooper, Hoskins, Howe, Hunter, Hynes, Kelley, Killinger, Lawrence, Lawson, Loughridge, Lowe, Lynch, Alexander S. McDill, MacDougall, McKee, McNulta, Merriam, Monroe, Negley, Niles, Orth, Packard, Packer, Page, Isaac C. Parker, Perry, Phillips, Pierce, Pike, James H. Platt, jr., Poland, Pratt, Purman, Ray, Ellis H. Roberts, James W. Robinson, Rusk, Henry B. Sayler, Scofield, Isaac W. Scudder, Sener, Sessions, Shanks, Sheats, Sherwood, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Small, Smart, A. Herr Smith, H. Boardman Smith, John Q. Smith, Stowell, Charles R. Thomas, Christopher Y. Thomas, Thompson, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Tremain, Tyner, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, Wheeler, White, Whiteley, Wilber, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, John M. S. Williams, William Williams, James Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, and Woodworth—123.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Albright, Barnum, Barry, Berry, Bland, Bowen, Buckner, Cannon, Chittenden, Freeman Clarke, Clymer, Clinton L. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Cotton, Creamer, Crittenden, Crooke, Darrall, Davis, Dawes, Dunnell, Eden, Foster, Robert S. Hale, Benjamin W. Harris, John B. Hawley, John W. Hazelton, Hendee, Hersey, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Houghton, Hubbell, Hurlbut, Hyde, Kasson, Kellogg, Kendall, Lamison, Lamport, Lansing, Lewis, Lofland, Lowndes, Luttrell, Marshall, Martin, Maynard, McCrary, James W. McDill, Mitchell, Moore, Morey, Morrison, Myers, Nunn, O'Brien, O'Neill, Orr, Parsons, Pendleton, Phelps, Thomas C. Platt, Potter, Rainey, Ransier, Rapier, Richmond, Robbins, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Ross, Sawyer, John G. Schumaker, Henry J. Scudder, Sheldon, Sloan, George L. Smith, J. Ambler Smith, William A. Smith, Snyder, Speer, Sprague, Stanard, Standiford, Starkweather, Stephens, St. John, Storm, Strait, Strawbridge, Sypher, Taylor, Vance, Waldron, Wallace, Walls, Whitehouse, Charles G. Williams, William B. Williams, and Ephraim K. Wilson—102.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. ST. JOHN said: I am paired with Mr. STORM, of Pennsylvania. If present he would vote "ay," and I would vote "no," on this motion.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] that the House now take a recess for one hour.

Mr. RANDALL. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BECK. Pending the motion for a recess, I move to amend it so that the House will take a recess until ten o'clock to-morrow morning; and on that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. RANDALL. Pending the motion for a recess, I move that the House now adjourn; and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Has any business intervened since the House last voted on a motion to adjourn?

The SPEAKER. The House has ordered two yeas and nays on two separate motions for a recess, which constitutes business.

The yeas and nays were then ordered upon the motion to adjourn.

Mr. BECK. If it is in order to move now that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Thursday next, I will make that motion.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Does not the motion to adjourn take precedence?

The SPEAKER. The motion to fix the time to which the House will adjourn takes precedence of the motion to adjourn.

Mr. COX. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to fix the time to which the House will adjourn.

Mr. HEREFORD. If in order I move to amend the motion to adjourn, so that the House when it adjourns to-day will meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. The Constitution of the United States forbids that motion.

The yeas and nays were then ordered on the motion of Mr. BECK.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President, by Mr. BABCOCK, his Private Secretary, informed the House that the President had approved and signed a bill of the House of the following title:

An act (H. R. No. 4144) providing for the authentication of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and for preserving the originals of all laws in the Department of State.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The question was upon the motion of Mr. BECK that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Thursday next, upon which the yeas and nays had been ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 58, nays 124, not voting 106; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Beck, Bell, Blount, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Caldwell, John B. Clark, jr., Cook, DeWitt, Durham, Eldredge, Fink, Giddings, Glover, Gunter, Hagans, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hatcher, Hereford, Hunton, Knapp, Lamar, Leach, Magee, Marshall, McLean, Milliken, Mills, Neal, Nesmith, Niblack, Perry, Randall, Read, Milton Sayler, Schell, Sloss, Southard, Stone, Swann, Waddell, Wells, Whitehead, Whitthorne, Willie, Wolfe, Wood, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—58.

NAYS—Messrs. Albert, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Bass, Begole, Biery, Bradley, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Carpenter, Cason, Cessna, Chittenden, Amos Clark, jr., Clayton, Clements, Stephen A. Cobb, Comingo, Corwin, Crounse, Crutchfield, Curtis, Danford, Dobbins, Donnan, Eames, Farwell, Field, Fort, Frye, Gooch, Gunckel, Eugene Hale, Hamilton, Harmer, Harrison, Hathorn, Havens, Joseph R. Hawley, Gerry W. Hazelton, Hodges, Hooper, Hoskins, Houghton, Howe, Hunter, Hynes, Kasson, Kelley, Killinger, Lawrence, Lawson, Loughridge, Lowe, Lynch, Maynard, Alexander S. McDill, MacDougall, McKee, McNulta, Merriam, Monroe, Moore, Myers, Negley, Niles, Orr, Orth, Packard, Packer, Page, Hosea W. Parker, Isaac C. Parker, Pelham, Phillips, Pierce, Pike, James H. Platt, jr., Poland, Pratt, Purman, Ray, Ellis H. Roberts, James W. Robinson, Rusk, Henry B. Sayler, Scofield, Isaac W. Scudder, Sessions, Sheats, Sherwood, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Small, Smart, A. Herr Smith, H. Boardman Smith, John Q. Smith, Snyder, Starkweather, Stowell, Thompson, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Tremain, Tyner, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, Whiteley, Wilber, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, John M. S. Williams, William Williams James Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Woodworth—124.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Albright, Barnum, Barry, Berry, Bland, Bowen, Buckner, Cannon, Freeman Clarke, Clymer, Clinton L. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Cotton, Cox, Creamer, Crittenden, Crooke, Crossland, Darrall, Davis, Dawes, Duell, Dunnell, Eden, Foster, Freeman, Garfield, Robert S. Hale, Benjamin W. Harris, John B. Hawley, Hays, John W. Hazelton, Hendee, Herndon, Hersey, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Holman, Hubbell, Hurlbut, Hyde, Kellogg, Kendall, Lamison, Lamport, Lansing, Lewis, Lofland, Lowndes, Luttrell, Martin, McCrary, James W. McDill, Mitchell, Morey, Morrison, Nunn, O'Brien, O'Neill, Parsons, Pendleton, Phelps, Thomas C. Platt, Potter, Rainey, Ransier, Rapier, Richmond, Robbins, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Ross, Sawyer, John G. Schumaker, Henry J. Scudder, Sener, Shanks, Sheldon, Sloan, George L. Smith, J. Ambler Smith, William A. Smith, Speer, Sprague, Stanard, Standiford, Stephens, St. John, Storm, Strait, Strawbridge, Sypher, Taylor, Charles R. Thomas, Christopher Y. Thomas, Vance, Waldron, Wallace, Walls, Wheeler, White, Whitehouse, Charles G. Williams, William B. Williams, and Ephraim K. Wilson—106.

So the motion of Mr. BECK was not agreed to.

SOUTHERN CLAIMS.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I ask unanimous consent to report a bill to pay the claims allowed by the commissioners of claims, and to have it printed and recommitted to the Committee on War Claims, with leave to report it back at any time.

No objection being made, the bill (H. R. No. 4156) making appropriations for the payment of claims reported allowed by the commissioners of claims, under the act of Congress of March 3, 1871, was received, read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the Committee on War Claims, with leave to report at any time.

HOMESTEADS TO ACTUAL SETTLERS.

Mr. PAGE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4157) to amend an act entitled "An act to secure homesteads to actual settlers on the public domain," approved May 20, 1862; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN M. DORSEY AND WILLIAM SHEPEARD.

Mr. PAGE also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No.

4158) for the relief of John M. Dorsey and William Shepeard; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

PAY DEPARTMENT OF THE ARMY.

Mr. MACDOUGALL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4159) to reduce and fix the Pay Department of the Army; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

W. W. VAN ANTWERP.

Mr. WILLARD, of Michigan, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4160) for the relief of W. W. Van Antwerp, of Jackson, Michigan; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

INMATES OF INSANE ASYLUMS.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4161) for the protection of the postal rights of the inmates of insane asylums; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I must now insist upon the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the question recurs upon the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] that the House now adjourn, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 61, nays 115, not voting 112; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Arthur, Atkins, Banning, Beck, Bell, Berry, Blount, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Caldwell, John B. Clark, jr., Comingo, Cook, Cox, Crossland, De Witt, Durham, Eden, Eldredge, Finck, Giddings, Glover, Gunter, Hamilton, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hatcher, Herndon, Holman, Hunton, Knapp, Lamar, Leach, Magee, Marshall, Milliken, Mills, Neal, Nesmith, Niblack, Hosea W. Parker, Perry, Randall, Read, Milton Sayler, Schell, Southard, Stone, Swann, Waddell, Wells, Whitehead, Whitthorne, Willie, Wolfe, Wood, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—61.

NAYS—Messrs. Albert, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Bass, Begole, Biery, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Roderick R. Butler, Carpenter, Cason, Cessna, Chittenden, Amos Clark, jr., Clayton, Clements, Stephen A. Cobb, Corwin, Crounse, Crutchfield, Danford, Dobbins, Donnan, Duell, Eames, Farwell, Field, Fort, Frye, Garfield, Gooch, Gunckel, Hagans, Eugene Hale, Harrison, Hathorn, Joseph R. Hawley, Gerry W. Hazelton, Hodges, Hooper, Hoskins, Howe, Hunter, Kasson, Kelley, Killinger, Lansing, Lawrence, Lawson, Lowe, Lynch, Maynard, Alexander S. McDill, MacDougall, McKee, Merriam, Monroe, Myers, Negley, Niles, Orr, Orth, Packard, Packer, Page, Isaac C. Parker, Phillips, Pierce, Pike, James H. Platt, jr., Poland, Pratt, Purman, Ray, Ellis H. Roberts, James W. Robinson, Rusk, Henry B. Sayler, Scofield, Isaac W. Scudder, Sener, Sessions, Sheats, Sherwood, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Small, Smart, A. Herr Smith, H. Boardman Smith, John Q. Smith, Snyder, Starkweather, Stowell, Charles R. Thomas, Christopher Y. Thomas, Thompson, Thornburgh, Townsend, Tyner, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, Wheeler, Whiteley, Wilber, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, John M. S. Williams, William Williams, James Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, and Woodworth—115.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Albright, Archer, Ashe, Barnum, Barry, Bland, Bowen, Bradley, Buckner, Benjamin F. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Freeman Clarke, Clymer, Clinton L. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Cotton, Creamer, Crittenden, Crooke, Curtis, Darrall, Davis, Dawes, Dunnell, Foster, Freeman, Robert S. Hale, Harmer, Benjamin W. Harris, Havens, John B. Hawley, Hays, John W. Hazelton, Hendee, Hereford, Hersey, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Houghton, Hubbell, Hurlbut, Hyde, Hynes, Kellogg, Kendall, Lamison, Lamport, Lewis, Lofland, Loughridge, Lowndes, Luttrell, Martin, McCrary, James W. McDill, McLean, McNulta, Mitchell, Moore, Morey, Morrison, Nunn, O'Brien, O'Neill, Parsons, Pelham, Pendleton, Phelps, Thomas C. Platt, Potter, Rainey, Ransier, Rapier, Richmond, Robbins, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Ross, Sawyer, John G. Schumaker, Henry J. Scudder, Shanks, Sheldon, Sloan, Sloss, George L. Smith, J. Ambler Smith, William A. Smith, Speer, Sprague, Stanard, Standiford, Stephens, St. John, Storm, Strait, Strawbridge, Sypher, Taylor, Todd, Tremain, Vance, Waldron, Wallace, Walls, White, Whitehouse, Charles G. Williams, William B. Williams, and Ephraim K. Wilson—112.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. CESSNA.) The question now recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] that the House take a recess till ten o'clock to-morrow morning, on which motion the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 55, nays 121, not voting 112; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Beck, Begole, Bell, Berry, Blount, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Caldwell, John B. Clark, jr., Comingo, Cook, Cox, Crossland, Durham, Eldredge, Finck, Gunter, Hamilton, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. So the motion of Mr. BECK for a recess till ten o'clock to-morrow morning was not agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent to make a proposition, to see whether we cannot come to some understanding.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not think it is worth while for us to hear any proposition.

Several MEMBERS. O, let us hear it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to make a proposition. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. My proposition is simply to fix the hearing of the civil-rights question for Tuesday next, immediately after the morning hour.

Mr. TOWNSEND. There is an assignment for that day.

Mr. RANDALL. Let me say that the gentleman from Massachusetts has leave, as the representative of the Judiciary Committee, to report at any time on this subject. He need not make these propositions.

Mr. ELDREDGE. What debate does the gentleman from Massachusetts propose to allow on the bill?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will state it if you will allow me.

Mr. RANDALL. We do not wish to reach the bill at all.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It is by unanimous consent to fix this for Tuesday next after the morning hour, and to allow then such debate as will be satisfactory to the minority in view of the public business. I think this matter should be fully discussed. Then my proposition is to take the Senate bill from the table, amend it, offer the amendment of the Judiciary Committee which is on your tables, and which I suppose will be passed by the majority of the House if they can get to a vote. That will send the question back to the Senate precisely as it would if I report the House bill and that is sent to the Senate; although it is not quite courteous with a Senate bill upon our table to pass a House bill on the same subject and send it to the Senate.

Mr. RANDALL rose.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. One word further.

Mr. RANDALL. I thought the gentleman had concluded.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Besides, the Senate bill would then remain upon the Speaker's table, provided I report the House bill, to stand in the way of all business upon the Speaker's table during the remainder of the session. So nothing is gained by the majority, so far as I understand it, in having the Senate bill amended and sent to the Senate. There is nothing gained; but there is a gain to the public business by getting the Senate bill out of the way. That being so, I propose to take that exact course, and give all the time any gentleman will say is reasonable and just and proper for the discussion of the bill.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I suppose there would have been no opposition to going to the Speaker's table if the gentleman from Massachusetts had not announced his purpose was to take up the civil-rights bill—to do precisely what he said now it was his purpose to do. It is not the object of this side of the House to delay important public business. It is well known what our feelings are in regard to the civil-rights bill. They are opposed to that, and it is that only which they are seeking to oppose by this course. If the gentleman had gone to the Speaker's table with an understanding the civil-rights bill should be laid aside, there would have been no objection, no opposition made to it, as I apprehend, although I am not authorized to speak for anybody but myself. However, I suppose such would be the result, that there would be no opposition to go to the business upon the Speaker's table with an understanding the civil-rights bill should not be taken up, but on the contrary should be laid aside. Besides, the gentleman must remember he announced his purpose to go there to take up the civil-rights bill and to do the very thing he now seeks, which is to take up the civil-rights bill for consideration.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. What objection is there to that?

Mr. ELDREDGE. The objection is we are all opposed to that bill and entitled to use every parliamentary and legal means to defeat its passage. To that extent we purpose to go under any and all circumstances.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. My purpose is to amend the bill.

Mr. ELDREDGE. But the gentleman does not propose to amend it to our satisfaction. His proposition does not meet our views.

Mr. GARFIELD. Does the gentleman mean the other side will resist by all means in their power the consideration of the civil-rights bill?

Mr. ELDREDGE. The gentleman understands very well what I mean.

Mr. GARFIELD. Does the gentleman mean to say they object to any consideration of the proposition?

Mr. ELDREDGE. I think, so far as I am able to understand the opinions of this side of the House, they feel it to be their duty to defeat, if possible, the passage of this civil-rights bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. To defeat what? To defeat the consideration of the subject? Does the gentleman mean that?

Mr. ELDREDGE. He does not.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is what we are coming to.

Mr. RANDALL. With this House consideration involves passage.

Mr. ELDREDGE. This is a proposition to take it up and pursue a certain course in regard to it.

Mr. GARFIELD. The purpose is to open it up for discussion—for full consideration.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. And amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. And amendment in this House; and do I understand the gentleman from Wisconsin to say the other side have resolved that the subject of the equal rights of American citizens shall not be discussed?

Mr. ELDREDGE. The gentleman could not have so understood me.

Mr. GARFIELD. Shall not be amended and voted on?

Mr. ELDREDGE. The gentleman could not have understood any such thing.

Mr. GARFIELD. How then am I to understand him?

Mr. ELDREDGE. What I endeavored to say was that this side of the House, as I understand their views, are opposed to the civil-rights bill, and feel it to be their duty to defeat its passage by all the means within their power. I did not say anything about defeating the rights of American citizens. The gentleman from Ohio drew upon his imagination for that.

Mr. GARFIELD. O, no! I said the gentleman ought to recognize this fact, that the proposition now before the House was to consider the subject open to amendment, open to debate, open to full action, and no man here is entitled to say what the bill is on which the House will be called upon to vote.

Mr. ELDREDGE. If I were to answer what the gentleman says in regard to our opposition to the rights of American citizens I should reply to him that we believe the civil-rights bill, in the form in which it is proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts to be passed, is an injury to American citizens, both white and black, and that it would be the destruction of the black race.

Mr. GARFIELD. Does the gentleman know what that form is?

Mr. ELDREDGE. I think I do. I am somewhat familiar with the views of the gentleman from Massachusetts, having been with him on the Judiciary Committee, and I think I know his views on this subject better than the gentleman from Ohio does.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say for one that I do not know what is proposed by the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I do. In that respect I have the advantage of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GARFIELD. Very well; but there are one hundred or perhaps two hundred members on this floor who do not know what proposition is to be offered in regard to this subject. But we do say that we claim it as the right of members of this House to consider a great subject and to act upon it in the way of debate and amendment. I understand, however, the gentlemen on the other side to say, at least practically, by their conduct, that that subject-matter shall not be by this Congress taken up for consideration at all.

Mr. ELDREDGE. The gentleman is drawing again upon his imagination.

Mr. GARFIELD. Why, then, does the gentleman resist the plain proposition to take this up for consideration?

Mr. ELDREDGE. The gentlemen on this side of the House, I think I can say without assuming too much, supposed that the gentleman from Massachusetts was capable of making his own proposition and managing this bill, being the chairman of the committee that had the subject under consideration, without the assistance of my friend from Ohio.

Mr. GARFIELD. But the gentleman from Massachusetts is not capable of obtaining legislation on the subject without the assistance of other gentlemen.

Mr. ELDREDGE. And as the gentleman from Ohio does not know anything about it, does not know what amendments are to be brought up, does not know what consideration has been given to it, it seems to me he ought to leave the matter in the able hands of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman from Wisconsin has full liberty, as I understand it, to offer whatever amendments he pleases to this bill. Now I cannot understand how he, or any other man here, has such foreknowledge that he can now say that all the various amendments which gentlemen may choose to propose to this bill are amendments which ought not to be considered, and that nobody ought to have the right to offer them. I have some very well-defined notions myself of what I would like to offer on a bill of this kind, but the gentleman says I shall have no opportunity, and no other man shall have the opportunity.

Mr. ELDREDGE. We want to have time to consider it. I think we had better sleep on it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I think I must resume the floor. I desire to ask the gentlemen on the other side simply this: Whether they propose to filibuster against the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, that has been some three weeks now on the files of the House?

Mr. RANDALL. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I understand the evil of to-day is that we are wasting the public time.

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That is sufficient, I think.

Mr. RANDALL. I want to say a word on that point.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to say that no public business whatever is suffering by the proceeding this side of the House has adopted. Under the rules, at any time a majority of this House can suspend the rules and proceed to the public business. Now, in reference to the statement made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, that it was the same thing whether we passed the Senate bill, or took it up and amended it and then passed it—that doing that was the same thing as taking up the House bill from the Judiciary Committee, I am sure he knows enough of legislation and has observed enough in his long term of service to know that he is mistaken in that respect. It is a very different thing.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Why?

Mr. RANDALL. To take up the Senate bill and amend it increases the facility of its passage through Congress. The other way would require a more tedious proceeding, which we should prefer.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. And we want to oppose that tedious proceeding. I ask my friends on the other side—and I want to have it distinctly understood—if they will agree to have the bill set down for consideration with the understanding, which shall be carried out so far as I have charge of it, that it shall be fully debated, that every proposition shall be fully debated, and that every amendment shall be voted upon that any man will say is offered in good faith, so that everybody shall have the right to put his views not only before the country in the shape of a speech, but to try and put before the House such views to incorporate in legislation as the House will adopt.

Mr. RANDALL. Then stick to your House bill.

Mr. BECK. Allow me to say a word. I desire to speak not for this side of the House, for I have no right to speak for it, but so far as I am concerned I desire to say, and to say it in the hearing of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, that I believe all upon this side of the House are entirely willing to go on with the appropriation bills; we have thirteen of them still undisposed of.

Mr. GARFIELD. The Committee on Appropriations moved to go into Committee of the Whole to-day.

Mr. BECK. And we voted with you.

Mr. GARFIELD. But the gentleman rose and objected to going on with the bill that was pending because certain Bureau reports were not before us, and upon his own objection, made very strenuously, the member of the Committee on Appropriations having charge of the bill did not press it, because gentlemen on the other side were unwilling to go on without those reports.

Mr. BECK. Allow me to say that that is not a true statement of the facts. I voted to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union in good faith; and, expecting to make objection to some features of the bill, I went to the document-room to see if the necessary documents were there. I found that those documents were not there after we had gone into Committee of the Whole; and when I found that fact I had a right to insist on a postponement of action on the bill. I only called attention to the fact that we were doing with the Army bill what we did with the Navy bill before the holidays—putting it through without the reports from the Bureaus. But there are eight or nine other bills with which we could go on. The Committee on Appropriations was here for weeks—for more than a month—before Congress met preparing those bills; and doing it, I believe, without much opposition from this side of the House. We have never asked for general debate. We have thrown no obstacle in the way of your finance bill or the other regular business. We will endeavor to aid you faithfully in passing all necessary legislation; but I will say further that whatever means I have of defeating the civil-rights bill I shall endeavor to use to defeat that bill; and I do not intend to consent to go to the Speaker's table to give it any advantage if I know how to prevent it. I think I have a right to do that. It is leaving all the legitimate business of the session—the finance, the appropriation bills, and all private claims—to throw in a firebrand here, and we are going to resist it if we can.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I am one of those who believe that there is other public business for Congress to do in the present exigencies of the country except passing appropriation bills to take money out of the Treasury in the shape of public or private claims. I think the question of settling the rights of citizens of this country is as high a one as the getting a little more or less money in an appropriation bill. I do not understand what gentlemen mean when they say that we are leaving the public business. It is the public business of Congress to settle the great questions which are before the country, and this is one of them which all men here and elsewhere recognize the importance of and upon which we differ. And now the only proposition before the House is whether the other side of the House will let us consider any proposition of public business that they do not want passed.

Mr. NIBLACK. Allow me a word. The House has given to the Committee on the Judiciary the right to report this measure at any time. Now, then, as there seems to be some difference, why do not the Committee on the Judiciary make that report which the House has authorized them to make?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Let me answer my friend from Indiana. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] has answered him in this, that he says that by reporting the House bill it would be a more tedious course of legislation. Now, to avoid this more tedious course of legislation and get at the same thing, I am trying to bring this bill before the House.

Mr. NIBLACK. Why does not the gentleman from Massachusetts ask to have the Senate bill referred to the Judiciary Committee, and then, at some time when it suits his convenience, report it back with such amendments as the committee may deem advisable?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Let us understand. I only want practical matters. If I bring forward the report of the Judiciary Committee, will the other side of the House filibuster on it?

Mr. RANDALL. O, we cannot answer that.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Will gentlemen on the other side filibuster on the report of the Committee on the Judiciary and the amendments thereto which they may offer to the House?

Mr. RANDALL. We are not going to commit ourselves to any hypothetical condition of things.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I can state to the gentleman exactly what it is that the committee propose to report.

Mr. ARCHER. Is it the Senate bill?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No, sir; it is not.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I think I can answer the gentleman. His first question is that it is a simple question whether this side of the House will allow the majority to consider this great subject of civil rights. Now, the gentleman from Massachusetts knows as well as I know, and as well as every other member upon the floor of this House knows, that this side of the House is entirely impotent to prevent just such action as the other side have the right to take under the rules provided for the House. But we, as a minority, have the right to avail ourselves of those rules to the utmost extent, and beyond that we do not propose to go.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. You cannot go beyond that.

Mr. ELDREDGE. We propose to go just as far as we can under the rules that govern this body in defeating that bill; beyond that we do not propose to go.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Because you cannot.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Now, the gentlemen asks us whether we will promise him that we will not filibuster upon the proposition which may come from the Committee on the Judiciary. Does the gentleman suppose that we are going to put our necks into a halter which he is to prepare for us before we know how strong the strands are, or whether we can get out or not? He certainly is too shrewd to expect us to do that.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Let us deal with this matter fairly and justly. We are now engaged in a filibustering performance against the Senate civil-rights bill. If the Senate bill is the objective point, I will try to remedy that. But if any civil-rights bill is the objective point, if the consideration of a civil-rights bill in any form is the objective point, under the rules which will allow the minority to make it a mere question of endurance, then we might as well fight it out now as at any time. If the minority have the power to prevent us from considering a civil-rights bill, it is of no consequence what kind of a civil-rights bill we fight over; it may as well be one as another.

Mr. ELDREDGE. The gentleman's proposition went a good deal further. We have shown him by our actions what we propose to do upon his proposition of to-day. We have shown him that we are to some extent disposed to antagonize his proposition of to-day. But he now asks us if this bill is sent to the Committee on the Judiciary, and that committee shall consider it with the gentleman from Massachusetts at its head, with all the ideas he has upon the subject of civil rights, and the bill shall come back ultimately to the House, whether we will promise him that we will not filibuster against it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No, sir; that was not the question I asked. It was if we send the Senate bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, and I should report the bill which is already on your tables, with the privilege of amending it, whether that bill will be filibustered against. That is the question. I do not propose to do anything by indirection.

Mr. COX. Allow me one word. I never knew any great advantage to be obtained by filibustering in this House during a somewhat long term of service here. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] seems to argue this matter to us somewhat as to the importance and dignity of legislation as to which subject shall first be considered by us. Now, so far as I am concerned, I voted to proceed to the consideration of the Army appropriation bill in Committee of the Whole. But the gentleman from Massachusetts would set aside all the appropriation bills for the purpose of getting at a mere abstract question, as I hold this civil-rights bill to be, connected with social life. Yet we know that this very day the bayonets of the United States are throttling the sovereign State of Louisiana. That, sir, is to-day the most important question for the consideration of Congress; yet we here seem to be utterly indifferent to it. If you want practical legislation, if you want business done, if you do not want a volcano, a new civil war, then drag off your bayonets from Louisiana, and do something practical. Your civil-rights bill, if you pass it, will only bring on trouble. For one I will not help the Judiciary Committee that failed to report on Louisiana to get forward with any other business. Let them bring up Louisiana and settle that matter properly and give peace to the South, and the civil rights of the nation, North and South, will be better cared for.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. A single word right here. I am as anxious to get at Louisiana as any man on earth. But we have sent a committee to Louisiana to ascertain and report to us the facts. And while that committee is out, while that committee is getting information, I do not propose to undertake to attack or to defend anybody upon that matter.

Mr. RANDALL. Why does not your President do it?

Mr. COX. And let me say——

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Pardon me; I heard you, now hear me. I do not propose to make any attack or defense simply upon the lying telegrams of the Associated Press, or upon the report of anybody except the report of our own committee. And when that report comes in, I will stay here night and day until peace is given to Louisiana. I did it once, and I would be glad to do it again.

Mr. RANDALL. How did you do it?

Mr. COX. He did not do it so as to make it permanent. And if he did anything well then, he has overturned it by what he has done since.

Mr. GARFIELD. They said years ago that it we would take our troops away from Fort Sumter we would have peace.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Massachusetts states to-day that he proposes to wait until a committee appointed and sent to Louisiana to make investigation into the affairs of that State shall have reported before he is ready to act upon that matter. I want to know whether the President did not give this Congress an assurance in his last annual message that we might expect he would not act unless there was a failure on the part of Congress to act. Now, I maintain that in obedience to his suggestion in his message we have in good faith sent a committee to Louisiana to investigate and report to Congress the facts in regard to the condition of affairs in that State. I want to know now from the gentleman whether, in such a condition of things as I have stated, he justifies the interference of the military power in that State, and the throwing out of men, duly elected, from the legislative halls of the State by the bayonet?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I can answer the gentleman. I do not justify the throwing out of men duly elected from the halls of that Legislature; but I do justify throwing out intruders who had no shadow of claim by law, so that they should not come in and vote themselves into a Legislature to make laws for the people who would not elect them. We cannot guarantee a republican form of government if intruders are allowed to come into the halls of legislation in that way.

Mr. COX. You are prejudging the question.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No, sir; pardon me. My friend [Mr. RANDALL] spoke of men "duly elected."

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly, I said so.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I say they were not "duly elected." There is the difference.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not want the bayonet used till the facts are ascertained.

Mr. WADDELL. Mr. Speaker, is this debate proceeding by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. WADDELL. Then I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina objects to this debate proceeding further. The question is on the motion to take a recess for one hour.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Is a motion to adjourn in order now?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Several MEMBERS. Let us not adjourn.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Allow me a single word. I see no use in spending time filibustering at unseasonable hours, when it can be done just as well to-morrow. We have now spent a full day. I propose that we now adjourn.

Several MEMBERS. No, no!

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Let us adjourn now, and to-morrow morning we can begin again. I move to adjourn.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 381) to create an additional land district in the State of Oregon, to be called the Dalles land district;

An act (S. No. 433) for the relief of Mrs. Susan A. Shelby; and

An act (S. No. 650) explanatory of the resolution entitled "A resolution for the relief of settlers upon the absentee Shawnee lands in Kansas," approved April 7, 1869.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The question being put on the motion of Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, that the House now adjourn, the Speaker declared that the ayes appeared to prevail.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. ASHE: Resolutions of the Legislature of North Carolina, in regard to removal of obstructions from Neuse River, to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, the petition of Thomas F. Carter, to be compensated for services rendered the Federal Army, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. WHITEHEAD: The petition of Eliza J. White, of Rockbridge County, Virginia, for relief, to the Committee on War Claims.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 6, 1875.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceeding was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLINTON LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker had signed the following enrolled bills; which were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (S. No. 381) to create an additional land district in the State of Oregon, to be called the Dalles land district;

A bill (S. No. 433) for the relief of Mrs. Susan A. Shelby; and

A bill (S. No. 650) explanatory of the resolution entitled "A resolution for the relief of settlers upon the absentee Shawnee lands in Kansas," approved April 7, 1869.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 4119) authorizing the Commissioner of the General Land Office to grant a patent for certain land in the Territory of Arizona was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of War, recommending an appropriation for the employment of two draughtsmen in the office of the Quartermaster-General; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of General E. O. C. Ord in relation to the sufferers from the grasshopper plague; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of War, transmitting a communication from Major-General J. M. Schofield respecting the repeal of the law which forbids promotion in the staff of the Army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of War, recommending an amendment to the pending legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, so as to authorize the retention of thirteen enlisted men in the Ordnance Bureau; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of War, recommending an appropriation for the purchase of land required for the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting the report of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey for the year 1874; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

He also laid before the Senate the annual report of the Congressional Printer, showing the condition of the public printing, binding, &c., for the year 1874; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented five petitions of citizens of Nevada, praying the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 3281) amending an act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, so that certain lands provided for in it may be duly assessed and taxed as other lands; which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented resolutions of the Board of Trade of Portland, Oregon, urging upon the Senators and Representatives from that State to use their influence while the reciprocity treaty with the Hawaiian Kingdom is being negotiated to allow no discrimination of duty between the higher and lower grades of Hawaiian sugars, and that all sugars from that kingdom be imported free of duty into the United States; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Wisconsin, praying an appropriation for the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers; which was referred to the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Sea-board.

Mr. PATTERSON presented a resolution of the General Assembly of South Carolina, relative to the deposits made in the Freedman's Savings Bank; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SARGENT presented a memorial of the Legislative Assembly of Idaho Territory, in reference to the United States assay office at Boise City, giving reasons why an appropriation should be made to continue in operation that assay office; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WADLEIGH presented the petition of Marie Louise Perrin and Troutmann Perrin, praying compensation for destruction of their property by the bombardment of Greytown, Central America, by the United States sloop of war Cyane; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MERRIMON presented a resolution of the Legislature of North Carolina, in favor of a refund of the tax levied and collected on spirits of turpentine after the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of North Carolina, in favor of an appropriation for the improvement of the harbor of Edenton, North Carolina; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of North Carolina, in favor of an appropriation to remove the obstructions to navigation in the Neuse River, below the city of New Berne, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of North Carolina, concerning the Freedman's Saving and Trust Company; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CRAGIN presented the petition of Benjamin Fellows, of Hanover, New Hampshire, a soldier in the war of 1812, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PRATT, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2156) granting a pension to Nathan A. Winters, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 888) directing the name of James Brown, of Oregon, to be placed on the pension-rolls and granting him a pension, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3689) granting a pension to Bernard Sailer, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3728) granting a pension to Abby A. Dike, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3181) for the relief of Mrs. Mary A. Thayer, have had the same under consideration, and instructed me to report it back and recommend its indefinite postponement. At the request of the Senator from New York farthest from me [Mr. CONKLING] I ask that the bill may go on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. WADLEIGH. The Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3170) for the relief of John W. Marsh, made a report in favor of the bill at the last session which by some mistake was not ordered then to be printed. I move now that the report be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

GOVERNMENT OF THE DISTRICT.

Mr. SARGENT submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. No. 963) for the better government of the District of Columbia; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CRAGIN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1086) to regulate promotions in the staff of the Marine Corps; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1087) to fix and reduce the Pay Department of the Army; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. INGALLS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1088) for the relief of D. S. Miller and G. W. Riley; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAYTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1089) to amend an act entitled "An act granting a pension to Martha E. Orrick, Mary J. Orrick, and John J. Orrick, minor children of John C. Orrick, deceased;" which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HITCHCOCK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1090) for the relief of A. W. Greely, Fifth Cavalry, United States Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1091) to amend the fourteenth section of the act to establish the judicial courts of the United States, approved September 24, 1789; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

VOLUNTEERS IN PURSUIT OF JOHN MORGAN.

Mr. PRATT submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pensions be instructed to inquire into the propriety of reporting a bill extending the benefit of the pension laws to such of the volunteer forces concerned in the pursuit and capture of General John Morgan and his men, on their raid through the States of Indiana and Ohio in 1863, as were disabled in consequence of wounds or injuries received in the line of duty while engaged in that service under the calls of the governors of those States, and to the widows and dependent relatives of such as died in consequence of disabilities incurred in the same service.

LAND ENTRIES.

Mr. HARVEY. If there be no further morning business, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3250) to confirm pre-emption and homestead entries of public lands within the limits of railroad grants in cases where such entries have been made under the regulations of the Land Department.

Mr. WEST. I rise to inquire whether the proposition of the Senator from Kansas will exclude the further consideration of the resolution that was under discussion yesterday, as I understand that to be the unfinished business?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That will come up at one o'clock.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the Senator from Kansas moves to take up the bill named by him during the morning hour. When the morning hour expires, the unfinished business of yesterday will come up.

Mr. WEST. The resolution of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] will come up at one o'clock, then?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Yes, sir. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. SARGENT. That bill, I am informed, the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. STEWART,] who is expected every day, who was on the Committee on Public Lands when it was there considered, desires to be heard upon. If the Senator from Kansas only desires to make some remarks on the bill and to take it up in the morning hour for that purpose, I have no objection; but I do not wish that the bill shall be taken up for passage until the Senator to whom I have referred has an opportunity to state his objections or propose his amendment to the bill.

Mr. HARVEY. I have no desire to discuss the bill unless it becomes necessary in explanation of some of its provisions. I desire to have it taken up this morning so that some progress can be made toward its passage. I have made several efforts to have it taken up, but it has been laid aside because of the absence of certain Senators who expressed a desire to discuss it. My impression is that some of those Senators are present this morning, and I should like to have the bill read and proceeded with so far as possible, in order that we may see what objections, if any, appear to it.

Mr. SARGENT. I have no objection to a discussion of the bill.

Mr. WRIGHT. I trust my friend, the Senator from California, will not interpose further objection to the consideration of this. It is important that we make some progress in it at all events, and if possible dispose of it this morning. If it shall strike the Senate that there be no fair objections to the bill, it might be disposed of this morning.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not know the nature of the objections the Senator from Nevada would urge to the bill, but by special request I desire that he shall have an opportunity to be heard on the bill. I understand that he will be here in a very short time.

Mr. WRIGHT. I will state in explanation that there are many cases pending in my own State in the courts, and it is important to know whether we are to have this legislation or not, in view of such litigation. I hope, therefore, the bill will be taken up and progressed with as far as possible this morning, and that if there be no fair objection to the bill we may have a vote upon it.

Mr. SARGENT. I have no objection to a discussion of the bill, but I do not want it disposed of to-day in the morning hour.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion to take up the bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill (H. R. No. 3250) to confirm pre-emption and homestead entries of public lands within the limits of railroad grants, in cases where the entries have been made under the regulations of the Land Department, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The first section confirms all pre-emption and homestead entries, or entries in compliance with any law of the United States, of the public lands, made in good faith upon tracts of land with n the limits of any land grant prior to the time when notice of the withdrawal of the lands embraced in the grant was received at the local land office of the district in which such lands are situated or after their restoration to market by order of the General Land Office, and where the pre-emption and homestead laws have been complied with, and proper proofs thereof have been made by the parties holding such tracts or parcels, and patents for the same are to issue to the parties entitled thereto.

According to the second section, when at the time of such withdrawal valid pre-emption or homestead claims existed upon any lands within the limits of any such grants which afterward were abandoned, and, under the decisions and rulings of the Land Department, were re-entered by pre-emption or homestead claimants who have complied with the laws governing pre-emption or homestead entries, or who shall make the proper proofs required under such laws, such entries are to be deemed valid, and patents to issue therefor to the person entitled thereto.

Section 3 provides all such pre-emption and homestead entries which may have been made by permission of the Land Department, or in pursuance of the rules and instructions thereof, within the limits of any land grant, at a time subsequent to expiration of such grant or when the grantee was in default in the performance of any of the conditions imposed by such grant, shall be deemed valid and a compliance with the laws, and the making of the proof required shall entitle the holder of such claim to a patent therefor.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill was reported by the Committee on Public Lands with amendments.

Mr. FENTON. Is this bill before the Senate now?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is before the Senate, having been taken up by a vote.

Mr. FENTON. I did not listen very attentively to the reading of the bill. I should be glad to examine it. If the Senator having charge of it will allow it to lie aside until another morning, I will examine it in the mean time.

Mr. HARVEY. In answer to the Senator from New York, I would state that the bill has been laid aside a number of times. It was reported last June and has been on the desks of Senators since that time.

Mr. SHERMAN. If my friend from Kansas will allow me, I would like him to explain to us the scope and purpose of the bill. It seems to be a very important bill, and must affect a great multitude of cases. I think he will expedite the matter if he will explain the general scope and purpose of the bill. I only know it by hearing it read. I wish also he would speak louder. We cannot hear him.

Mr. HARVEY. On account of a severe cold, I am unable to speak as loudly as I might otherwise do; but I can state in a few words the general scope and object of this bill. It provides that homestead and pre-emption settlers upon the public lands who have complied strictly with the law and the rules and regulations of the Department at the time when their settlements were made and their proof completed shall be entitled to their patents. It has simply this scope and no more. I do not think there can be any well-founded objection urged to the bill; and until I hear some objection urged, I have no disposition to take up the time of the Senate in discussing it.

Mr. SHERMAN. The proposition of the Senator seemed to me so plain that I wanted to know who contested it. Where a pre-emption or homestead entry has been formally and regularly made before any grant by an act of Congress, how could that homestead or pre-emption claim be defeated by any subsequent act? I cannot imagine how the difficulty could arise, and therefore I want to know from the Senator what gives rise to this difficulty.

Mr. HARVEY. There has been an opinion entertained by some few persons that a homestead or pre-emption claim which had been taken when there was no question about the propriety of taking such a claim, prior to the receipt at the local land office of the notice of withdrawal of the lands for a railroad grant, would not be valid. The person making the entry received a formal and lawful certificate, and yet the opinion was advanced later that persons having made such entries in pursuance of the laws of the United States might have their entries defeated by the claim that the right of the railroad company under the grant made to it attaching not from the time of the receipt of the notice of withdrawal of the lands for the grant, but from the time of the passage of a resolution by the board of directors of the railway company at a time when neither the settler who had made the entry in good faith and received his formal certificate of the fact nor the officials of the local land office had any notice or could in any way have known that there could be any adverse claim to the land.

This bill, as I stated in the beginning, simply provides that where a settler under any of these laws has complied fully with the laws and with the regulations of the Land Department at that time, his right and title to his home shall not be defeated by any other construction.

If Senators will examine the bill, they will see that it needs no explanation, it is so evidently just in its nature.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Will the Senator state whether or not this bill in the first section changes the law in regard to settlers' rights when they locate upon lands that have been granted to railroad companies or to other companies for internal improvements? Does it not change the law, and is it not retroactive in its operation?

Mr. HARVEY. No, sir. My understanding is that this bill does not change the law and is not retroactive in its operation, but that it prevents a retroactive ruling or new construction which has been placed upon the law from defeating the rights which a settler had acquired under the law. That is my understanding of it, and I think an examination of the bill will satisfy Senators that it is correct.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Let me ask further whether the construction of the Department in regard to the law has not been this: that when the order was issued from the Department withdrawing lands from pre-emption and sale that order took effect immediately? I ask if this section does not change the construction of the Department, whether the construction is right or not as a legal proposition, so that settlers who went upon lands after the order was issued and before notice of the issuance of the order was received at the local office will hold their lands? Does it not change the construction of the Department so as to give title to the occupant of lands whose title would not be recognized by the Department on the construction now given to the law?

Mr. HARVEY. My understanding is that the original construction of the Department was that the right of a company or corporation to whom a grant had been made could only attach, as against an actual settler, at such time as the officers charged by the law with the issuance of evidence of settlement received notice of the order of withdrawal. The construction was that the land was only withdrawn from the action of the homestead and pre-emption laws when these officers charged with the duty of issuing the original evidence of title to the settler had notification of it. That is my understanding of the history of the questions arising under these land grants. This bill is an attempt to defeat the effect of later retroactive rulings of the Department which have been based upon the assumption, not that the withdrawal took place at the time that the Department first made the order, but that it took place on the passage of a resolution by the board of directors of a corporation having received the grant, even before the General Land Office or the local land officers had any notice of it.

Mr. HOWE. I should like to ask the Senator a question for information. Is the question raised by this first section a question which the Legislature can control at all? Is it not a question for judicial determination rather than for legislative determination?

Mr. HARVEY. In answer to the Senator from Wisconsin, I will state that I apprehend that it is a question for legislative action, for the reason that the persons having rights under the homestead and pre-emption laws, if their certificates of entry are canceled, cannot go into court.

Mr. HOWE. Is the Senator quite sure of that? If, under the pre-emption and homestead laws as they stand, A does what entitles him to a pre-emption or a homestead right, is there discretion in the Department to refuse to recognize that right? Will not the judicial department enforce that right?

Mr. HARVEY. I would ask the Senator how the pre-emption or homestead settler, whose certificate is canceled by departmental action, can get into court? Where is his evidence of title? I will cite him to an instance not directly under the operation of the homestead or pre-emption laws, but a law similar in its provisions, the law which provided for the sale of the Osage ceded lands in Kansas. It provided that only actual settlers could become purchasers, and required a settlement and improvement as preliminary, it being very much like the pre-emption law in that respect. A great number of settlers being affected exactly alike by a certain ruling of the Department, having their certificates canceled, had no means by which they could get into court, and it became necessary for my predecessor here and my colleague by application to the Department of Justice to secure by their intervention a method by which these settlers could go into court and plead their rights there; and so far as the United States district courts are concerned for that locality, they have been successful. But I call attention to the fact that it required an extraordinary intervention in order to procure this relief. Throughout all the land States and Territories where the pre-emption and homestead laws are in force, where so many land-grants have been made to railroads, if the settlers have their certificates of pre-emption or homestead entry canceled, there is no way with which I am acquainted by which they can bring their case before the courts. The aim of this bill is simply that such settlers may not be defeated in their rights, but that they may have the patents issued to them which the Government by its general laws promised they should have upon compliance with its requirements.

This I think is a matter of simple justice to those people. I cannot see how the Senate of the United States can hesitate to give them this relief at once. By giving the settler the muniment of title to which he has vindicated his right by compliance with the law and by furnishing the proper proof, you only give him an equal right with the corporation claiming adversely. It is useless to claim that the legal or equitable rights of these corporations will be defeated by the passage of the bill, because if they have really legal and equitable rights adverse to those of the settlers, those rights can be pleaded under the law making the grant. Further, the passage of this bill is not a finality. The issuance of a patent even, if it has been given improperly, does not conclude the adverse claimant. It only places the settler and the corporation upon equal terms so far as regards admission to the courts of the country.

Mr. HOWE. If I do not embarrass my friend, I would like to suggest that I think that is entirely correct, that this law would not be a finality; that, in spite of this law, any party who conceived that he had a right prior to and better than the right of the pre-emption or the homestead claimant, would still be permitted to stand upon that right and go into the courts to vindicate it. The first objection that occurred to me to this bill was that it was a bill providing for endless litigation, or unlimited litigation; and if we attempt to do a thing which we are not permitted to do, to confer a right now which we have already conferred upon somebody else, we do not really benefit the new grantee, the homestead claimant, or the pre-emption claimant, if he is to be the party; we only insure him a lawsuit. And, now, would the Senator have any objection to letting this bill go to the Judiciary Committee, so that they may examine this section in connection with the existing statutes, for I am not familiar with them, either the laws granting homestead rights, or the laws making railway grants? Would he have any objections to letting these statutes be examined by the Judiciary Committee, and wait for a report of that committee upon the question whether we are now attempting to meddle with rights already vested under existing laws?

Mr. HARVEY. So far as I am concerned, I will say that I object most decidedly, and I think all the friends of this bill and of the pre-emption and homestead laws would object to having this bill referred to any other committee now. It was reported, as I stated in the beginning, last June. I made endeavors several times to have it taken up for consideration then. Those gentlemen who desired to discuss it were then aware of whatever objections might be urged against it, and then would have been the proper time to move its reference to the Judiciary Committee.

As to what my friend from Wisconsin says with reference to its simply insuring the settler a lawsuit, I will state that in my opinion it is sometimes an advantage even to be able to have your rights brought before a court for judicial determination. Without a bill like this, these settlers have no such right even.

Mr. SARGENT. If I do not embarrass the Senator, I should like to ask for an explanation of the second section. His remarks so far have applied to the first section; and, as I understand the rulings of the Land Office, the first section does not change the practice heretofore. I may be in error about that, but I have no particular exception to the first section. It seems to me, however, that the second section and then again the third section are liable to several constructions. I call attention to this language:

> That when at the time of such withdrawal as aforesaid valid pre-emption or homestead claims existed upon any lands within the limits of any such grants which afterward were abandoned, and, under the decisions and the rulings of the Land Department, were re-entered by pre-emption or homestead claimants who have complied with the laws governing pre-emption or homestead entries.

Mr. HARVEY. I will state to the Senator that my understanding is, and I think the Senator upon considering it fully will see that the meaning of that is, that these claims were abandoned, not the grants.

Mr. SARGENT. But it says "grants which afterward were abandoned." I think we need the services of the Judiciary Committee to put this in legal language.

Mr. HARVEY. The abandonment there has reference to the pre-emption or homestead claims. If he will read the section carefully, the Senator will see that it has reference not to the abandonment of a grant, but to the abandonment by the settler of the homestead or pre-emption claim.

Mr. SARGENT. If the Senator will examine that, he will see that it reads "within the limits of any such grants which afterward were abandoned." There is a chance for construction that the abandonment refers to the grants. Having, however, got over that verbal criticism, which might, perhaps, amount to a very great obstacle in the explanation of the bill hereafter, I should like to direct his attention to the body of the section, even if it bears the construction he puts upon it. It provides that where there was a valid pre-emption or homestead claim existing upon any land which was abandoned, which became entirely nugatory, of no benefit or advantage to the person who made the entry, without conferring any obligation on the United States—for that is what abandonment means—that abandoned homestead or pre-emption shall be made the method of giving some vitality to a pre-emption to be entered after the grant has been made and after the withdrawal was actually made and after the railroad company has built its road. So that something which is absolutely abandoned, which in law is as near death as can be expressed by any word in the English language, is to be rehabilitated, put upon its feet, and stamped into the Land Office for the purpose of giving respectability and countenance to something that is entirely subsequent to all its rights which have accrued to the company. If the construction he puts on the language is right, the inference I have drawn from the section is a necessary conclusion.

Mr. HARVEY. The Senator evidently misapprehends the intention of that section. It refers, I am well satisfied, to pre-emption or homestead claims which had been abandoned by settlers; and under the rulings of the Department at that time the land, having been abandoned, reverted to the Government. There was a claim that it reverted to the railroad company upon abandonment by the settlers; but the Land Department decided that instead of reverting to the railroad company it reverted to the Government and became again public land of the United States, subject to either homestead or pre-emption entry. Such being the ruling at that time, other settlers in good faith took those claims which had been abandoned by former settlers and complied with the law and rulings, and made the proper proof; and now we ask that patents be issued to them.

Mr. SARGENT. Does the Senator say that that is the ruling of the Land Office now?

Mr. HARVEY. I say that was the ruling at the time to which this section refers.

Mr. SARGENT. But that ruling has since been changed.

Mr. HARVEY. There have been, as the Senate no doubt knows, at different times different rulings, conflicting rulings; and the scope of this bill, and the whole scope of it if he will examine it, is simply to provide that those who at the time their settlements were made and their proof filed complied with the law and regulations then in force, shall be entitled to their patents.

Mr. SARGENT. This is now the ruling of the Land Office or it is not. If it is not the ruling of the Land Office, as the Senator says, it is because on reconsideration they have overruled a former ruling. The former ruling, it occurred to me, without much examination of this bill and of the case, would seem to have been right; that is to say, where a thing had been actually abandoned it could not afterward be set up as evidence of something which had no existence; and therefore the ruling of the Land Office would seem to have been correct. If, however, the Land Office now holds that it is a fair construction of all the laws of Congress that an old abandoned claim, which is dead, may be set up to create life in something else, then the section is entirely unnecessary.

Mr. HARVEY. The Senator certainly does not understand that this section attempts to revive an abandoned claim.

Mr. SARGENT. I understand it to make it a condition of the privilege granted to the subsequent possessor that there shall have been a former one abandoned; otherwise I see no necessity of mentioning that abandonment at all.

Mr. HARVEY. It is simply this, that it provides for cases where a grant was made originally, and at the time the grant was made these claims which have since been abandoned were then occupied by settlers who abandoned them afterward.

Mr. WRIGHT. Will the Senator from Kansas allow me to say a word in explanation of this section and also of the other section?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HARVEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. WRIGHT. As I understand, the main object of this bill is not to give to the settler any right that he has in fact, or in equity, beyond what he now has; but to so provide by law as that he shall have some evidence of that right, for the reason that, as the law stands now, under the constructions given to the different railroad grants at the Interior Department, the railroad companies take title either by the patent issued to the companies or under and by virtue of the terms of the law, according to the construction that is given; and they thus have a patent, or that which amounts to a title in fee, or an evidence from the Government of the United States that they are entitled to these lands. They go into court as the law stands now, and having thus this superior evidence of title, and the homesteader or preemptor having no such evidence, as a matter of course he has no standing in court. Now, in view of this condition of things, this bill provides for three classes of cases——

Mr. BOUTWELL. Do I understand the Senator to say that a standing in court cannot be based upon a certificate of entry in most of the States?

Mr. WRIGHT. Certainly, it can, so far as a certificate of entry is concerned; but, under the rulings of the Department, as they stand now, the certificate is canceled, or if not canceled, at all events it is claimed that the railroad companies, in virtue of the construction which has been given to the statutes, have the better title in the face of, and in opposition to, these certificates.

I was about to say that this bill covers three classes of cases. In the first place, the Department hold, as I understand, that the railroad grant took effect as against the persons who are described in the first section of this bill, actual settlers, from the time that notice of the withdrawal of the lands from sale was filed or found in the local land office; and therefore up to that time the actual settler had a right to go upon the lands and make improvements. In many instances in the West they did go upon such lands and make such improvements prior to notice of such withdrawal being found in the local land office. It occurred that afterward the Department ruled that these grants take effect from the time that the railroad companies by the resolution of their board of directors determined to accept a particular line; and then on each side of the line, ten miles or twenty miles according to the grant, they took lands that had been thus settled upon, before there was any notice of the withdrawal of the lands in the local land office.

Now it is provided by the first section of this bill that in such cases the actual settlers shall have some evidence so as to give them a standing in court.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to ask my friend when the decision was made which gave effect to the mere resolution of a board of directors without the knowledge of the Department or the knowledge of the Land Office?

Mr. WRIGHT. Of the decision made by the Land Office I am not prepared to give the exact date; but the decision thus made has affected numberless actual settlers in the Western States, and there is controversy and litigation now in the courts growing out of just such cases.

Mr. SHERMAN. It seems to me that that decision ought to be before the Senate. It seems to me very extraordinary indeed that the title should depend on an act within the knowledge of only one party.

Mr. WRIGHT. There can be no question in my judgment but that the true rule of law is that these grants never took effect as against actual settlers until notice of the withdrawal was filed in the Land Office.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly; but it seems to me the Senator having charge of this bill ought to produce that decision.

Mr. WRIGHT. If there be any question as to the fact that such a decision was made, it can be produced.

Mr. HARVEY. In response to the Senator from Ohio, I will state that in coming here this morning I was under the misapprehension that the resolution introduced and discussed yesterday would probably occupy the time; but finding an opportunity this morning to bring forward the bill, and at any rate learn what objections could be urged against it, I moved to take it up. I can furnish at another time, if necessary, the evidence that the Senator from Ohio is asking for. I thought those things were within the knowledge of every Senator here, except, possibly, as to the particular date of certain decisions and orders. Not expecting to have an opportunity to bring this bill forward to-day, I have not the dates and the memoranda at hand.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I suggest to my friend from Kansas that he submit the bill to the Commissioner of the General Land Office and inquire of him what the effect of it will be as to any equity on the part of any railroad company; whether Congress will not be called upon to supply all the lands that they now claim, and which might go over to actual settlers.

Mr. HARVEY. That is a question which would not affect the rights of these people at all.

Mr. BOUTWELL. If by general consent I can make a statement——

Mr. WRIGHT. Allow me just to make a statement——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts asks leave to make a statement in connection with the bill under consideration during the morning hour, the morning hour having expired. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The Committee on Public Lands did call upon the General Land Office for information in regard to this bill. I supposed this morning that the letter was on the files of the Secretary of the Senate; but not finding it there I have sent to the room of the Committee on Public Lands, and I have found the document, which is very instructive.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask that the letter be printed in the RECORD, so that we may see it to-morrow morning.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Without troubling the Senate to read it, I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection to that suggestion.

The letter is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., May 25, 1874.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the reference from you personally of House bill No. 3250, to confirm pre-emption and homestead entries of public lands within the limits of railroad grants in cases where such entries have been made under the regulations of the Land Department, which passed the House 11th instant.

If I correctly understand the purport and intent of the bill, it simply proposes in the first section to enact at this time a provision which in my judgment might with propriety have been made a condition in all acts making grants for railroad purposes.

But as those laws have been passed, and rights have vested under them according to their express signification, and many of them have already been construed by the courts to fix the date of actual location of the line of the roads as the time when title vested to the lands granted, without regard to date of withdrawal, I do not see how a legislative declaration at this time can defeat such right, or give to settlers who have unfortunately gone upon the lands subsequent to such date a superior title to that of the railroad companies.

Should the courts after all hold, notwithstanding such declaration by Congress, that the better title is in the company receiving the grant, great wrong will have been done the settlers by inviting them to make further improvements, and receiving further evidences of title by the issue of patent.

As the holding of certificates of entry will in most of the States enable suits to be maintained for a judicial determination of the question of title, I am of the opinion that it should not be further complicated by the passage of an act that will compel this Department, in violation of its understanding of the laws governing the adjustment of cases coming before it, to issue patents for claims that without the act would be deemed illegal and clearly in conflict with rights already vested at their inception.

The second section can have no application, for the reason that no necessity exists for the confirmation of entries permitted upon lands excepted from the grant by valid claims existing at date of definite location; and if the withdrawal was subsequent to location of the road, a claim valid at the date of withdrawal must have been also valid at the prior date, and entries made upon lands in that condition are approved as a matter of course under the present laws. If the withdrawal was prior to the definite location, and the claim was abandoned prior to such location the Department has not ruled that subsequent entries should be allowed; and if in any case such entry has been permitted, it has been in violation of the rules, and clearly erroneous.

If these errors could be cured by legislation without conflict with vested rights, they could be reached without additional legislation, under the acts of 1846 and 1856, conferring equitable powers upon the Department.

I am unaware of any cases existing in the Department which would be affected by the third section, and see no impropriety in its provisions, unless it may be held to revive claims already passed upon and settled, and disturb titles already passed out of the Government under previous adjustments, or unless Congress may have revived some grant once expired, without making conditions for such claims, and have vested title without reserve in the company receiving it. In such case I cannot recommend the destruction of legal titles for the purpose of recognizing mere equitable rights founded upon misconstruction of law and originating in mistakes of either Department or legislative officers.

The bill in its present form seems to be broad enough to cover cases running back indefinitely, and to restore entries canceled years ago, where lands have already been patented under the railroad grants, and where title may have been a matter of transfer for years between the successive assignees. If passed at all, it should, in my judgment, be confined to cases where patents for the lands or the equivalents for patents have not yet issued, leaving to the courts the control of titles after they have once passed from the Government. This office has no power to compel the relinquishment of the outstanding evidences of title; and to authorize the issue of two patents for the same land, except in cases where the clearest legal right demands the issue of the second, only serves to bring contempt upon the decisions and actions of the Government, to cast doubt upon every United States patent, and destroy confidence alike in Government officials and the public records.

While I very much desire that some relief may be granted to the settlers, I cannot recommend the sacrifice of vested rights to accomplish the object. By way of inducement, however, to the railroad companies to yield to the claims of the settlers, this office has prepared and recommended a bill, Senate No. 606, which was also offered in the House, (No. 2630,) and with amendments passed that body on the 4th instant, No. 3162.

This will, if passed by the Senate, give to the great mass of settlers in railroad limits security in their homes by the withdrawal of the railroad companies from the conflict, and the acceptance by them of indemnity for the lands relinquished. Such, at least, is the opinion of this office; and from documents and other information which I have received I have no doubt that the companies will gladly avail themselves of the opportunity of thus relieving the settlers along their routes on whom will depend in a great measure the local support and traffic of the roads.

Very respectfully,

W. W. CURTIS,
Acting Commissioner.

Hon. WILLIAM SPRAGUE,
Chairman of Committee on Public Lands, United States Senate.

Mr. WRIGHT. I trust I shall be allowed to occupy three minutes to say something in reference to the second and third sections of the bill. Without saying more in reference to the first section, the second section, as I understand it, is intended to cover this class of cases: In railroad grants, whether they took effect in præsenti—that is, at the time of the passage of the bill—or at the time of filing notice of withdrawal in the local land office, or in virtue of the action of the board of directors, in all cases there was excluded from the operation of such grants all pre-emption claims and homestead claims. That is, the rights of actual settlers were designed to be protected. Fixing the time, if the rights of actual settlers then attached they were protected. It occurred in many cases that there were actual settlers upon these lands, and then they abandoned their lands—abandoned them after the railroads took their grants, after they had their surveys, and after the lands were set apart to them. Of course there was not included in the lands thus set apart to them the land belonging to actual settlers. It was believed by the Department and by the actual settlers also that when these lands were abandoned by the settlers in the case that I have supposed, then such lands would revert to the General Government, and the Department decided that they did thus revert because the railroad companies had taken lands in place of those which thus belonged to actual settlers or pre-emptioners. The Department decided that these lands thus abandoned by the actual settler belonged to the General Government and did not go to the railroad companies, and therefore they were open for market, and so persons settled upon them and took pre-emptions and got homestead rights. Afterward the Department decided that these lands which were thus abandoned by the persons in possession at the time the right of the railroad company attached to the grant belonged to the railroad companies, and that therefore the settlements by subsequent pre-emptioners or homesteaders must fail them. They have thus lost their property, or at least by the decision there is danger that they will lose their property; and these lands which were thus abandoned and allowed to be settled upon by second pre-emptioners go to the railroad companies, and also the lands they took in place of those settled upon or abandoned.

Mr. SARGENT. I asked the Senator from Kansas a question as to the second section, because I thought there was an ambiguity in the language of the section, and he informed me that the proper construction of it, or the intended construction of it, was that the pre-emption and homestead claims should have been abandoned. My friend from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] says the language of the section means that the railroad grants shall have been abandoned. That certainly proves ambiguity. I should like to have the Senator from Iowa tell us what the construction of that section is as it reads.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have just endeavored to do so. My construction is that it relates to homestead or pre-emption rights that have been abandoned. The third section covers another class of cases:

That all such pre-emption and homestead entries which may have been made by permission of the Land Department, or in pursuance of the rules and instructions thereof, within the limits of any land grant at a time subsequent to expiration of such grant.

It has occurred that many of these grants have lapsed, so to speak, and subsequently Congress has revived them, or has continued the time within which the company might complete the improvement. The lands having been forfeited by reason of the failure of the company to comply with the law, in many instances these lands have been restored to market, and persons have entered upon them as pre-emptioners and homesteaders, and subsequently, in virtue of the legislation of Congress, it is held that the grant has been kept alive all the time, and as a consequence the settlers lose their property.

Without saying more, this is very briefly what I understand to be the purport of the bill.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to have a word of explanation as to the last clause:

All such pre-emption and homestead entries which have been made by permission of the Land Department, or in pursuance of the rules and instructions thereof, within the limits of any land grant, at a time subsequent to expiration of such grant, or—when the grantee was in default in the performance of any of the conditions imposed by such grant.

Let us see what that will affect. The Senator, I have no doubt, conscientiously intends that it shall have the narrow application which he states. I will give an illustration which will be a very strong one, upon which, however, I am not very solicitous. It is provided in the Pacific Railroad acts that the companies shall pay 5 per cent. of their net proceeds into the Treasury. The demand under the legislation of Congress has recently been made for the payment of that money. They are in default of it up to this time. The demand presumes them in default under the original legislation or the demand would not have been made. They will be under a second default in a few days if they do not pay that 5 per cent. into the Treasury, and then every foot of land granted to these great companies goes off under this section.

I will suppose another case in the Senator's own State. In the land-grant acts there is a kind of indefinite provision that the land-grant railroads shall do the Government transportation for nothing. There has been a dispute between the companies and the Government whether that means that they shall allow their track to be used, the Government furnishing the cars, engines, &c., and as to just what it does mean. They certainly have not done the Government transportation for nothing, or at least did not do it for a considerable length of time, and the result is that they are in default. What is the nature of that default, what its limits, what their liabilities, is by this section thrown into the Land Office to be decided, the penalty being that they are actually stripped of every foot of land they have not sold to other parties. So that this section, instead of being very harmless, may, by the very phrase as to the grantee being in default on any of the conditions of the grant, strip men of valuable property rights. I think the Senator himself will say that the Senate ought not to legislate carelessly where such immense interests are involved.

I agree with the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin that this bill involving such weighty judicial considerations, being so ambiguous that the Senator who reported it and the Senator from Ohio and myself are puzzled about the construction of one section as to what it does mean, it ought to go to the Judiciary Committee for the very purpose of correcting the language and to consider whether the other considerations I have mentioned may not also be worthy of consideration by that committee.

Mr. WRIGHT. I only desire to say that it may be that there are provisions in this bill which ought to be amended. My own opinion is that so far as the point now made by the Senator from California is concerned, the failure that is here mentioned relates to such conditions as are conditions precedent, those upon which the vesting of the title depends, and not to provisions that may be in the railroad laws touching the performance of conditions subsequent to the vesting of the grant. But whether that be so or not, all I have to say now is that in my judgment there will be found in this bill ample ground and room for relief for these people. I think it eminently proper that Congress should do something with this subject, and thus prevent the dispossessing of persons who have fair, honest, and just titles, in my judgment, and who have made improvements upon land amounting to thousands of dollars and been stripped of all by these conflicting decisions of the Departments.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate will now resume the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLINTON LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 4162) granting the right of way and depot grounds to the Oregon Central Pacific Railway Company through the public lands of the United States, from Winnemucca, in the State of Nevada, to the Columbia River, via Portland, in the State of Oregon;

A bill (H. R. No. 3912) to reduce and fix the Adjutant-General's Department of the Army; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4126) authorizing the Citizens' National Bank of Sanbornton, New Hampshire, to change its name.

USE OF THE ARMY IN LOUISIANA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. THURMAN, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. CONKLING.

Mr. WEST. I have no doubt, Mr. President, that the Senate is more anxious to vote upon this proposition than it is to hear it further discussed; but there were assertions made in this Chamber yesterday that it is incumbent upon some Senators to controvert with such testimony as they have before them.

The range of discussion upon a simple, formal amendment to a resolution has become an arraignment of the President of the United States for a malfeasance in office; and some Senators with hot haste are prepared, with the meager information that has been submitted to this body, to pass judgment upon the Chief Magistrate of this country. He is boldly charged with such a malfeasance as, if the facts were presented to us through the legitimate channels, would require the customary notice of the offense. It is somewhat remarkable that the parties who profess to desire the information and who have thrust this resolution upon us, but which it is evident will be met most readily, and has been so met—it is somewhat remarkable, I say, that they avow themselves possessed of all the information, and in presenting the inquiry at the same time make the assertion. They take exception to the fact that the Army of the United States, or a portion of it, is on duty in the State of Louisiana. Surely they must be aware from the events that have transpired in that State within the past two years, and more particularly within the last three months, that there was a very urgent necessity for the presence of the Army of the United States in that State. Only yesterday we had the testimony of one of its most trusted soldiers that such a condition of things existed there as required the military arm of the Government to protect the lives of even its humblest citizens. The dispatch of General Sheridan gives forth no uncertain sound. He says unquestionably that such a state of lawlessness and disorder prevails there as to make it necessary that the military power of the Government should interpose to protect life. So there cannot be, I think, much question as to that necessity or even as to the propriety of the presence of the Army of the United States there.

We have to try this case, as far as it is now being tried in this body, by the dispatches sent to the newspapers. We have no official information. A trial has been forced upon us on such evidence. Therefore, in what I have to say, I shall use the evidence as far as it has come to us through the public press, and endeavor to state circumstantially what has been done in that State at the present juncture.

Exception is taken by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BOGY] that the President of the United States has assumed command of the Army, and he in unqualified terms charges from his seat in this Chamber that the President of the United States has violated all the usages of the Army in the proceedings which have been had in that direction. He makes that bold assertion that the President of the United States has violated the usages of the Army and consequently disgraced his position as Commander-in-Chief by his proceedings. He says:

We all know that but a short time ago the second officer of the Army of the United States was ordered with his staff to proceed to the city of New Orleans, not by the order of the Secretary of War, not by the order of his commanding officer, General Sherman, but the President, disregarding the established organization represented by the War Department and the chief of the Army, sends to the city of New Orleans his faithful personal adherent to command that portion of the Army which happens to be in that city.

He says "We all know that." He makes that assertion here that we do know it. He may know it, or possibly believe so; but if he only believed so he should not have said that he knew it. Let me say to my friend that although the President of the United States may, from the fact of his military training, make mistakes in his civil proceedings—and I am not here to excuse them, much less to accuse him of them—but do not let him set his heart upon the supposition that the President of the United States ever makes a military mistake. General Grant never made a military mistake, and some of the gentlemen on that side of the Chamber know it. What was his course in sending General Sheridan to New Orleans? What was his authority in the premises, to begin with? Let us refer to the Army Regulations. What do they say?

Orders are transmitted through all the intermediate commanders in the order of rank.

But there might be emergencies, and this very regulation contemplated such emergencies:

When an intermediate commander is omitted, the officer who gives the order shall inform him, and he who receives it shall report it to his immediate superior.

There was not a question in my mind when I heard the assertion of the Senator yesterday but that all the forms of law and military usage had been complied with in directing General Sheridan to go to New Orleans. I felt prepared to make that assertion here to-day, and happily just before I opened my remarks I found the Secretary of War here on the floor, and I asked him if I made such an assertion would it be warranted by the facts. "Most assuredly," said he; and putting his hand into his pocket he produced the acknowledgment—which I would like to have incorporated in my remarks—of the General of the Army that he was communicated with, and that all the forms of the law were complied with. So much for General Sheridan's presence, and so much for one of the assertions made by the honorable Senator from Missouri.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Let us hear that acknowledgment read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) The Secretary will read the paper.

The Secretary read as follows:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE UNITED STATES,
Saint Louis, Missouri, December 30, 1874.

GENERAL: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your confidential communication of December 26, with inclosures.

Your obedient servant,

W. T. SHERMAN, General.

General W. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

Mr. WEST. Then as a matter of fact, Mr. President, that letter is the acknowledgment from the General-in-Chief of the receipt of all the orders and all the instructions that were communicated to General Sheridan.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator yield to me a moment?

Mr. WEST. Certainly.

Mr. SAULSBURY. That is simply an acknowledgment of a confidential communication. It does not state the character of the communication or whether it refers to all the orders that have been made or not, or to what it related. It may have related to something entirely different from that.

Mr. WEST. When this resolution passes, and when all this information is laid before the Senate in due form, the Senator will be gratified with the statement of the fact that that was an acknowledgment of all the orders and all the communications that were sent to General Sheridan, or copies of them. That is the fact, and I know it to be so.

Now, we know the state of turmoil, disorder, almost anarchy, that existed in the city of New Orleans on Monday, the day of the inauguration of the new Legislature. We know that that population was rising en masse, prepared, if they had not been effectively restrained, to repeat the outrages of the 14th of September. Proper precautions were taken through the military arm of the Government to prevent such an uprising. No one can take exception to that. I think the Senators on the other side of the Chamber will agree with me that it was for the best interest of the people of Louisiana that the power of the Government in its military capacity should be exercised in that direction. But they take exception to what the military did; they say that the President of the United States forcibly, by the instrumentality of his subordinates in power, ejected from the House of Representatives in Louisiana duly-authorized and elected members. They quote from the evidence as it comes to us, and by that evidence I propose to hold them. The Senator from Missouri says from the information which has been received. If he has any other sources of information he did not submit them to the Senate. Consequently I conclude that he spoke from the information that was available to us all, namely, the public press, and from my knowledge of that country individually I am willing to be responsible for what I say. What does the Senator say? That he, the President of the United States, did exclude from the halls of the Legislature men who were rightfully elected to the Legislature. The Senator made that charge deliberately, and he has deliberately repeated it. Now, what are the facts of the case, Mr. President—because I think some of the facts in the case ought to go to the country, as well as the charges? How is the General Assembly of the State of Louisiana organized? Does the Senator know? I read from the statutes of Louisiana of 1870. First, I will quote, to show the analogy between the methods of organization, the statute of the United States providing for the organization of the House of Representatives here. The act of March 3, 1853, says:

That before the first meeting of the next Congress, and of every subsequent Congress, the Clerk of the next preceding House of Representatives shall make a roll of the Representatives-elect, and place thereon the names of all persons, and of such persons only, whose credentials show that they were regularly elected in accordance with the laws of their States respectively, or the laws of the United States.

We all know what the process is. The Clerk of the old House calls the roll, and no member whose election is disputed, or who fails to produce the customary and legal certificate, is allowed to take his seat or has his name placed upon the roll. Take the Legislature of the State of Louisiana. What does the law say there?

That it shall be the duty of the secretary of state to transmit to the clerk of the house of representatives, and the secretary of the senate of the last General Assembly, a list of the names of such persons as, according to the returns, shall have been elected to either branch of the General Assembly; and it shall be the duty of said clerk and secretary to place the names of the representatives and senators elect, so furnished, upon the roll of the house and of the senate respectively; and those representatives and senators whose names are so placed by the clerk and secretary respectively, in accordance with the foregoing provisions, and none other, shall be competent to organize the house of representatives or senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. When was that passed?

Mr. BOGY. Will the Senator permit me a question? I would ask him if this mode of proceeding was not strictly observed in this very case, that the secretary of state transmitted to Mr. Vigers, the chief clerk of the former house of representatives, a list of the duly returned members of the Legislature? That list was received by him, and read by him; and with that list the house was organized, and thus being organized, they elected a temporary chairman. Mr. Wiltz, and, after the organization, they took up the case of five members who had not been returned by the returning board, but whose case had not been rejected by the returning board but which had been referred specially to the Legislature for the action of the Legislature; and that Legislature, thus being legally organized, admitted those five members whose seats had not been rejected by the returning board, and who had simply not been admitted by the returning board but had been referred to the Legislature. That is the information which we get through the public press, and I have seen no contradiction to it whatever in any paper.

Mr. WEST. If the Senator had not interrupted me, I should have made that statement to his satisfaction, and answered his question by this time and shown him how entirely he is at fault in this case, as well as in the other that I have just cited. The Senator from Ohio asked me a question.

Mr. SHERMAN. When was that act passed?

Mr. WEST. In 1870.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then the law has been in operation four years?

Mr. WEST. Yes, sir.

Then again, on the 16th of March, 1870, in order to provide for just one of the contingencies that the Senator has alluded to, the Legislature passed the following act:

That for the purpose of facilitating the organization of their respective bodies, the secretary of the senate and the chief clerk of the house of representatives shall hold over and continue in office from one term of the General Assembly to another until their successors are duly elected and qualified.

So that the officer calling the roll on that occasion was the officer provided for by law, and he was proceeding according to the statutes to call the roll of the members certified to him by the secretary of state and none other.

Now, what would have been the result of an acquiescence on the part of the minority in that legal proceeding? It would have given the majority of the organization of that House to the republican party; but not satisfied with that, the opposition saw proper to extemporize an organization in violation of law, in violation of usage, in violation of precedent, and to turn that body into a mob, which they did. The accessories to that outrage were promptly on hand. They were there ready.

Mr. BOGY. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him again, for really I am an honest seeker after the truth in this case?

Mr. WEST. If the Senator will not interrupt me I will show him all the facts. I am not going to make an assertion unless I can prove it right here.

Mr. BOGY. I am only asking for information. I should like to be set right if I am wrong. I should like to learn from the Senator, if he knows the fact, whether the organization of that Legislature was not in exact conformity with that law; that is, that the members of the Legislature were called over by the late clerk of the house, Mr. Vigers, and the organization took place in exact accordance with that law, Mr. Vigers and the secretary of the senate remaining in office until their successors were duly elected. The house being legally organized, a clerk was elected, a chairman, a temporary speaker was elected, and the house had a legal organization in exact accordance with the law which the gentleman has read. If I am mistaken in that I should like to be corrected. I do not want the conclusion of the Senator; I want the facts to be stated; and those are the facts that we have read in all the papers that have said anything on that subject.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, I always yield with that customary courtesy due in this Chamber to a Senator to ask a question. I will only say to my friend from Missouri just this: If he sits still in patience I will show him how that organization was made, and I propose to show him that it was made directly in violation of that law. I say they extemporized an organization there unknown to our law, unknown to our practice, and unknown to the practice of the other end of this Capitol. I say they did that willfully and as a mob, and as a mob they were dealt with. Now what were the facts? The clerk called the roll. Mr. Vigers is the clerk of the house and the legal officer until he was substituted by another and another officer put in his place. He called the roll. He found one hundred and two members there. The democrats were in the minority, but a member in the hall took the floor and put the motion that the house organize temporarily by the election of a speaker, and the motion was declared carried by acclamation. The temporary chairman it should have been, if there could have been any such temporary organization, but they said temporary speaker, and never waited for the clerk to put the motion, never waited for a division, but by resonant acclamations foisted a man into his seat who immediately assumed the reins of power there and with what result? Take him by his own proposition, and what did he do?

Mr. MORTON. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. WEST. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORTON. The clerk of the old house being authorized by law to organize the new one, they permitted the clerk of the old house simply to read over the names, and then they ousted him entirely from his position and took the organization out of his hands and proceeded with it in a way unknown to the law, and in violation of the law, by the appointment of a temporary chairman, an officer unknown to the law entirely. Is not that the fact?

Mr. WEST. That is the fact, Mr. President. To carry those proceedings into the other end of this Capitol, what would be the result we all know. Now, recurring to this case somewhat upon newspaper testimony, our friends on the other side are adroit in quoting what may contribute to their side of the question; and if they see proper to ignore what comes adverse to them, I do not propose to follow their example. Among the telegraphic dispatches we have one to this effect:

Congressman POTTER—

A gentleman whose statement will not be discredited, I expect, by our friends on the other side of the Chamber—

Congressman Potter was present during the coup d'état by Wiltz, and discouraged such proceedings. He declared that Wiltz could not lawfully hold the position, and would harm the democratic cause.

It is not exactly fair that everything to the prejudice of the action of the republicans should be quoted here without quoting what is said on the other side of the question.

Now, let us go back to the condition of affairs at a critical moment in that house of representatives. There were there one hundred and two members duly provided with their certificates of election. There were other members contesting. There were also five members who had no certificate, and they were there by sufferance and by an understanding that they would abide by the decision of that house upon their credentials as the constitution provided. There were not enough members there to give the organization to Mr. Wiltz. Consequently this coup d'état to which this friend POTTER takes exception was inaugurated and carried into effect. We know how easily that can be done. At any public assemblage get you the strongest lunged and the heaviest booted friends on your side and you will be very apt to carry a measure unless the yeas and nays are called. The motion was put by some member of that assemblage that Mr. Wiltz be declared speaker pro tempore or chairman. Have we got a parallel to that in the history of this country? Yes, we have one. We have one in the inauguration of the Twenty-sixth Congress in 1839; but how far does the parallel extend? In order to preserve order, in order to secure the necessary decorum for the transaction of business, Mr. John Quincy Adams, at the opening of the Twenty-sixth Congress, was declared temporary chairman of that body; and what was the occasion for that temporary organization? Because in the House of Representatives—as now in the house of representatives of Louisiana—there were pending five cases of contested election. Did Mr. Adams declare those members entitled to their seats and thus give a majority to his friends? No, sir; the question of the claims of these gentlemen to seats was never considered there until that body was permanently organized, and they never were acted upon for ninety days afterward. All due deliberation was taken, all proper inquiries were instituted and carried into effect to protect the rights of the voters in that case; but with sharp and hasty decision the president of this body submits a motion that is offered by some member of the house, and declares those gentlemen entitled to their seats without any evidence, with nothing before the body except the common rumor, which the Senator knows about, that they were elected. And what was the occasion for their being declared elected? In a very short time afterward, before the permanent organization, as I take it, was entered upon, some question arose and the yeas and nays were called for, and this speaker pro tempore forsooth declared that that body was not in a condition to either demand or take the yeas and nays. A body that was not competent even to call the yeas and nays was competent to pronounce upon the disputed claims of five members of that body! Where is the consistency in such a proposition as that? The chairman peremptorily refused to put the question on the yeas and nays, but declared the motion carried on the simple assertion that a majority was in favor of it. Then there was your house organized, the republicans withdrawing with the exception of two, leaving the body short of a legitimate quorum. A quorum of the Louisiana Legislature is fifty-six. Then it permanently organized with those five members present.

Mr. BOGY. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. WEST. If the Senator will pardon me I think I will tell him the whole story before I get through, and if he wishes anything more he will find opportunity at the conclusion of my remarks.

Mr. BOGY. I merely wish to ask the Senator a question. I should like to know if there were not troops there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana declines to be interrupted.

Mr. WEST. That body then went into an organization and an election for speaker, Mr. Wiltz saying in his own testimony to a newspaper representative, that is, the correspondent of the New York Herald—

Fifty-five votes were cast for me; 2 were cast for Hahn; and I voted blank, making 58.

Consequently he was three short of a legitimate majority of that house, or of a majority sufficient to organize. There were only fifty-three members there entitled by their credentials to a position. What then was the intervention by the military authorities? How did the troops get into the State-house? Who asked them to come there? I must quote again from these newspapers that we have. Governor Hahn testifies:

I do not think General De Trobriand entered the house until the resolution was passed appointing a committee of three to ask the presence of General De Trobriand, who restored order in the lobby, according to the request of Mr. Wiltz.

Is there anything to controvert that in your testimony?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the honorable Senator allow me to say a word?

Mr. WEST. Yes, sir.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I wish to call his attention to the fact that he was there for the purpose of keeping order with the police force in the lobby, not for the purpose of interfering with the members of the house on the floor.

Mr. WEST. That is the Senator's idea. Let us see what he was there for. He was first requested to maintain order in that body by the so-called democratic majority in it. Ah, yes! the employment of the troops for that particular occasion was not unacceptable to them; but when their orders went further than that, and were to eject from that chamber men who were not entitled to be there, then exception is taken! What more right have these five men inside of the lobby than the fifty men outside? On the contrary, they had less right, because they were in a position where they could do harm, which was not the case with the outsiders. Then, when General De Trobriand, pursuant to his orders to evict from that chamber men wrongfully, illegally, violently there, proceeded to eject these five men, what exception could be taken to it? Suppose five men were to come into your Chamber here and you were surrounded by such a mob that the ordinary officers of this organization were insufficient to maintain the peace and the dignity of this body, would you object to seeing that mob evicted by an armed force if you knew they had no right to be here? Then what becomes of the assertion of the Senator from Missouri that the President evicted men lawfully elected from the Legislature of Louisiana? What is the evidence of it? How does he know that they were lawfully elected? Because that mob, without the warrant of law, chose to say that they were!

I think, sir, it is clear, as far as the testimony is now before us, that the action of the military in this case has been such as was entirely warranted by the necessities and by the law of the case, and I here assert that the charge that the President has been guilty of malfeasance is not borne out by the facts, but on the contrary is entirely controverted by the evidence now before us; and I state that the further charge, that he did turn out men from that Legislature who were lawfully entitled to be there, falls to the ground with the very evidence upon which it is made.

We shall get all these facts. They will come before us. No man on this side of the Chamber will hesitate, I believe, to vote for the resolution with or without an amendment; but we do not propose to be tried on a case of this kind by such evidence as we have here, and if we are forced to that trial we propose to defend ourselves upon that evidence.

Now let me say one word to the Senator from Ohio, who took occasion to remark that the great wrong done to Louisiana was when the government of Governor Kellogg was foisted on her people. He quotes freely and with evident satisfaction from a report made by a committee of this body going to show that the election of Governor Kellogg was never substantiated by returns, and next that his installation by the Federal power was a usurpation. We must then conclude that if Governor Kellogg should not have been there Governor McEnery should have been put there. That is the logic of the Senator's proposition, that if Kellogg had no right there McEnery had; and how far is he warranted in that assertion by the report of the committee?

He makes the statement that it was McEnery's right to be governor of that State; that is, he makes it by inference, because he says that it was wrong for Kellogg to be. Now, on what does McEnery base his right, that right having been thoroughly investigated by your committee? I read from the report of the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CARPENTER.] In speaking of the testimony before that committee it says:

> If the Senate should be inclined not to go behind the official returns of the election, then the McEnery government and legislature must be recognized as the lawful government of the State, and McMillen, if regularly elected by that legislature, should be seated in the Senate in place of Kellogg. But your committee believe that this would be recognizing a government based upon fraud, in defiance of the wishes and intention of the voters of that State.

Consequently a Senator rises in his seat and says that a man is entitled to be governor of the State of Louisiana whom a committee of your body has declared was not governor and that any attempt to put him there would be through fraud. There is no avoiding the logic of that proposition. It was either Kellogg or McEnery. The report concluded that there was an insufficiency of title in the Kellogg case, but the report determined that McEnery had no title and that whatever title he presumed upon was so tainted with fraud as to entitle it to no consideration whatever; and still the Senator from Ohio says that was the lawful, that was the legal, that was the legitimate governor of the State of Louisiana, when the committee has reported that to have installed him there would have been in violation of the wishes and desires of the majority of that people.

It is not a pleasant thing, Mr. President, to speak of the events that have transpired in the State of Louisiana, and I am certain that, should it ever come to the cognizance of the Senate that through any manipulations or chicanery of a returning board, the voice of the people has been suppressed and their true verdict has been distorted, such action will find no supporters in this body, least of all from me. But I do contend that the law of the land shall rule, and that we shall live by it one and all, be it in our favor or against us, as long as it is the law of the land, and it is a pitiful sarcasm to talk about the condition of peace that reigns in Louisiana, or that has reigned there for years! What does all the testimony that has been submitted to your Congress show, with reference to the condition of affairs there? Turbulence, anarchy, riot, murder! Can any man point me to a single instance in the jurisprudence of that State where any individual has ever been arraigned, even arraigned in the State courts, for what may be called political murder? No, sir! There is no law there but the law of brute force; there is no peace, there is no tranquillity, except such as is secured by the all-potent arm of the Federal Government. And, until the people of Louisiana, as they call themselves, make up their minds to tolerate that difference of political opinion which is essential to the organization and the maintenance of all free government, they will have no peace, and they do not deserve it.

What is their condition to-day, and what has it sprung from? Is it due to political causes alone? If it is, I am prepared to show that, in the shaping and ordering of political events, our adversaries there had been quite as potent as we have been. It is due to a variety of causes, aggravated, I will admit, by political wrongs, which loudly call for redress. Why are the people of Louisiana to-day impoverished? Why are they taxed beyond their endurance, as they say? Why does the once-busy mart of New Orleans to-day lie idle, almost deserted? Why are stores vacant there? Why are business enterprises failing? You say political causes. I admit political causes, combined with other inevitable causes of an entirely different character. The State has been overflown. Twenty-three States have poured their waters upon us. Her people have been impoverished by the failure of their crops. Business has abandoned New Orleans and sought other marts. The market of Saint Louis to-day absorbs nearly all the custom that we ever had in New Orleans. Is that due to political causes alone? What are some of these political facts? One of these political facts is that if any man professing republican principles dares to go down there and endeavors to earn his living in a legitimate way, he is accosted on all sides by the epithet that he is a "carpet-bagger" and a "Yankee;" and he is not allowed to do business in that city upon fair and equitable terms. That is one of the political causes of the depression existing in that city; and so it will be as long as it shall be a cardinal and orthodox principle of the ruling and dominant party in society there, that no man is fit for an associate if he dares to be a republican. I dare to be a republican; I dare to dwell there; and I am no new-comer among them. But you might as well undertake, Mr. President, to breathe freely and successfully in a little chamber asphyxiated with charcoal as you might undertake to draw your breath down there, with all you have to contend against in Louisiana. The more prominent a man is in maintaining his political faith, the more he is subjected to political odium and opprobrium. You will find republicans down there tolerated. Yes; they are republicans but in name. In the whole city of New Orleans to-day, that once great mart where congregated all the enterprise sent from the Northern States, I can count but three men doing business there who are republicans in faith. We did have them. They were there at the close of the war. One by one they have been obliged to leave, and I state as a fact to-day that not only does that ostracism exist against republicans, but it is applied to democrats who are somewhat conservative in their ideas. I know that when this White League was first inaugurated in that city, its originators went around from house to house, and by duress and force required men who were averse to it in their sentiments to sign their organization and become members of it. And in some instances where they refused to do it they were surrounded with a cordon of spies, intercepting every customer from the country "Don't go into that man's store and buy goods from him; he would not join our White League."

That is the reign of terror that exists in Louisiana. That is one of the reasons why whenever there is an ebullition in that State you see that the so-called white people are always unanimous. Sir, they dare not be otherwise. No matter how much they may be disgusted, how much they revolt at these measures of their associates, they are compelled, every one of them, to fall into line; their lives and their business are worth nothing until they do. Can you expect anything like a toleration of sentiment there with such a state of things as that?

And then how is it with the colored people? What is the reason that our opponents are congratulating themselves that a division has sprung up in the ranks of the colored people and that they are now commencing to vote the democratic ticket? The evidence so far as taken shows that this is the fact to a very limited extent. But I ask you how much faith would a white man have in the principles or the power or the good faith of a party that for six years allowed him to be slaughtered with impunity and never raised its hands to protect his life? Show me an instance where a colored man's memory or his fate has been vindicated by the punishment of his slayer. Show me one instance. Not one can be produced; but what do the records show with reference to my State? What do the congressional inquiries show? What does the legal testimony on file here tell us? Not counting the dropping murders from time to time, I can point out to you from congressional documents that over three thousand lives have been yielded up as a sacrifice in my State for the vindication of political opinion; and you talk of peace in Louisiana! There is no peace there, and this war will go on and the people down there will suffer from it and they will become impoverished and beggars and they will cry to you for help, and they will come up here when their lands are overflowed and beseech your charity, and that thing will go on from year to year and from generation to generation until they admit that a man can be just as good a lover of his country if he is a republican as he may be if he were of the other political faith.

Mr. President, I seldom speak of the troubles in my State. I always do so with reluctance. It is not a pleasant thing for me to expose all that occurs there. It is not an agreeable thing for me to arraign any portion of the people of my State for their crimes and for their mistakes; but I say let the truth come to the world; let it be understood that there is that determination, not only in my State but throughout the Southern States generally, to utterly obliterate every vestige of republicanism within them, to utterly ignore the constitutional amendments, and finally to set at defiance all Federal authority and to make it a question whether your statutes can be enforced within their limits. The step that is now endeavored to be taken is but one step in the direction to such an overwhelming control of the southern section of this Union as will trouble you in 1876 when you come to deal with it; and if you do not deal with it efficiently and effectually now, you may look forward for such troubles at the counting of the next presidential vote as this country has never seen.

I do not wish to be a prophet of evil; but as far as my intelligence enables me to judge I say that republican institutions in this country are in greater peril now than they were in 1850. When I speak of "republican institutions," I do not use the word in a party sense, but I say that all that is dear to us in the organization of our Government, all that is dear to us as Americans and citizens of the United States, is now being gradually sapped, and insidiously sapped, in a way calculated to effect complete ruin. I hope it will not be so.

Mr. President, I have endeavored to controvert the assertions that have been made on the other side of this Chamber; first, that the President of the United States has acted entirely without warrant of law, and next that either with or without law he has done an unlawful act. I think I have satisfied the Senate, at least I have satisfied myself, on these points.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. President, I do not propose to reply to the speech just delivered. I am quite willing that it shall go to the country and be its own answer. It was not my purpose originally to participate in this debate, although repeatedly urged to do so by friends around me with whom I am united in sentiment and sympathy of feeling. Fearing that the cause of truth, of justice, and of a distressed people would suffer rather than be benefited when defended by those of my class, against whom there exists in this Chamber so much of prejudice and animosity, I felt that my duty to the people I represent required that I should suffer in silence the insults which Senators on the other side of this Chamber deemed themselves authorized to utter here. But, sir, when the people of my section are held up to the gaze of the civilized world as murderers, assassins, and semi-barbarians, I feel that further silence will subject them to a more cruel misconstruction than can be extorted from any perversion, however gross and unjust, of my utterances here. And if my voice now betrays, as I fear it does, undue excitement, it is not the excitement of anger, but that of a man aggrieved at the unjust assaults upon the reputation of his people, conscious that they deserve a vindication which he feels himself inadequate to make.

Sir, I was appalled at the spectacle yesterday presented in this Chamber of American Senators—the spectacle of a body of men with a common ancestry, proud of a common history, inheritors of a common birthright of freedom, confronted by a common destiny, seeking to pillory the reputation, the honor, the fair name, and of consequence the rights and the liberties of one large section of this country, before the civilized world. To say that I am surprised at such a spectacle would not express my emotion. I am utterly amazed that there should be found in the hearts of men with whom I daily associate in this Chamber on terms of pleasant intercourse, so much of hate and vindictiveness and of the spirit of vengeance as has been exhibited in this debate. I was totally unprepared for it; and if to-day I believed that the expressions which I have heard from Senators' lips on this floor reflected the sentiments of the northern people I would be overcome with despair, and feel that the time had come for republican government to die. If the utterances which I have heard are indicative of the policy which is in future to be pursued by this powerful Government toward the disarmed people of my section, then, sir, let us have done with this farce of local self-government at once and forever. But I do not believe it. Sir, I do not believe that a majority of the northern people entertain the sentiments expressed upon this floor. I do not believe that the brave men with whom we were threatened on yesterday, or any considerable portion of them, cherish any such sentiments. I believe that an overwhelming majority of the American people, North and South, East and West, utterly abhor the spirit of animosity, of hate, and oppression manifested in this debate. I believe that the day is coming when this fact will be made manifest. I believe that the movement inaugurated in 1872 under the lead of that large-headed and large-hearted man of New York, intended to destroy this spirit, to produce a better state of feeling between the sections, to enable the people better to know each other, to bring fraternity to the once opposing soldiers, and to inaugurate an era of peace, of good-will, and of law, will go on to its final consummation, in spite of all the efforts to prevent it.

And now, sir, I protest against any support which I may give to the resolution now pending, as offered by the Senator from Ohio, being construed into any discourtesy or lack of respect to the President of the United States. If this Senate is anything, it is the representative of the States, of their existence, of their integrity, of their independence. Its voice is the voice of the States; and when the question of the overthrow of a State government is involved, I apprehend that this body may, without any qualification whatever, ask of the Executive, as a co-ordinate branch of the Government, all information relative to the causes and circumstances attending so grave and startling an event.

Very much has been said about the President having control of the Army, and we are reminded that he is its Commander-in-Chief, and therefore has the right to use it. For one I am glad that the President is by the Constitution made Commander-in-Chief of the Army. I am glad that this fact stands as a prominent evidence of the great fact which lies at the very foundation of our system, that the civil is superior to the military—a truth which of late has been sadly lost sight of. He is Commander-in-Chief of the Army by virtue of his being the chief civil magistrate of the nation; and his authority as such civil magistrate is paramount to any military authority in the land. His use, therefore, of that Army must be in accordance with that civil law and the fundamental law upon which his authority rests. I did not rise to discuss this resolution, its merits, its terms, or the questions involved in it. I rose solely for the purpose of replying to the charges, and what I am forced to conclude, the gratuitous insults offered to the white people of the South by some of the Senators on the opposite side of the Chamber.

It is charged that murder is an every-day occurrence in the South; that for political purposes it is becoming to be one of the institutions of that country; that innocent blood flows in torrents; that the streets of cities are red with the gore of victims slaughtered by the hands of a lawless southern democratic white party. My reply to that, sir, is very brief. It is false. That murders exist, that outbreaks occur which are indefensible, nobody denies. Nobody deplores them more than I do, nor more than do the people of the South, whose fair name Senators seem anxious to consign to perpetual infamy. We have always regarded and always said at home, abroad, and everywhere, that the acts of these misguided, deluded, and reckless men were not only wrong, but destructive of the best interests of our people. But do these rare and isolated instances justify the branding the whole southern people as a body of assassins and murderers and semi-barbarians?

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] goes so far as to say that murder exists all over the South. Is that true, Mr. President? No, sir; at least to no greater extent than it is true of the Senator's State. As long as fallen man is what he is, murder will exist. But I protest here to-day, and I challenge refutation of the declaration, that wherever in the Southern States people of intelligence, integrity, and honesty have control of public affairs, property and life and rights, political and personal, are as secure as in the Senator's State or any State of this Union. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Order.

Mr. GORDON. But the Senator from Indiana says "What an admission! Wherever the democrats get power they cease to murder; and wherever they are defeated, they murder for the purpose of gaining power?" Does the Senator forget that some of the Northern States are in democratic hands? If I recollect aright some twenty-three of the thirty-seven States of this Union are now in democratic hands. Does the Senator arraign them also? No; they are not of that class that the Senator's ire is directed against; but it must not be forgotten that these States and these democrats, North, East, and West, were classed as sympathizers with these southern semi-barbarians, murderers, and ruffians, and we were told on yesterday that those who sympathized with us were no less criminal.

Is life less safe in Georgia than in Indiana? In my own town there lives a man who sat in the Georgia house of representatives and presided over it, without being a member of that body or claiming to be so or pretending to have been a candidate for a seat in that body—presided over it while it was organizing under republican rule. Yet he lives, and no one molests or makes him afraid. He is as secure in his person, as secure in his property and in his political rights, and the expression of his political opinions as is the Senator from Indiana in the city of Indianapolis.

Mr. President, my humble belief is, and I say it with no asperity of feeling, that no people in the history of the world have ever been so misunderstood, so misjudged, and so cruelly maligned as the people I represent on this floor. It is known to this country and to this body that since the war not a solitary arm has been raised throughout the extent of southern territory against the power and authority of the Federal Government by a solitary white man of the South, and yet we are charged because of riots at elections with manifestations of hostility to the Government of the United States!

A State government is overthrown; a committee of the Senate report that the powers which hold it are usurpers; the people attempt to assert their rights with the broad declaration that they mean no war upon the United States Government, and will acquiesce in its demands; the Federal soldiery, who have no interest in the support of any political party, cheers the people as they move upon the usurpers; a conflict ensues; men are killed; and the southern people are branded as murderers!

A band of misguided, deluded, ignorant negroes, armed, march upon converging lines in the dark hours of the night, with arms to murder, with hearts for plunder, and wagons and sacks to bear away their spoils from a peaceful city; the whites arm for their defense; a conflict ensues; men are killed; and the South is branded as a band of murderers and assassins!

An armed black militia rides in arrogance over a country in the midst of a disarmed people; rob, pillage, insult, drag innocent citizens from their beds at night, and perpetrate crimes not to be described on this floor; and when men resist, when they defend themselves, their wives, and their daughters, and conflict ensues, the South is branded as a band of murderers and assassins!

Men are sent among us—I do not care otherwise to characterize them—who have no permanent habitation, no interest, no property, no sympathy with us, and whose sole purpose is to hold the offices, to gather our taxes, to levy our taxes, to disburse our taxes, to make our laws, to govern our people, and then to malign our people. We protest; we strive by all the powers given us under the laws of the land to overthrow their power and recover our rights; riots ensue, and we are charged with disloyalty to the Government of the United States, and outrage, and murder.

How long is this thing to last? How long are we thus to be the subjects of misrule and of misrepresentation, the foot-ball with which political adventurers play? How long is the American Senate to be the stage for such scenes as this? How long are the material interests of every section to suffer by bankrupting the South, and the very existence of our free institutions endangered by the military support of political usurpers?

We are told in one breath that in these States the republicans of course elected their candidates because they are so largely a majority, and in the very next breath we are told that these republicans are intimidated from voting notwithstanding they have the government, the governor, the judges, the jurors, the sheriff, the militia, all the appointments of the government, backed by armies and navies. Still republicans are intimidated! It does not matter what may be our minority; it matters not that we may have neither judge nor sheriff nor constable nor governor nor member of the Legislature—still we intimidate! Now, sir, suppose it should be found that there was intimidation on the other side? I will read from a newspaper report. It ought to be good authority on the other side. I read from a report furnished to the Chicago Inter-Ocean, in reference to the examination in Alabama:

> Luttrell had witnesses who proved that the Government bacon intended for the overflowed country was sent to Opelika, distant seventy miles from the overflowed region, and that it was in charge of republicans and carpet-baggers' candidates. He traced three thousand pounds to one negro meeting-house, where, the day before election, it was distributed to republican voters. No proof was required as to the destination.
> Some negroes swore they had been discharged for voting the republican ticket, while others swore they had been beaten by republican negroes, turned out of their churches, and generally mistreated for being democrats.
> Other negroes testified that before the late election the republican candidates promised to divide the white democrats' land among them, and their furniture, bedding, and household property. The negro witnesses all complained that none of their promises were kept.
> The general run of testimony, as far as ascertainable, was to the effect that not a republican meeting was disturbed by democrats in this county, but that riots and rows were frequent between the two radical factions, often resulting in bloodshed, and once in death by a pistol shot.
> It was also proved—

I commend this to the attention of my friends on the other side—

It was also proved by republicans that every case of murder on the docket here was of a negro for the murder of a negro, being some fifteen or twenty in the past eighteen months. Also that every official in this county and presiding judges were republicans. It was proven that in two or three instances in the late canvass a few negroes were kicked by some drunken democrats, and it was also proven that no United States marshal notices these republican disturbances under the enforcement act in this county.

I want to read now a few lines from the testimony given by James Connaughton, who was a candidate for the Legislature in Rapides Parish, Louisana:

There were about fifty colored votes in the parish polled against him of the two hundred who voted—

Just one fourth—

The majority against him was three hundred, but he has been counted in by the returning board.

Now, sir, what does the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] reply to these proven facts? Not a republican meeting in the county disturbed; not a murder committed of the twenty within eighteen months but is committed by a negro; no intimidations by democrats; negroes vote the democratic ticket notwithstanding the Government-bacon argument used by republican officials, and are beaten and turned out of church for voting the democratic ticket—all these things and a vast deal more proven by the testimony of negroes, republican negroes, which in the Senator's opinion is worth, when the evidence pleases him more than all the testimony of all the white men in the South. And what, I repeat, is the Senator's reply? "Lies. Lies of the Associated Press. Nothing but lies." "Why," said he, "ten thousand times ten thousand lies have been perpetrated to screen the South from the glare of the truth. All the Associated Press of the South are liars." Mr. President, I regard that as a libel on the Associated Press of the South. I know as much about it as the Senator from Indiana, and as a Senator and a man, recognizing my responsibility to my country and my God, I say they are truths, every one of them truths, and not half the truth is told in the direction to which their testimony looks. Liars! Are these colored republicans liars? Is this candidate from Rapides Parish, who testifies that he was beaten three hundred votes, and that one-fourth of the negroes in his county voted against him, notwithstanding which he was counted in by the returning board—is he a liar?

But, Mr. President, there are other witnesses besides these semi-barbarous southerners, who are reporters for the Associated Press. What does the Senator do with the reporters sent out from the city of New York by the leading press of the continent? Are they liars, too? Are the reporters sent to New Orleans and to Alabama by the Herald and the Tribune also liars?

Mr. THURMAN. And the Times.

Mr. GORDON. Yes; and the Times. Is the intelligent and scrupulous correspondent of the Times also a liar? If so, why did not the Senator charge it? These witnesses testify to the very same class of facts. Why does the Senator find it in his heart to charge falsehoods upon the southern representatives, when if a falsehood existed its very heart throbbed in the city of New York? No, sir; the Senator trembled before the power of the Tribune, and the Herald, and the Times, and the Sun; and he dare not assail them. [Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. SARGENT in the chair.) The Chair will remark that applause in the galleries is entirely out of order and in violation of the rules of the Senate. The Chair admonishes the galleries, so that it may not be repeated.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. President, it is a terrible thing to murder; to take human life. All good citizens deplore it; but the conviction is forced upon me—I almost shrink from announcing the terrible conviction—that there are those who, professing a reverence for law, desire that murders should continue. I know not what impressions other men have received; but, sir, I have witnessed enough with my own eyes in the South to satisfy me, and I think I can satisfy any twelve honest men in any section of this country that those who are seeking office in the South by arraying race against race, and who clamor for Federal bayonets, and who claim to be among all the white men of the South the only friends of law and good government and of loyalty, really desire riots, bloodshed, murder. They talk peace, but, like Louis XIV, who hung upon the gibbet his secretary for divulging his secrets and at the same time sent his money to Spain to purchase her state secrets, these men talk law and peace to the North, but stir up strife at the South. Yes, sir, they want murder, they want strife, they want riots, because they know that when peace comes, when the people of this country begin to look at each other as they ought to look at each other, when they look into the hearts of their fellow-countrymen, when they understand each other as they are beginning, thank God, to understand each other, when the North knows the South and the South knows the North, that then their day of plunder is ended. They know that with peace good government will come, and that where good government and peace and liberty live there is no place for them; and so when our interests demand we shall have quiet, when we plead for harmony and concord, when the North is ready to second our efforts, these men, like the teaser in the Spanish bull-fights, dip their flags in blood and flaunt them in the faces of northern people. Why? Sir, it is for the purpose of provoking the North to further oppressions of the South, that the South may be driven in her desperation to deeds of violence.

I am not unmindful, sir, of the gravity of the charge I have made. But, sir, history will yet write it down that I have drawn no exaggerated picture of those men at the South who, year after year since the war, have, like birds of prey, borne off on their wings the spoils of ill-gotten office, and fattened upon the bleeding body of a manacled people.

Why should we not desire peace? My advice to the people of the South is to suffer anything until the returning good sense and good feeling which I know will come from the North shall relieve them of these dreadful calamities by giving us the opportunity of turning these corrupt men out of power. The South is earnestly striving to bear these wrongs; but, smarting under insults offered to her people by those who claim to represent them, and goaded to madness by actual suffering, I must be permitted to say that some indulgence should be accorded to those who are driven to the verge of desperation.

While we are all agreed about these crimes wherever committed, whether, as was recently the case, in one of the Western States, by a body of disguised men, or elsewhere, while we all deplore them and all condemn them, it does not seem to occur to Senators that there is any crime in the murder of the Constitution of our country, in the murder of a State, and the murder of the rights of an entire people.

But I have said enough on that point. We are also told that we are flooding that country with arms. The Senator from Indiana said on yesterday that there are a great many more arms in the South in the hands of southern whites than before the war. I know as much about that as the Senator does. I live there; he does not. I tell him he is mistaken. It is not so. The truth is that not one man is armed now in the South where a thousand were armed before the war. More than one-half of our entire white population are without arms of any description whatever. Even old-fashioned double-barreled shot-guns have almost disappeared. It is all right, in the opinion of the Senator, to arm the black militia. It is all right in districts where white men are in the minority ten to one to disarm them and to arm the blacks; but whenever guns are ordered by white people at the South murder, murder, is the cry—assassination, outrage, war against the Government of the United States, are the words of alarm rung through this Chamber; and when the fact is proved that we mean no war, that not a solitary arm is lifted in the whole Southern States against the authority of the Government, that nowhere in its broad domain is its authority so complete as in the Southern States; and when a people outraged by the usurpation which this very body has recognized, rise in their might and dash from them the ridiculous pretense of a government which usurpers have placed upon them and yet make no war upon the Government of the United States, when the flag floats in absolute triumph and dominion over every State and city—when all this is demonstrated, what next? Then we are told, "It is not against the Government, but it is against the unfortunate black man of the South we war;" and sir, this charge is as unfounded as the other.

I appeal to every southern Senator upon this floor to bear me out in the assertion that until the men whose daily, rather nightly occupation it is to array for their personal ends the black man against us came into our midst, there was nothing but harmony and good will between the races throughout the Southern States. Are we enemies of the black man? All over the South churches and school-houses stand to-day monuments of the liberality of the southern white man to the colored man. Thousands of dollars have been contributed in every Southern State for school-houses and churches for the colored people. Only a few days ago a gentleman of position in Georgia, a man who bears a distinguished and honored name in that State, bequeathed in his last testament, of the sum left him by the war, $100,000 for the benefit of southern black men. These facts do not accord with the theory of some of the Senators here, but they are none the less facts.

Mr. President, I will notice one other charge against our people and it shall be the last. We were told on yesterday, in a spirit doubtless of pity, that the people of the South were semi-barbarians. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] is responsible for that epithet. That Senator affirms his good-will to his southern brethren, and expects to secure theirs in return by calling them semi-barbarians, while he claims for his own section a "society homogeneous, intelligent, and educated."

Now, sir, I do not envy that spirit. I do not envy the spirit of self-complacency which would enable the honorable Senator to thank God that he was not as other men. That is a matter of taste, about which the Senator and myself might honestly differ, and he is welcome to all the glory he can get by that sort of warfare. I shall not imitate his example. I shall not seek to detract from the men of his section, from their intelligence, their honor, or their patriotism.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield?

Mr. GORDON. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator be kind enough to read out of the RECORD, which I never correct, so that he has it in its original purity, any remarks of the character which in the last few minutes he has attributed to me?

Mr. GORDON. Does the Senator say that he did not use the expression that the people of the South before the war were semi-barbarous?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I say so, to the best of my recollection. I have not looked at the report. But that is not precisely the point——

Mr. GORDON. It does not matter what the RECORD may say. The words were burnt into my memory, and will not "out." The Senator may seek to wipe them from the memory of this Chamber, but they will not "out." He said it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the Senator cannot escape quite so easily, if he is willing for me to say a word. I say I have not looked at the RECORD and I do not recollect using any such expression. If I did, I certainly shall not retract it. But the point which the Senator was undertaking to make upon me was that I have instituted a comparison between the people of my State and my section, a self-complacent one, and the people of his State and his section. Now, I challenge the honorable Senator to read out of the RECORD any remarks of mine of that character.

Mr. GORDON. I think the Senator's remarks are not reported at all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. They are never retained and are never corrected, so that the Senator will get exactly what I said; and if he can fish out of it anything of that character, then his ingenuity is equal to the audacity with which he makes statements respecting the position of other Senators.

Mr. GORDON. I never make a statement for which I do not stand responsible. I took down the Senator's words at the moment he uttered them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Undoubtedly responsibility is a good thing.

Mr. GORDON. The want of it sometimes is a very excellent thing. Now, sir, I will quote the Senator from the RECORD. The Senator's words were these:

> When I see, Mr. President, as I have not yet seen, that the people as they cal themselves, the white-leaguers, or the white democrats, or the white conservatives, or whatever they may be, of any State in this Union, when they find that any of their associates have committed assassination or murder or wrong upon their fellow-citizens for no cause but opinion's sake, turn upon him as in Ohio they would turn upon him, or in Vermont, without respect of party, and bring him under the heavy hand of justice, then I shall begin to have some faith that our southern brothers, who it seems have not yet forgotten the old manners and ways of semi-barbarous times, have thought better of it.

Does the honorable Senator now charge me with audacity?

Mr. EDMUNDS. O, yes, I said that.

Mr. GORDON. Then, Mr. President, where is the audacity with which the honorable Senator charges me? Is it audacious to bring the Senator before this body upon a charge which he himself now admits? But, as I have already said, it is a mere matter of taste. I shall not imitate the example of the Senator. I shall not seek to displace one solitary leaf from the chaplet which rests upon the brow of his people. I am proud of whatever they have won of glory in the past history of this country as a common heritage of the people of the entire country. I detract nothing from them, but I say to the honorable Senator that if to have contributed much to the formation of this Government by the people he is pleased to term as having semi-barbarous manners; if having done much to guide her through the past and most glorious period of her history; if to have furnished a Henry to fire the hearts of her colonists and a Washington to lead them to victory; if to have furnished a Scott and a Taylor to command her armies; if to have contributed a Marshall and a Taney, and other lights to illumine her jurisprudence; if to have given to the Government eleven of her seventeen Presidents; if having, by the wisdom of her statesmanship and the prowess of her arms, done much to make a continent possible to the American flag; if to have poured out the blood of her sons like water upon every field in the past history of this country where the honor and the glory and the dignity of the Government were in peril—if that be semi-barbarous manners, I am willing to accept before my countrymen and before the civilized world and before Heaven all the stigma which attaches to such a crime.

But, Mr. President, I am heartily sick of all this stirring up of bad passions. I was sent here for no such purpose. Nothing was further from my anticipation than that I should ever be forced into such a conflict. I came here with my heart full of good-will to all men of all sections of this country. I came here representing a people who by solemn resolutions of their Legislatures and by all the conventions that had assembled, whether of mechanics, of railroad men, or of farmers, had invited northern men with their capital and their families to our midst and our homes, and who have to-day in their midst a republican who bears the name of some of the most honored Senators on that side of the Chamber—a friend, though a republican and a supporter of this Administration. And now, sir, I want to close as I began with the declaration that I have not lost faith in the right and in the American people. My faith is as firm in these as in the great truth for which the throne of Jehovah is pledged, that right and justice and truth shall triumph and that liberty shall live.

Fraternity and good-will shall be restored to our divided country, and, despite the efforts to prevent it, shall grow and strengthen until its final consummation in a united people, united to build up a common country and not to desolate one portion for the benefit of the other.

Mr. EDMUNDS. When the solemnity that has fallen upon us on account of the sermon of the Senator from Georgia shall have been sufficiently relieved, I want to occupy a few minutes of the time of the Senate in saying a word touching his observations upon me.

Mr. GORDON. I cannot hear the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will preserve order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Georgia, with great professions of good will to man, and with a great desire, as he puts it, for peace on earth and in this country, has undertaken to arraign me for having referred, in some remarks I made yesterday, to a period of time in this country and in his section of it, when manners were, as I styled them, semi-barbarous; and misstating what I said, to accuse me of having described the white people of the Southern States as being semi-barbarous now, without any reference to the period of time of which I spoke or the fact of the manners to which I alluded. That may be, in the opinion of the honorable Senator, a fair statement in debate; no doubt it is. Our judgments of what is a fair are such as the Supreme Being, to whom he so often appeals, furnishes us.

Mr. GORDON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. EDMUNDS. With pleasure.

Mr. GORDON. The Senator is mistaken in his position. I did not arraign him; I simply refuted an arraignment he made of my people.

Mr. EDMUNDS. O, we will not quarrel about terms, Mr. President. The Senator seems to be particularly unhappy that I should have stated that the manners of a certain old time were semi-barbarous. He seems to be disturbed at the idea that persons who profess refinement and Christianity should speak of such a state of things or suppose them to have existed; and in the next breath almost the honorable Senator here, not in the street, not in a grocery, not on the field of battle, but here, repeats a phrase which has acquired a very definite meaning, I believe, and which I think most men nowadays regard as bordering upon semi-barbarism; and that is, that he is responsible for what he says. Was there any great occasion for that? Does it not a little remind you, Mr. President, (the Vice-President in the chair,) of times that are within your recollection and experience, when predecessors of the honorable Senator, and those who in those days thought like him, were in the habit of making use of the same phrases when they had not any better arguments, that they were responsible; that is to say, if they could not maintain here precisely what they wished to maintain, they would fight it out by the duello?

O, Mr. President, what an idea of refinement, of peace, of culture, of that gentility which characterizes my honorable friend, as I know perfectly well must exist in his mind, to put me up here on the gibbet of public derision and scorn for speaking of the manners of the times of the institution of slavery, and in connection with it, as semi-barbarous, and fortify it by a declaration drawn from the same period of time and the same methods of life and society, that he is responsible for what he says! Mr. President, I think I can leave the honorable Senator to the responsibility and to all the benefit that he may think he has obtained in criticising the use of the word "semi-barbarous" in the connection in which I used it. I do not care to discuss that question any more. If the honorable Senator is satisfied with that exhibition of his ideas of the difference between barbarism and its opposite, I, of course, have no right to complain.

But the honorable Senator, in speaking for his people, has referred largely to the glory that they have attained in the service of our common country. He has referred to George Washington, and to Patrick Henry, whose words fired the hearts of the people—to use another old phrase that the Senator did—in making our flag glorious. So they did; and they deserve large gratitude for it; but, unhappily, there has been a more recent period which the Senator seemed to have forgotten or to have omitted in his observations, when the glory that covered the names of Washington and of Henry and of Taney has been, in the minds of some, somewhat dimmed by the conduct of a Lee and of a Davis, and of a Toombs, and of others who might be named, who shed blood for the destruction of the same flag which their ancestors had endeavored to uphold and make glorious. I do not think it necessary, if we are to boast of the character of any portion of the people of this country, to go back quite so far. I think justice requires, now that it is alluded to, that we should bear in mind that many events have happened since the days of Washington and of Patrick Henry, and that those events have not been calculated largely to make one section glorious, in the sense in which the honorable Senator has spoken of glory—that is, glory in the service of a common country, and in maintaining a common and a sacred flag—but quite the reverse.

Mr. President, this is the first time, I believe, since Senators from the Southern States have come here, that I have been drawn into any such reference as this to the personnel of the rebellion, and I only do it now for the simple reason that the honorable Senator himself has undertaken to bring forward the services to the country of the people of the Southern States which were so gloriously rendered in order to convince you and his brother Senators that they have occupied all the time, as I must suppose, an attitude like that which Washington and Patrick Henry occupied. I must be excused if I say, what I have said, that there is a later period in the history of the people of those States which does not redound so largely to the glory of our common country as that of the earlier instances to which he has referred.

I do not say it (as the Senator has said of his own remarks) in any spirit of animosity. Quite the reverse. But I think it due to the truth, now that the thing is forced upon us, that we should not forget that all the trouble and all the difficulty and all the sorrow and the disorder of whatever character it may be which now exists in the Southern States has, so far as the human mind can understand it, arisen from the conduct of the leaders of the people of those States who either led them or forced them or persuaded them into the act of rebellion to which I have referred. But no man has been more glad than I to see returning from those States Senators representing all shades of opinion, and without any inquiry or scrutiny or reference into what the course of such Senators may have been during the war.

I think I said yesterday (although the honorable Senator from Ohio seemed to put a different interpretation upon it, but he spoke in haste) that instead of feeling animosity toward those people, the people of the Northern States of all parties would hold out all their hands to assist the people of the Southern States in every way. All that the people of the Northern States desire is that there shall be peace and the preservation of life and liberty. Is that asking too much? Is not that the thing which, if we believe in a common Government for this country and believe in the Constitution of our country, we are bound to maintain to the extent of our constitutional power? Democrats and republicans in the Northern States live in peace side by side; they have heated and contested elections; but they mingle together in society; they meet in public and in private together. Whenever the ballot-box has settled a question of dispute between them, there is the end of it; and whenever any man, no matter what his party may be, is persecuted for opinion's sake, the whole body of the community, not one party and not the other, but all parties, uphold the execution of the law, so that the right of the humblest citizen, no matter of what race he may be, no matter of what citizenship, even, he may be, much less no matter what his politics or his religion may be, is avenged.

Ah, Mr. President, there is the difficulty. It is not animosity toward the people of the South which fills the hearts of the people of the North or any portion of them, when they only pray and beg that there shall be the liberty and the equal protection of the law which exists among them everywhere within the Republic. And I have no hesitation in saying that, so far as any act of mine has ever gone or ever will go, I shall never stop to inquire whether the Representative from any Southern State has been engaged in rebellion or has belonged to one particular political party or another when he comes here; nor shall I stop to inquire what is to be the result of a particular election in any course I may take, so that I see that the people of the State where the election may have occurred have had a fair opportunity to express their opinions; and when I see the people of such a State protected in the liberty and in the rights which belong to them, and when I see when such events occur as have occurred that justice is in some way to be obtained through the orderly administration of the law. The State of Georgia, from which the honorable Senator comes, was at one time since the rebellion in a similar state of commotion. I do not say that it proceeded from the same cause; of course its facts were different; but there was disorder in the State of Georgia. A person claiming to be governor of that State—and I do not know but that he was—was endeavoring to get the control of it. That person was of my political party. I did everything that I could to resist his efforts; and so far as my voice and my vote went the schemes he had in view were prevented and set aside. I do not think, therefore, that I am amenable to any criticism from the Senator from Georgia in respect to the course which I or my party may have taken touching the disturbances which have existed since the war in various of these States, one after the other. It does not become him, I think, with the fairness which ought to characterize his conduct, to undertake to impute to me, from anything that I said yesterday, or have said at any other time, any evidence of ill will or animosity or dislike to the people of the Southern States. All that I say is that I desire that there shall be security of person and of property, of life and of liberty, security not only to the honorable Senator and those who may belong to his party, but security to all men of all parties under the law and according to law. Can the honorable Senator be dissatisfied with that? I have not the slightest objection to the democratic party, the party of the white men of the South, as it is sometimes called, having the control of every State government there, so that they get it in the forms provided by the Constitution and administer their government equally for the benefit of all. Is that animosity? Is that hostility? If it is I do not understand the meaning of the terms. The only thing which should divide us now is not a glorification of one side or the other, (which I certainly have not entered upon;) it should be a careful effort to get at the truth as to the condition of the Southern States where there are disorders; and whatever the truth turns out to be act upon it under the law and for the law and for the protection of all the people.

But, Mr. President, I have a suspicion—perhaps it is unjust—that getting at the truth and acting upon it to the effectual preservation of peace and order through the modes pointed out by the Constitution and the laws would not suit a certain portion of the people of the Southern States. If the Senator referred to any portion of the people of the Southern States, it is not the portion to which he referred. When I see armed organizations of men, not provided for or tolerated by the Constitution of the United States or the constitution of any Southern State, arrayed and drilled at the earliest and best opportunity they can select to undertake to take the law into their own hands and to overthrow an existing government, whether that be a government de jure or not, then I say it is time to inquire what this state of things means; and when we find, if we should find, that great numbers of human lives are sacrificed in these disorders without the bringing to justice of the persons who commit these crimes, if they are crimes—I will put it in that way—but the criminals going boldly everywhere through the places where these events have occurred untried, unpunished, it is time for the American people and the American Congress to inquire whether there is not power in the Government within the Constitution to defend the lives and the liberties of its citizens—not to defend them by making war upon other people, not to defend them by turning any man out of his rights, be they what they may, but by the simple and ordinary process of justice under the law. And just as fast and just as far as it can be seen that under any administration of any political party in any State of the South there is peace, good order, liberty, then just so far I am sure that I shall hail and the people of my State will hail such a state of things with satisfaction. Ever since the rebellion terminated the North has cried out and longed for simple tolerance of opinion and liberty. It has not cried out for vengeance. It has taken the weight of constitutional disabilities off from the leaders in the rebellion, and it has received them with open arms into the councils of the States and of the nation, and it has done it gladly; and it has only implored and sought for that peace of which the honorable Senator professes himself to be so great an advocate. That is all.

If there is any animosity in this, I do not know the force of the term. If there is any hostility in this, I do not know the force of the term. But inasmuch as government is instituted solely for the protection and the preservation of the rights of its citizens, it is the business of the Government to the extent of its powers to see to it that the rights and the liberties of its citizens are preserved. If wishing for that is an offense to the sensibilities of the honorable Senator, then I am sorry. It is all that I wish for; it is all that I have acted for, and it is all that I shall act for. But so far as it is necessary to inquire or to act within the Constitution to attain these ends, the honorable Senator must be sure that I shall act and that the people of my State will act without feeling any great danger from responsibility.

Mr. GORDON. I will confine myself to a very few words in reply to the honorable Senator from Vermont. The Senator seemed to be under the impression that I was unhappy because he entertained certain opinions of my people. Upon that point I wish simply to say that while I prefer for the southern people the good opinion of the Senator, I was not very unhappy over his unfavorable opinion. I was much more concerned as to the effect of his remarks upon others than as to whether he himself was misguided or not.

The Senator referred to my using the phrase that I was "responsible for what I said." I used it in retort upon the Senator who had charged me with audacity in making statements. I did not use it in the sense which he attached to that term. What I meant was responsibility as a Senator and as a man for the truth of what I say; and if, in view of this statement of what I meant by responsibility, I am to bring upon myself the censure of the Senator as a semi-barbarian, I must bear it "e'en as well as I can." But it seems to me that the Senator and I need not quarrel about this matter. If he will allow me to remain responsible for my statement in the Senate in the sense in which I used that term, I will promise not to molest him in his irresponsibility for his statements.

The honorable Senator objects to my allusion to the past services of the southern people. I should never have obtruded it upon his ear but in reply to his assault upon that people. He reminds me of the fact that recent events, in his judgment, have beclouded the glory to which I referred. The honorable Senator will fail of his purpose to lead me into any controversy about the late war. This is not the time to defend the men, if they need a defense, to whom he has invited my attention. If it suits his purposes to keep alive the animosities of that recent struggle, he must do so without any aid from me. I had supposed that the unhappy past was buried with the past, and that whatever of glory was won on either side would be in the future the common heritage of a common people. If the Senator has different views, he is welcome to entertain them.

The honorable Senator desires to get at the truth. Sir, if the South has one desire higher than another it is that the American people may know the whole truth in reference to her purposes and conduct. In the face of his reference to semi-barbarism the Senator protests his kindly feeling toward the people of the South. I know, for I have a reason to know, that the day of better feeling is dawning. I stated that as broadly, I thought, as language could state it in my first remarks; but, sir, there is a deep and broad gulf between the sentiments of the people and the spirit of hate exhibited here.

The Senator also said that when he could see armed organizations, the white league of white men in the South, brought to punishment, he would then hope for some peace. The Senator will allow me to tell him that, ever since the war, black organizations, armed and drilled night after night, have existed and been marched to the polls all over the South. Did the Senator ever think it necessary for the peace of the country to investigate them? Did he ever call upon the Army and Navy to put them down?

The honorable Senator, I repeat, disclaims any animosity toward our people. I am very glad of that disclaimer. I certainly had no disposition to make him an enemy; but the Senator will excuse me for imagining that he might entertain some hostile feeling toward us when I read an additional passage from his speech of yesterday, with which I shall close:

But the difficulty is, Mr. President, and it is perfectly useless to disguise it, that there is upon the one side there the constant and organized effort of a minority of the people, which same minority had always governed those States until the end of the war, to force their opinions upon the majority without any respect to the means by which they are to do it—

That looks to me very much like a reference to the whole white people of the South—and inasmuch as mere voting will not do it, then there must be whipping; inasmuch as mere whipping will not accomplish it, then there must be slaughter; and inasmuch as education will not do it, then let the school-houses be burned up; and inasmuch as religion will not do it, then let the churches go; and until that notion is reversed or is exterminated by the hand of fire—

Conciliatory words those—just so long you must expect that there will be resistance and aggression on the part of this body of white-leaguers, as they are called, that really represent, according to the testimony, southern society, as they call it—

Mark the words: "southern society, as they call it"— and the organized forces of free government.

Mr. FLANAGAN. Mr. President, in briefly attempting to discuss the subject now presented to the Senate, I have simply to say that I have no criticism to make on the resolution offered. I favor, however, the amendment; but I shall vote for the resolution with a great deal of pleasure in the absence of the amendment. The Senate and the people of the United States are certainly entitled to the fullest information upon this grand subject. When the resolution was presented by the distinguished Senator from Ohio, I was very much delighted. It was precisely such a subject as I wished amply discussed. Whatever may have been his promptings for its introduction does not matter; it appeared to me at that moment that the object was to give strength to what may be termed the conservative party in New Orleans, where this Legislature of Louisiana was being organized.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Order will be preserved.

Mr. FLANAGAN. The little disorder does not annoy me in the least. It is just what I expected to encounter, and I understood it well before I got up. I do not think I shall find anything to change my convictions in that respect; but that circumstance is a potent one, that should speak loud and long to the American citizen to-day that we are standing upon a precipice, and we should look well before we step either to the right or to the left.

This is no small matter, Mr. President. It only tends to ventilate the Louisiana question, which has been a vexed one for years; but at the same time it ventilates the whole reconstruction subject; it goes back to the war of 1861. I am gratified on this occasion to see my democratic friends consistent. They are only doing now what they have done heretofore; and if a conflict is forced upon the nation, as it was before, I shall expect them to be consistent and to do again what they did then.

This question is one of great moment. I arise to discuss it in my feeble manner with no unkind feeling toward any individual. It involves a great principle. I love my country. I am for my country right, but I go further. A great spirit, who occupied the chair for many, many years with distinction, when speaking on a great question, said he was for his country right, and there he closed. I go with him heart and hand thus far, but I go further: I am for my country right or wrong. I make no question upon that branch of the subject.

Mr. President, we have had many distinguished names in our history. The nation loved the name of Andrew Jackson. There are many yet who respect the name of James Buchanan. There are those to-day, as was well said in the Senate yesterday, who love the name of Grant. I believe in 1815, upon January 8th—and we are hard by it now, approximating it rapidly, but two days off—the fond name that I first instanced was placed in New Orleans where the distinguished Sheridan is to-day, the 6th of January, 1875; and if he is not assassinated there, and he is not likely to be, he will be very likely to be there on the 8th of January, and I think it will be found that he will be as efficient on that occasion as Andrew Jackson was when he so triumphantly succeeded over the minions of England, those men who were under Packenham and Wellington, who represented and declared in our infancy, when we were coming into existence, that we could not live. The party that to-day antagonize the Government, as I understand it, entertains the same views.

I am one of those who have always known the sincerity of the action of the people of the South and of their promptings. The distinguished gentleman from Georgia, I see, has retired from his seat, which is unlike the way he acted when he led the proud soldiers of the South to battle in a cause he, I feel no hesitancy in saying, gloried in then as he does now when he speaks of glory, supposing he was fighting in a good cause; but I should like to ask my friend, if he were in my sight, if he entertains the opinion to-day that he was then right? I have no hesitancy in saying that he would respond without a question, because he is a candid, sincere gentleman, that he was right. If that idea be correct, that he believed himself to be then right, has he evidenced to us in any way, manner, or shape that he believes now that he was in error then? If he believed himself to be then right and indorses that action of his to-day, give him the power and what will he do in the third instance? Just that which he has done heretofore; and it illustrates the whole action of that great party which brought down millions, nay, billions, of indebtedness upon the American nation and untold floods of blood.

He says that he knows better the feeling and action of the people of the South, whom he has lived among, than the distinguished Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON.] He may do so; I raise no issue as to the superior knowledge of one of these gentlemen over the other; but I can say for myself that I have lived as long in the South as the distinguished Senator from Georgia. I have lived in the South sixty-nine years. He cannot go that far back. I have lived in the immediate neighborhood where I now reside for upward of thirty years. I know the people; I know their feeling if their action indicates their feeling, and it would be strange logic to me if it did not. The distinguished gentleman says that shot-guns are not even common in his part of the country. That may be. I raise no issue with any fact that my friend states; but in my section they are amply abundant, and if history be true they are always to be come at whenever they are wanted to shoot a few of the colored voters in his portion of the country. They then can be found. But he says there are few such instances. True, upon one occasion, I believe, he does admit that some drunken democrat did shoot down a black man or two. Very well, let it go under the cover of drunkenness if you like. I do not think, however, that is a very good plea to put in on this or any other occasion.

Mr. GORDON. Will the Senator allow me to correct him? I did not say that.

Mr. FLANAGAN. You were within half an inch of it and a little farther than I went. [Laughter.]

Mr. GORDON. I prefer, when the Senator quotes me, that he shall not miss me by half an inch even. [Laughter.] I would rather he quote me exactly. I was reading from testimony as published in the papers.

Mr. FLANAGAN. I would like to have your language if you will be kind enough to give it to me. Well, sir, what are the facts? It is said that the statements presented to the American people by the republican party are fabulous; but let me remark in all candor, as the Queen of Sheba said to the wise man, "The half has not been told." The half has not been told of southern outrages, of murders, and everything of horror that can be contemplated in our language. Surely Senators are possessed of all the facts, and yet not one of them can point to one single man who has been put upon trial in the South and convicted for any of these crimes, let him have been a drunken democrat or otherwise. It seems to me that that speaks volumes. I need not to invoke the slaughter at Colfax; I need not go to Coushatta, though I can say that one of the young officers who was assassinated upon that occasion I knew from his boyhood. He was raised close by me, in Shreveport, Louisiana, and I live but about sixty miles from that place. I knew the family of Howell well; and, by the way, they were good democrats until that unfortunate circumstance occurred. After that they faltered. They said they could not go the figure when their own family was being massacred by the democracy. That brought them to hesitate, and it has many.

But the line, Mr. President, that I wish to pursue is this: When this resolution was yesterday introduced I was much gratified at the fact. Why? I wanted the subject ventilated; I wanted it discussed; I wanted the whole testimony. Let it all come out; let it go forth to the nation. This is a period when it should certainly go to them, and I think it will do much good when it does. And I was more than delighted yesterday when I saw distinguished Senators take hold of this question understandingly. The facts are so clear that they cannot misapprehend but must understand them. There was not a southern voice heard here yesterday. The North took hold of it, the extreme North, and the great West. Thought I, "We are safe;" and I must confess that I felt buoyant upon that occasion. I knew that the republican party was demoralized in the last elections; and see how beautifully that is played upon now by the distinguished Senator from Georgia. "O," said he, "the North are aroused." That is not his language exactly; I have it not before me; I am only undertaking to give the substance. He said, "The North is going to stand by us, and do this, that, and the other." That was understood previous to the last war. It was understood at the South then that the North was going to stand up for the South, that they would make their fight secure, that cotton was king, and all that kind of thing; that it would demoralize even old England and that the recognition of the independence of the South would be at a very early period. Those expectations all proved to be merely speculative. I think from the evidence of witnesses on this occasion we are still secure; but we are insecure in the absence of the interest manifested upon this question yesterday. If the distinguished Senator from Georgia is correct to-day in saying that the sentiments of the Senators here are not in accord with those of their constituents in the States that I think they so ably represent, then we are gone and there will be no longer any republican party. The North must come to the rescue of the few republicans that there are in the South. It is their fight now. Heretofore I have felt to a very great extent on this floor that I was ignored. The majority were entirely too easy and independent; they cared nothing for Texas. The republican party were so strong that they could go into battle on any occasion without regard to Texas, or indeed many other of the Southern States, and victory still perch on their banners. Not so to-day, sir. The handwriting is on the wall. I am glad to see that the North are aroused. Well they may be. It is now their fight as well as mine as an humble republican in the South. I am disposed, myself, quietly, from my age, already alluded to, to yield the question and submit. Whatever "the powers that be," I always submitted to them, and if I dislike them, I will do the best I can. That is all I have to do as an American citizen. I love the Constitution; I love the laws, though they may not be always such as I desire; but the same power exists and will continue to exist while this glorious Government is perpetuated to alter, amend, and re-enact, and do everything that is needful for the benefit of the nation as it has done heretofore.

Mr. President, what is the feeling of the people in my State. When McEnery was likely to come into power, a few months since, all Texas was aroused. The men were excited; thousands of them would readily have gone into battle for "the down-trodden Louisianians," as they termed them. They felt it, and they took it home to their bosoms, and they were ready to make it a common cause. What I am to relate occurred close by me. I live within twenty miles of the town of Marshall, a very thrifty town, too. The Texas Pacific Company runs its road through that town directly from Shreveport, the terminus on Red River. It was made known that it was necessary to concentrate forces to carry out the avowed intentions of the McEneryites in Louisiana upon that occasion to seize the government and to retain it. Instant was the response right there from my neighbors close to me. A company of men went down in their fine uniforms, well armed, though my friend from Georgia says arms are scarce there. Those Texas boys had them. They went down and got to the depot, ready for an advance to aid their brethren in Louisiana, when they received a telegram, "All quiet; everything lovely here; the flowers are blooming delightfully; thank you for your good intentions; we do not wish your services." All went back. Their friends had the government of Louisiana; they were possessed of it and were happy. Thus they are happy to-day in the State of Georgia. I should like to put a question to my distinguished friend from Georgia, and I would prefer that he was sitting in his seat, but he prefers to exercise himself, and it is all right. He knows the day was when he could not get a seat in this Chamber. Why? For his love of "the lost cause." That kept him away for a time; but the difficulties were removed upon that subject, and his love for "the lost cause" is that which entitles him to his seat to-day. It is a reversed order of things. His love for "the lost cause" gives him power to-day. That is all right; I am not antagonizing his views; I am not calling them in question so far as he is concerned or those who indorse him; but they do not suit me, and I only instanced that to show unmistakably that whenever they get the power they will exercise it. When was it in their history that they did not do so? But recently it was "anything to beat Grant," and they took up Greeley, who had been with us all his life. "Anything to beat Grant" was their cry; and poison as Greeley was to them, they would take him to get into power, just as they have taken the reconstruction acts. They have made war upon those acts, and in their hearts they are bitter enemies to them practically upon all points; but they have availed themselves of them wherever they could profit by doing so.

Mr. President, there is one idea that I wish briefly to call the Senate's attention to to-day. The organization at the South which is seeking to control is the democratic party. It has never been anything else; when they call themselves conservatives, it is only to get up close to you, so that they can hug you like the two Indians did at old Boonsborough, in Kentucky, to get the advantage of you and kill you. It was only to use the name as policy dictated, so as to get the advantage. They are all democrats to-day, and they will do anything under the sun when they get into power that they can do. And what will that be? Would they be enabled to perpetuate this Government? Do they desire to do so? Many of them say they do; but if you will only get hold of one who will say that he regrets what he has previously done, and that he desires to perpetuate the Government, then I am ready to take him into the church; not before.

Now, sir, I read from the Houston Telegraph of December 29, 1874, and I take occasion to remark that that has been one of the most moderate democratic sheets in our region and has been considered indeed high-toned; and it certainly is, not the father of all the democratic papers in our State but the grandfather. It is the oldest paper known to the State of Texas. It was published there in the days of the republic; and here is a little article, a very modest one, from it at this recent date:

Is a republican form of government a failure? If not, why are the people of the United States so indifferent about the condition of Louisiana?

Is Grant to be a dictator, and his will to be the law governing the people of a free State? Are his minions and his emissaries to run riot in a State of this Confederation with the Army of the United States to do their bidding? What is the meaning of all this? Is the voice of the people to be disregarded and their will set at defiance? We said some time since Grant meant mischief. We predict now that notwithstanding the denial of Phil Sheridan that he has had no orders to go to Louisiana, he will be sent there in less than ten days.

Therefore directly saying that Sheridan is a liar. By the way, they know he is pretty good authority in a great many cases. There is no doubt about that.

He will be sent there in less than ten days.

He may have said so, because he knew, in justice to the American people, that he ought to be sent there—the very man for the purpose.

We predict that Kellogg will be sustained by the Administration—

No very wise prediction, because that had been decided upon in the Senate here solemnly two years since—and every effort made to place the people of Louisiana in a false position.

As a matter of course!

It makes our blood boil to know that the radical flag is flaunted in the faces of our brethren—

Surely it does. A few more generals that have commanded the noble spirits of the South will occasionally be found to be aroused here likewise at a very early day, and it will not be a great many days until your humble servant that is addressing you upon this occasion will retire and a rebel general take his seat. Then he will sympathize with what has been said here to-day, and I know not how much further he may go, nor do I care.

I read on—when they have defeated at the ballot box the whole horde of wretches who are the creatures of the national Administration, and are kept in power by Federal bayonets.

Mr. President, "Federal bayonets" do not alarm me. But for "Federal bayonets" may I not well ask what the condition of this nation would be to-day? But for "Federal bayonets" would my friend from Georgia have a seat in the Senate Chamber? No, sir. He was fighting upon a different line altogether, but he was overpowered, and the Government of the United States being a government of power, justice, and mercy, through that power—I will waive justice to some extent and let it take a seat elsewhere, if you please—but through its mercy he is authorized to sit here, as many others like him will be. I do not dislike the bayonets. They are very good in their proper place. I am not one of those who would advocate their being used everywhere, but there are places where they should be used. They have been used in the South, and properly used.

Upon that branch of the subject I might well go further, but I am admonished that it is growing late. I wish, however, directly in connection with the remarks that are now submitted, to ask when they speak of the Federal bayonets so often, what have they done in the South since the rebellion has been so successfully put down by them? Military trials were had there in many instances for assassinations that were clear and unmistakable; convictions were had; men were sentenced to die, to pay the penalty that they had brought upon themselves; but the mercy that I speak of, through the Executive, President Grant, on all occasions I believe wherever he has been appealed to, interposed to save them. I know once I appealed to him in behalf of about twenty men who had been condemned by a military court that had been in session for four or five months at Jefferson, some forty or fifty miles distant from me. I was there and employed to defend a party for killing only about six men at one time. He was condemned to die, but President Grant directly reprieved the whole of them. I went to him once or twice, perhaps the third time. He said that he would turn every one of them loose or turn them all loose in the goodness of his heart. He thought by kindness he could bind them up so that they would respect and appreciate his kindness. Not a bit of it; and I say to you to-day, Mr. President, that every time you contract with a democrat, one of these parties down there that are so earnest now on this subject, and there are scarcely any others, you simply sell out yourselves on all occasions and you get nothing in return. They kick you out of court the very first opportunity they get after their solemn engagement with you. That is all you would realize. Let me continue reading this article:

We cannot foresee to what Louisiana is to be brought. We hope our predictions may prove false, but we have no faith in the integrity of the Chief Magistrate of the country, and believe his creatures are capable of everything but common honesty and patriotism. Sheridan is hanging around now to do his master's bidding, and, as much as he may deny it, we are satisfied that Grant intends to bring on the fight.

It is not remarkable for the people of the South to arrive at such a conclusion. There are thousands and thousands of them who, if you should put them upon their oaths to-day, would testify, and believe before God and man that they were speaking the truth, that the Federal Government brought on the war. But few of them there are ready to acknowledge that Sumter was fired upon in the first place. Many of them are not in the full possession of the facts. They were simply drilled by the democracy there, and whatever the democracy said was to them as the Bible or anything known to man; and they said in their speeches on the subject right and left that the war was forced upon them, that they were not the aggressors, and thus they say to-day; and if forty wars hereafter are forced upon the nation, they will always think themselves free from responsibility. They will never have anything to do with it except to fight like good, honest soldiers.

And Sheridan is to take charge of it. If so, we shall not mourn if "little Phil" has an opportunity to sample the sulphur refreshments of that particular place which he said he would prefer to Texas as a residence. It is about time the whole press was speaking out.

They all wish him a happy exit, and that he may reach that point at an early day. That is the whole of it, so far as little Phil is concerned. Here is another comment that is not very uninteresting to me on this line of the subject, because it portrays their character, though I am not an admirer of it:

The situation of affairs in Louisiana occasioned some time since a very positive and decided article in the Shreveport Times as to what disposal should be made of men usurping the places of those elected by the people. The article called out the Memphis Appeal and Courier-Journal in bitter and denunciatory articles, which in turn provoked very personal editorials from the Times. The fact that two Southern papers had taken the Times to task for its ill advised article, as they termed it, caused the matter to be thoroughly ventilated in the North. We have counseled moderation, and do so yet, but the following from the Times is just what every man must indorse:

"The question now with the people of Louisiana is, is the work finished? We think not. The will of the people, as expressed at the ballot-box on the 2d of November, and not the will of Kellogg & Co., as expressed through their returning board, must be vindicated. Every man elected to the lower house of the Legislature must be present in New Orleans at the opening of that body ready to take his seat. No private interest or matter of private business should prevent any from being at his post of duty, and he who fails now deserves the scorn and contempt of his fellow-men."

The Times then goes on to say that "if the Federal Government interferes to deter the people from protecting themselves, let the State be made too hot," &c.

Now, I say, let it be thus made, and let it be understood that the Senate of the United States are ready to meet that question. Let them make it just as hot as they desire; and, for the benefit of the nation, the sooner it is done the better. Let me not be misunderstood. The handwriting is on the wall, and the Southern States to-day are just as the volcanoes of Etna and Vesuvius are; they are ready to burst forth and to spread their lava broadcast upon any and every individual, I care not what his color may be, who entertains the idea of equality among the people of this proud nation.

Let every man do his duty, and his whole duty, be the consequences what they may. If the natural sequences are such that our fellow citizens must assert their manhood, they will; but, under the present pressure, coolness, deliberation, and moderation should be counseled, terrible as the oppression is.

Thereby stating clearly and unmistakably that but for the pressure some great rising would take place. What pressure? The pressure of these bayonets that our friends here are so much opposed to. That is the pressure, and it is rather an objectionable feature for a man to run against. He cannot very well afford to do it.

But there is another subject that I wish to discuss. I want to admonish the American people to-day—now is the time—that the southern people are better prepared for war than they have been for any period during the existence of this nation. I see my friend from Maryland [Mr. HAMILTON] smiling. He is a good democrat; he is one of the good democrats that I always like. I always love to please him, for I am then very much encouraged. He laughs at what I have said; he thinks it is a good idea. Now I will give him the reasons why I think so. When the last war was inaugurated and the South was possessed of some four million slaves they were worth a very large amount of money; they aggregated millions of dollars in value. They were by the laws of the land their property; they had inherited them; they had gotten them from their forefathers or from the North. There they were. During the war we had a very pretty little statute that he who was possessed of twenty slaves was exempt from military service. He could go and denounce radicalism and everything of that kind, and say very glibly that one southerner could come out with his lariat and by breakfast bring in half-a-dozen green Yankees without any trouble; but he was not required to fight himself. Those people went to battle under these circumstances. Very often they divided large plantations, so as to relieve A, B, C, D, E, and F, &c., to a very great extent, from military service. Now these gentlemen are free and easy. They did not go into the ranks to fight then, but they staid at home to watch the blacks. They were liberated to that extent. But here is the point: a war to-day would be in the absence of those slaves, in the absence of the money they represented; for that was the grand point. Before when the war was waged it was often said that the rebels had gained a victory at such and such a place, many of them being well known to history; but it was given out directly after the battle that the water had become a little bad where they were, and that they had fallen back some ten, fifteen, twenty, or fifty miles, as the case might be, until they found good water. They kept finding good springs and good locations until they began to come down close to Texas. [Laughter.] Before that, however, the blacks came by the hundreds and by the thousands into Texas. What were they coming to Texas for, crossing the Mississippi and Red Rivers, and getting into that vast plain? It was hoped that the Federal troops would not reach them and they would be secure in that retreat. They were always accompanied by many owners, overseers, &c. The laws recognized their action in that retreat in every instance. To-day if war was inaugurated that question does not come up. There is no negro interest there now to fight for. That is all disposed of. Therefore all could go to the front; they could all fight; there would be no excuse for any to remain behind; and I tell you they are stronger and better prepared to-day than they have ever been at any previous period of their history, and many of them are all anxiety to go into war.

It is true there are many there like my distinguished friend from Georgia. He went into the war and fought valiantly. There are a great many down there who never got into it, and those who never got into it to-day are the most warlike men you ever saw. One of them could whip twenty Yankees without any trouble in God Almighty's world; and unless they should prove consistent and run away in the second instance, as they did originally, they would have to be encountered too, and they would stop a few bullets occasionally. That is the feeling there.

Again, let it be understood, let it go abroad that the bitterness upon the part of the southern people to-day is tenfold greater than it was at any period during the last war, because throughout that whole struggle it was fondly hoped by many of the slaveholders that ultimately, when peace should be made, they would be left in possession of their property. All those parties became very bitter to those who had sympathized with republicanism and the struggles of the Federal Army anterior to that period. But what is the history to-day? You may go all over the South, as far as I have ever gone, and you will find at the breakfast table, you will find at dinner, at tea, in the parlor, everywhere, the great subject is Louisiana and her oppression, and the anathemas that are hurled at the United States Government, the civil-rights bill, and everything else included. Previous to the war they were simply democrats. They were drilled then broadcast throughout the whole South. All the South was democratic. They had all power—power, they thought, to sunder the Government and build up a new one, but in that they failed. They are not satisfied. History repeats itself; revolution follows upon revolution. Alphonso is king to-day, where there was a republic a few days since, and so we go. I think that at an early day you will hear that young Napoleon has come to power, and is placed on the throne of his ancesters as the Emperor of proud France. What is in the future for us? Is it Davis? God only knows whether Davis is to be the President of the United States at a very early period or not. Thousands and thousands there are who would vote for him in preference to Grant or anybody else.

Are those the persons whom you wish to possess the power of exercising control over the bayonets that they speak of? The democracy cannot perpetuate this great nation. They had all power up to 1860. They became so strong that in their strength they fell. Give them the power and they will do that again, and it is an open question whether the republican party is not going to do precisely the thing that the democracy did at that day. They have been too strong, with perfect confidence in their ability to do anything and everything, so as to secure and perpetuate the blessings that have grown out of a republican government. I am gratified to know that we have lived to reach that period when the republicans are aroused. Sir, they must be; they must come to the front throughout this great nation. They must now, politically, make a charge; and it must be a Murat charge. They must not be halting between two opinions. "There is the enemy," as the old general told his soldiers when they were in martial array, directly in view of the contending army. Said he, riding up and down before them, "I am no speaker; but there's your enemy; if you don't whip them, they will whip you." I tell you that the republican party is in this condition to-day. They are in martial array. Let these men say what they may about bayonets, they will find the bayonets when they are necessary to be found, if they have that sympathy that is invoked and is so clearly boasted of on this occasion in the North. Yet what is it that they will not be armed with? They have more power than you have any idea of, unless you contemplate the subject earnestly.

The American nation owes a large debt; she owes many millions. What is the confederate debt? Nothing, under God Almighty's heaven! They do not owe any foreign debt; they dislike very much to pay their pro rata of interest on the national debt to-day; but give them the power, and then they would talk to you. Then, when you spoke of pensioning an old soldier, they would say, "Yes, pension the confederates likewise." When you talked about appropriations to pay the interest on your debt, they would say, "Yes, but pay the cotton bonds to England, for we drew the money and will stand up and acknowledge our general indebtedness," and at an early period the question would be whether the sum would not be so large, like counting the horse-shoe nails, that it would be easy to propose simply to repudiate the whole and end it! The northern sympathizing friends of the South had better look to their bonds; they had better look to the integrity of the republican party. Their interests are not to be thus ignored. There are some brains in the republican party, and I hope there is some patriotism. When all these facts are taken together, I am sure it will be seen that a great responsibility is placed upon our northern friends. They must act; and, as has been evidenced here in the opening of this discussion by the North and by the great West, when they come up side by side, the republican party must succeed. I hope in God it may.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING.]

Mr. SARGENT. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I should like to submit some remarks.

Mr. SARGENT. I understand the Senator from Maryland takes the floor to speak on this matter; and he yields to me, that I may make a motion to adjourn, which I now make.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Before putting the question on that motion, the Chair asks permission to present some bills from the House of Representatives for the purpose of reference.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

The bill (H. R. No. 4162) granting the right of way and depot grounds to the Oregon Central Pacific Railway Company through the public lands of the United States, from Winnemucca, in the State of Nevada, to the Columbia River, via Portland, in the State of Oregon—to the Committee on Public Lands;

The bill (H. R. No. 3912) to reduce and fix the Adjutant-General's Department of the Army—to the Committee on Military Affairs; and

The bill (H. R. No. 4126) authorizing the Citizens' National Bank of Sanbornton, New Hampshire, to change its name—to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 6, 1875.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

REPORT OF COMMISSIONERS OF CLAIMS.

Mr. DONNAN, from the Committee on Printing, reported back with an amendment the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Committee on War Claims of this House and the commissioners of claims four thousand copies of the fourth annual report of the commissioners of claims.

The amendment was read as follows:

Strike out "four thousand" and insert "one thousand," so as to read "one thousand copies."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. DONNAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS AT SAINT LOUIS, MISSOURI.

Mr. WELLS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4163) to provide an appropriation for continuing the construction of the post-office and custom-house at Saint Louis, Missouri; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

AFFAIRS IN ARKANSAS.

Mr. LAMAR, by unanimous consent, presented a petition of sundry citizens of Arkansas; which was ordered to be printed, and was referred to the special committee in relation to affairs in Arkansas.

CHANGE OF NAME OF A NATIONAL BANK.

Mr. MAYNARD, by unanimous consent, reported back, with an amendment from the Committee on Banking and Currency, the bill (H. R. No. 4126) authorizing the Citizens' National Bank of Sanbornton, New Hampshire, to change its name.

The bill was read.

The first section provides that the name of the Citizens' National Bank of Sanbornton, New Hampshire, shall be changed to the Citizens' National Bank of Tilton, New Hampshire, whenever the board of directors of said bank shall accept the new name by resolution of the board, and cause a copy of such action, duly authenticated, to be filed with the Comptroller of the Currency. Such acceptance is to be made within six months after the passage of this act; and all expenses incident to the proposed change, including engraving, are to be borne and paid by the bank.

The second section provides that all the debts, demands, liabilities, rights, privileges, and powers of the Citizens' National Bank of Sanbornton shall devolve upon and inure to the Citizens' National Bank of Tilton, New Hampshire, whenever such change of name is effected.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In the first section, after the words "resolution of the board," insert "and confirmed by a vote of two-thirds of the stockholders."

Mr. MAYNARD. As we understand the facts, this bank was originally established in the town of Sanbornton, New Hampshire. The Legislature of that State has divided the town into two parts, the new part called by the name of Tilton, and it is in that new part the bank is in fact situated. It is not a change of place, but a change of name, to correspond with the action of the Legislature.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is not a change of location?

Mr. MAYNARD. It does not change the location. The amendment we propose is to make this conform to each of the other bills already reported.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MAYNARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LABORING MEN OF GEORGETOWN, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. NEGLEY, by unanimous consent, presented the petition of certain laboring men of the city of Georgetown, District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

OKLAHOMA.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4164) to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Oklahoma; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Territories, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BECK. The understanding is that the bill is not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. That cannot be done.

ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S DEPARTMENT.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I call up a motion to reconsider the vote by which House bill No. 3912 was recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER. Was that done yesterday?

Mr. MACDOUGALL. No, but on the 22d of last December. I wish to bring the bill before the House for consideration.

The SPEAKER. What is the bill?

Mr. MACDOUGALL. It is the bill (H. R. No. 3912) reducing the force in the Adjutant-General's Department of the Army. It was recommitted and the motion entered to reconsider, which motion I now call up for consideration.

The bill provides that the Adjutant-General's Department of the Army shall hereafter consist of one Adjutant-General, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier-general: two assistant adjutants-general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of colonels; four assistant adjutants-general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of lieutenant-colonels; and ten assistant adjutants-general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of majors.

The second section repeals so much of section 6 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1870, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1869, as applies to the Adjutant-General's Department.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust there will be some explanation of the effect of the bill—whether it increases the number of officers in that Department of the Army or not.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. In reply I will say it reduces the number three majors, while it increases the lieutenant-colonels one. In other words, it reduces the number of majors from thirteen to ten, and increases the lieutenant-colonels one; or rather, fills a vacancy by promoting a major to be lieutenant-colonel. With that exception there is no change of rank. It will save to the Government $10,500 a year.

Mr. GARFIELD. When this bill was up before I made some criticism of it; not so much criticism of the bill itself as criticism of the general legislation touching the Army, and then asked for its postponement, so as to have time to look more carefully into its provisions. I then called attention to the fact that in 1869 promotion had been stopped in the staff corps of the Army for the sake of reducing them to a size more compatible with the size of the new Army, or rather more in proportion to a peace establishment. That reduction of course has gone on by the natural process of absorption from casualties; but of course some time or other promotion ought to be restored to the staff corps. I regret I did not at that time know more about the legislation of last June. I think the act then passed was uneven in its operation. It opened up all of the staff corps except three—the Adjutant-General's, the Pay Department, and the Medical Corps. One thing was then done which I deeply regret. It was my belief, and has been for years, that we ought not to have in time of peace, under a peace establishment, brigadier-generals at the head of staff corps; but I find on looking over the legislation of last spring all these staff corps, save perhaps two, have had a brigadier-general allowed as head of the corps. If we have gone so far to break up the old plan, I see no reason why we should make this exception, and therefore I do not believe this bill in reference to the Adjutant-General's Department is an improper one—certainly not improper taken in connection with the legislation already had. It is doing no more for the Adjutant-General's Department than has been done for almost all the other corps; and so far as I am personally concerned I withdraw any objection to the bill. I only think the legislation ought to have been about all the staff corps rather than by piecemeal, as we are having it now and as it has been in the past.

Mr. DONNAN. I desire to say a word in addition to what has already been said in regard to this bill. I have examined it with some care, and I do not believe there is any valid objection to it. Under the law of 1862 we had in all thirty regiments. The staff corps of the Adjutant-General's Department then consisted of one brigadier-general, two colonels, four lieutenant-colonels, and thirteen majors. As this bill now proposes, with forty regiments as a military organization, we will have the same brigadier-general, the same number of colonels, and the same number of lieutenant-colonels, and three fewer majors.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understood the gentleman from New York [Mr. MACDOUGALL] to say that the number of lieutenant-colonels is increased by one.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. One vacancy is to be filled.

Mr. DONNAN. The bill does not increase the number of lieutenant-colonels. There will be a vacancy which will be filled by promotion. Now, the opening up for promotion has been recommended by the War Department. The House acted upon the recommendation last June and opened this staff corps to promotion; but the law as it came back amended by the Senate defeated that object so far as this staff corps is concerned. I believe there is no serious objection to the bill. It is economical, and ought to become a law.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I call the previous question on the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, and under the operation thereof the House agreed to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I now withdraw the motion to recommit, and ask that the bill be put upon its passage.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MACDOUGALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF SAINT ALBANS.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4165) for the relief of the First National Bank of Saint Albans, Vermont, and other persons; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

He also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4166) for the relief of the First National Bank of Saint Albans, Vermont; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

REIMBURSEMENT OF THE CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO.

Mr. CLAYTON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4167) making an appropriation to reimburse the city and county of San Francisco for certain expenditures; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ADDITIONAL PAY TO CALIFORNIA TROOPS.

Mr. CLAYTON also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4168) allowing additional pay to the troops known as the California Hundred and the California Cavalry Battalion; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

LORENZO D. LATIMER.

Mr. CLAYTON also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4169) for the relief of Lorenzo D. Latimer, late United States district attorney for the district of California; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

JUDICIARY COURTS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4170) to amend the fourteenth section of the act to establish the judiciary courts of the United States, approved September 24, 1789; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

INTERNAL-REVENUE TAXES.

Mr. HOSKINS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4171) to reduce internal-revenue taxes, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

T. J. AND F. A. WHARTON.

Mr. McKEE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4172) for the relief of T. J. and F. A. Wharton; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. McKEE. I ask that this bill be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. GARFIELD. A bill for relief should not go to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. McKEE. It provides for payment out of an appropriation.

Mr. RANDALL. Let the bill be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That out of the appropriations made for the Department of Justice there shall be paid to T. J. and F. A. Wharton the sum of $250 for legal services rendered to the United States in the prosecution of H. B. McClure, late collector of internal revenue second collection district Mississippi, and J. W. Robbins, deputy of the said McClure.

Mr. RANDALL. That is a claim, and should not go to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. GARFIELD. The bill is liable to the point of order under the new rule of last session. It relates to an appropriation out of an appropriation, and should go to the Judiciary Committee. I move that it be so referred.

The bill was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

MASONIC MUTUAL RELIEF ASSOCIATION.

Mr. WOOD, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4173) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Masonic Mutual Relief Association of the District of Columbia," approved March 3, 1869; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

JAMES H. HAMILTON.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4174) for the relief of James H. Hamilton; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

BINGER HERMANN.

Mr. NESMITH, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4175) for the relief of Binger Hermann; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS.

Mr. FARWELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4176) for an act concerning judicial proceedings in certain cases; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN H. RUSSELL.

Mr. WALDRON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4177) for the relief of John H. Russell, of Adrian, Michigan; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

GAINES LAWSON.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4178) for the relief of Gaines Lawson, late captain Fourth Tennessee Infantry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN L. BRADLEY.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee, also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4179) granting a pension to John L. Bradley, late corporal second North Carolina Mounted Infantry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

DANIEL WILHOIT.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee, also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4180) granting a pension to Daniel Wilhoit, late sergeant of Company L, Eighth Tennessee Cavalry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

POTOMAC AND MOUNT PLEASANT RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. FRYE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4181) to incorporate the Potomac and Mount Pleasant Railroad Company; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

CAROLINE SHEWARD.

Mr. BANNING, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4182) granting a pension to Caroline Sheward, widow of Nimrod D. Sheward, late a teamster in the United States Army; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

IMPROVEMENT OF RED-FISH BAR.

Mr. GIDDINGS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4183) to provide for continuing the improvement of Red-fish Bar, in Galveston Bay, Texas; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

EQUALIZATION OF BOUNTIES.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4184) to equalize bounties to soldiers who served in the late war; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at thirty-two minutes past twelve o'clock, and reports are in order from the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. AVERILL. The Committee on Indian Affairs has had some business submitted to it which it has been unable to perfect and which is very important, and while there are some little matters which they might report to-day, I ask in their behalf unanimous consent that the committee may reserve its right under the call until some other day.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have no objection to that, provided it does not require some other committee to report to-day.

The SPEAKER. It is the duty of the Chair, unless otherwise ordered by the House, to call the committees in their order.

Mr. SHANKS. There are other committees ready to report.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Very well; then I will not object.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the two hours belonging to the Committee on Indian Affairs will be reserved for some other day. The Chair hears no objection. Reports are now in order from the Committee on Military Affairs.

MEMPHIS AND VICKSBURGH RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. DONNAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with an amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 103) granting to the Memphis and Vicksburgh Railroad Company the right of way along the river bank at the national cemetery at Vicksburgh, Mississippi.

The bill, which was read, grants the Memphis and Vicksburgh Railroad Company, a corporation organized under an act of the Legislature of the State of Mississippi, the right to construct their line of railroad through the grounds of the national cemetery at Vicksburgh; said line to run within two hundred feet of the bank of the Mississippi River, not to interfere with the improved grounds of said cemetery, except at a point below the terraces where there is a plat wherein a few regular soldiers are buried, said point to be spanned by an iron bridge of handsome style; the whole of said line through the cemetery to be constructed under the supervision of the United States officer in charge of said cemetery.

The amendment was to strike out all after the words "is hereby granted the right," and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

Of way through the grounds of the national cemetery at Vicksburgh, Mississippi, one hundred feet in width, and not more than two hundred feet distant from the Mississippi River; provided, in case said right of way shall include within its limits the graves of any deceased soldiers, their remains shall be removed and reinterred within said cemetery under the direction of the United States officer in charge, and at the expense of said railroad company.

The question was upon the amendment reported from the committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. This bill makes an appropriation of public land. It seems to me that nothing but an extreme case would justify such a bill. I will reserve my point of order until some explanation is made.

Mr. DONNAN. I will make a statement, and then I think the gentleman will hardly deem it necessary to insist upon his point of order. This railroad crosses a small portion, about forty or fifty rods in length, of the national cemetery near the bank of the Mississippi River at Vicksburgh. It is nearly impossible to cut a way through the bluffs, and unless this railroad can cross the bank of the Mississippi River at this point—the value of the property is not much, being only four rods in length——

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not attach any importance to the value of the property. My objection is to the appropriation of the ground dedicated to the burial of the soldiers of the late war for the use of corporations. That should not be done unless imperatively necessary and no other course can be adopted.

Mr. DONNAN. It will not damage the cemetery at all. The War Department says there is no objection to the passage of this bill, and I apprehend the value of the property is so small that it is hardly worth while for the gentleman to maintain his point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have said that I do not attach any importance to the question of the value of the property, none at all. I object to a railroad company being allowed to construct its road through a cemetery of the soldiers of the late war unless there is an imperative necessity for it. The idea seems to be that railroads should be allowed to run their roads wherever they please. If in this instance this road cannot be constructed so as to run around this cemetery, then there may be no objection to the bill.

Mr. DONNAN. I will yield to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. McKEE.]

Mr. McKEE. The situation of this road is very peculiar. There are a great many here who are familiar with the hills around Vicksburgh. They all know that there is a high, narrow range of hills, and the only outlet for a railroad from the city of Vicksburgh is over these hills or right along the bank of the Mississippi River. The hills are too high to grade the road up and down them, and you cannot burrow two miles through them. This cemetery lies right in the path, and if we cannot go across it, we cannot have a railroad at all. This is the most important railroad that comes to Vicksburgh; it runs through all our rich Yazoo and Mississippi River bottoms. We cannot get out in any other way; we have tried every way we can to engineer out, and the only route is along the bank of the Mississippi River, upon the shelving débris of the bluffs.

Mr. HOLMAN. With this explanation, and with the statement that the War Department do not object to this road, I will not insist upon my point of order.

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DONNAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GENERAL B. S. ROBERTS.

Mr. DONNAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4185) for the relief of Brevet Brigadier-General B. S. Roberts; which was read a first and second time.

The bill authorizes and requests the President to convene a board, to consist of not less than five officers, at least two of whom shall be medical officers of the Army, whose duty it shall be to examine and report whether B. S. Roberts, lieutenant-colonel United States Army retired, was, as of date December 15, 1870, entitled to be retired in accordance with the provisions of section 32 of an act to increase and fix the military peace establishment of the United States, approved July 28, 1866; and if said board shall find that said Roberts was entitled to be retired under the provisions of said act, then in that case it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War to correct the record of said Roberts, and to retire him, in accordance with the provisions of section 32 of said act, as of date December 15, 1870, the date of his actual retirement.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DONNAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOSEPH B. EATON.

Mr. DONNAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4186) for the relief of Joseph B. Eaton; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

HENRY JACKSON.

Mr. DONNAN also, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that it pass, the bill (H. R. No. 3860) for the relief of First Lieutenant Henry Jackson, Seventh Cavalry, United States Army; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SAMUEL W. HAMILTON.

Mr. DONNAN also, from the same committee, reported back the memorial, statement, and evidence relating to the claim of Samuel W. Hamilton to a portion of the Fort Gratiot military reservation, Michigan; moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

CHARLES A. LUKE.

Mr. DONNAN also, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that it pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1340) for the relief of Charles A. Luke; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM B. HAZEN.

Mr. DONNAN also, from the same committee, reported back adversely the memorial of General William B. Hazen, on the subject of creating a soldiers' savings deposit; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

REMOVAL OF DESERTERS' DISABILITIES.

Mr. DONNAN also, from the same committee, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. No. 2142) to relieve all persons engaged in the volunteer military service of the United States at the close of the war of the rebellion from the disability of desertion on account of absenting themselves afterward from their respective regiments and companies without leave.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that this bill be read.

The bill was read. It provides that all persons who were in the volunteer military service of the United States on the 18th day of April, 1865, and who after that time absented themselves without leave from their respective regiments and companies, and who were on that account entered as deserters on their respective rolls, be relieved of the sentence of desertion; and that all claims for back-pay and bounty be audited and paid to them as though no disability of desertion had ever been incurred by them.

Mr. HOLMAN. Do the Committee on Military Affairs consider this an improper measure?

Mr. DONNAN. Let the report be read.

Mr. HOLMAN. Many of the States have memorialized Congress on this subject.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Before any further proceedings be taken on this bill, if it is to be considered, I desire to make a point of order on it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hold that point in reserve. Does the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] object to laying the bill on the table?

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the report will be read before any point is made on the bill.

Mr. DONNAN. Perhaps after the report is read the gentleman from Indiana will be satisfied that the bill should be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The point of order will be considered as reserved.

The report was read. It states that the bill proposes to relieve from the charge of desertion all persons engaged in the military service of the United States at the close of the late war who subsequent to the 18th day of April, 1865, absented themselves from their respective regiments without leave, and to give to all such their full pay and bounty as though no such charge had been entered against them. Among the number of soldiers who so absented themselves, the committee state, there are undoubtedly cases of peculiar hardship, which have received or will receive favorable consideration by Congress; but to restore the entire list to an unblemished record would be unjust to the many thousands of their faithful comrades who served without breach of military discipline until honorably mustered out of the service. Desertion from military duty is a grave crime; and to restore a large number of persons guilty of the offense, without very cogent reasons for their relief, will have a most demoralizing effect upon the existing Army, in which organization "desertion" is now an offense of too frequent occurrence.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think this bill ought to go to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. DONNAN. We have no objection to that if the gentleman wants to debate it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. This measure would take about ten million dollars from the Treasury.

The SPEAKER. It will be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I raise the point that it is a public bill and cannot go to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER, (after examining the bill.) The bill will be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. DONNAN also, from the same committee, reported back adversely the following; which were laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. No. 1485) directing the Secretary of War to detail an officer of the Army to go to Freestone County, Texas, to investigate the burning of the store-house and goods of L. R. Worthom, of said county, alleged to have been done by Federal soldiers since the war;

Petition of Joseph H. Chadwick and others, incorporators of the Joseph Warren Monument Association, asking for a donation of brass cannon;

A bill (H. R. No. 2970) to govern the transportation of supplies for the Army;

Memorial of the Legislature of Florida, asking that the barracks at Saint Augustine be transferred to that State to be used as a State lunatic asylum;

A bill (S. No. 305) for the relief of Albert Von Steinhousen, late major Sixty-eighth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry;

A bill (H. R. No. 3212) for the relief of Rachel Frisbee, widow of Elzy Frisbee;

A bill (H. R. No. 3416) for the relief of Jacob Dice, Fountain County, Indiana;

The memorial of G. H. Graham, late captain Company I, Eighth Tennessee Infantry;

The petition of Robert Miney;

The memorial of Charles Young; and

A bill (H. R. No. 419) for the relief of Francisco V. C. De Coster, of Litchfield, Meeker County, Minnesota.

EXTRA HOUR FOR REPORTS OF MILITARY COMMITTEE.

Mr. DONNAN. In the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. COBURN] and of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. ALBRIGHT,] another member of the same committee, who are away from the city under order of the House attending to special business, I ask unanimous consent they may have the opportunity to report such business as they may have in their hands immediately after the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The proper way would be to give the committee an additional hour. It is entitled to two hours under the rule to make reports.

Mr. DONNAN. The committee may occupy its two hours, but I now ask unanimous consent that the chairman of the committee and the gentleman from Pennsylvania may have opportunity to report such business now in their hands after the Committee on Indian Affairs has concluded its reports.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Not to exceed one hour.

Mr. DONNAN. That is all I ask.

The SPEAKER. In order that there may be no misapprehension, the Chair will state the request of the gentleman from Iowa. It is that after the Committee on Indian Affairs has concluded its report, the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBURN,] chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. ALBRIGHT,] also a member of the committee, shall have one hour to report such business as they may have in charge on the part of that committee.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

SOLDIERS' ORPHANS' HOME OF THE STATE OF ILLINOIS.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4187) to donate certain heavy artillery to the trustees of the Soldiers' Orphans' Home of the State of Illinois; which was read a first and second time.

The bill directs the Secretary of War to furnish to the trustees of the Soldiers' Orphans' Home of the State of Illinois six heavy guns, with carriages, to be permanently located for ornamentation, two at said home and four near by at the Bloomington soldiers' monument; all of said guns to be taken from those captured, or such as may be at any time in the Ordnance Department, and not needed by the Army.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. GUNCKEL, from the same committee, reported adversely in the following cases; which were laid on the table:

A bill (H. R. No. 2582) granting to the city of Baton Rouge, Louisiana, certain portions of the United States garrison grounds in that city for the purpose of a public park; and

A memorial of the State board of education of the State of Indiana.

FORT BUTLER RESERVATION, NEW MEXICO.

Mr. GUNCKEL also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4188) to release Fort Butler military reservation; which was read a first and second time.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of War to rescind all action heretofore taken by the War Department for the establishment of a military reservation at Fort Butler, in the Territory of New Mexico, and to declare said reservation released from any appropriation for military purposes.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GUNCKEL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JAMES M. SEEDS.

Mr. GUNCKEL also, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 2938) for the relief of James M. Seeds, of Cincinnati, Ohio, with the recommendation that it do pass; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. GUNCKEL also, from the same committee, reported adversely in the following cases; which were laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. No. 1794) for the relief of Henry C. Hirst;

A bill (H. R. No. 1299) to correct an error in the date of enlistment of John H. Franklin, late a soldier of Company K, Seventh Regiment Iowa Volunteer Infantry, as appears on the muster-roll of said company now in the War Department; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2971) for the relief of certain soldiers of the Indian Home Guard Regiment.

CITY OF PETERSBURGH, VIRGINIA.

Mr. GUNCKEL also, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 2375) for the relief of the city of Petersburgh, and moved that the same be referred to the Committee on War Claims; which motion was agreed to.

POST-QUARTERMASTER-SERGEANTS.

Mr. MACDOUGALL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 6178) to provide for post-quartermaster-sergeants.

The bill was read. It authorizes and empowers the Secretary of War to select from the sergeants of the line of the Army who shall have faithfully served therein five years, three years of which in the grade of non-commissioned officer, as many post-quartermaster-sergeants as the service may require, not exceeding one for each military post or place of deposit of quartermaster supplies, whose duty it shall be to receive and preserve the quartermaster supplies at the posts, under the direction of the proper officers of the Quartermaster's Department, and under such regulations as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of War. The post-quartermaster-sergeants hereby authorized shall be subject to the Rules and Articles of War, and shall receive for their services the same pay and allowances as ordnance-sergeants.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I hope the gentleman who reports this bill will give some explanation of what will be its effect. It provides for the appointment of two hundred and fifty new officers of the Army; or it empowers the selection of these sergeants, and it will be necessary to supply their places in the line by new enlistments.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. The bill provides that the sergeants shall be taken from the line of the Army; and it will not be necessary to supply their places as the gentleman from Massachusetts has suggested. Companies under the new organization having only forty or fifty men in them can get along with three or four sergeants. The bill simply transfers these sergeants and gives them the extra pay which they are entitled to as extra-duty men.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MACDOUGALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ALMERON E. CALKINS.

Mr. MACDOUGALL also, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 2401) for the relief of Almeron E. Calkins, late a second lieutenant in the Eighth Michigan Cavalry.

The bill was read. It authorizes the Paymaster-General of the United States Army to pay Almeron E. Calkins, late a second lieutenant in the Eighth Michigan Cavalry, the pay and allowances of a second lieutenant, from the 19th day of March, 1864, to the 23d day of July, 1864, the date of his muster as such second lieutenant.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I make the point of order that this bill must have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The bill goes to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. MACDOUGALL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported adversely on the following bills, &c.; and the same were severally laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

The bill (H. R. No. 1428) for the relief of Anson B. Lains;

The petition of Edward Black, late major Eleventh Tennessee Cavalry Volunteers; and

The petition of Mrs. B. Brown.

Mr. THORNBURGH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported adversely on the following bills and petitions; and the same were severally laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

The petition of Louisa Scheckels;

The bill (H. R. No. 431) to construct a military wagon-road in Washington Territory; and

The bill (H. R. No. 2921) for the relief of George T. Cochrane, late captain Eighth Indiana Battery.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported adversely on the bill (H. R. No. 1121) for the relief of the State of Missouri, on account of ordnance and ordnance stores issued to the said State by the United States during the late war of the rebellion; and the same was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ORDNANCE STORES ISSUED DURING THE LATE CIVIL WAR.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia, also, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with amendments, the bill (H. R. No. 2724) for the relief of certain States and Territories, on account of ordnance stores issued to them during the late civil war.

The bill was read. It provides that all issues of arms and other ordnance stores which were made by the War Department to the States and Territories between the 1st day of January, 1861, and the 9th day of April, 1865, under the act of April 23, 1808, and charged to the States and Territories, having been made for the maintenance and preservation of the Union, and properly chargeable to the United States, the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to credit the several States and Territories with the sum charged to them respectively for arms and other ordnance stores which were issued to them between the aforementioned dates, and charged against their quotas under the law for arming and equipping the militia.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as follows:

In line 11, after the word "authorized," insert "upon a proper showing by such States and Territories of the faithful disposition of said arms and ordnance stores."

And add the following proviso:

Provided, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War, before making a credit to any of said States and Territories, to investigate and ascertain so nearly as he can the disposition made by each of said States and Territories of said arms and ordnance stores; and if he shall find that any of said arms or ordnance stores have been sold or otherwise misapplied, to refuse a credit to such State or Territory for so much of said arms and ordnance stores as have been sold or misapplied; and the amount thereof shall remain a charge against said State or Territory the same as if this act had not been passed.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to ask the gentleman from Georgia a question. Does this bill affect those States which have settled up? Does it give them any drawback? If I understand the bill rightly, it relieves those States which have overdrawn their accounts. Now, suppose a State has not overdrawn its account, does the bill allow it anything?

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. No, sir; it does not allow any drawback. The bill devolves it upon the Secretary of War to inquire whether the arms and stores issued to the various States were used in the late war, and, if so, to credit those States with the sums charged to them for such arms and stores. Some of the States—among whom is Vermont—have sold the arms, and by this bill they are made to account to the United States for such sale.

Mr. GUNCKEL. This bill is intended to settle up this whole matter, and places all the States on an equal footing. It is simply to correct a matter of book-keeping in the War Department.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I now move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LIEUTENANT R. H. CHADBORN.

Mr. HUNTON, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4189) for the relief of Lieutenant R. H. Chadborn, late of Company B, Eighty-fourth Regiment United States Colored Infantry; which was read a first and second time.

The bill provides that so much of General Order No. 167, dated headquarters of the Department of the Gulf, November 22, 1864, as approves of the proceedings, finding, and sentence of First Lieutenant R. H. Chadborn, Eighty-fourth Regiment United States Colored Infantry, by court-martial convened on the 1st day of September, 1864, be annulled, and it authorizes and instructs the Secretary of War to give to the said R. H. Chadborn an honorable discharge as of the date of his dismissal by the sentence of said court-martial.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Is there a report accompanying that bill?

The SPEAKER. There is.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I would like to hear the report read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the report.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I withdraw the call for the reading.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose that should go to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar. I make the point of order upon it.

The SPEAKER. The bill is referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. HUNTON. I understand that there is no objection, and I ask that the bill be put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to insist on the point of order on the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose the point of order is proper, but if gentlemen of the committee who have examined the subject think the bill ought to pass, I will not insist upon it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I renew the point of order.

The SPEAKER. Then the bill is referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

PROTECTION OF THE BANKS OF COLORADO RIVER.

Mr. HUNTON also, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 3768) to provide for the protection of the banks of the Colorado River at Yuma military depot, Arizona.

The bill appropriates $40,000 to be used under the direction of the Secretary of War in the construction of such walls or other works as may be necessary for the protection of the banks of the Colorado River at the Yuma military reservation, Arizona.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Is there a report accompanying that bill?

Mr. HUNTON. There are accompanying papers, and I ask for the reading of them.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, February 20, 1874.

The Secretary of War has the honor to transmit to the House of Representatives copy of letter of chief quartermaster Department of Arizona, relative to a project for the protection of the banks of the Colorado River at Yuma depot from the action of the current, which has heretofore threatened its destruction during annual freshets.

By reference to the indorsement of the Quartermaster-General it will be seen that the total cost of the work will probably be not less than $40,000.

The large store-houses and the great amount of public property usually at the Yuma depot render it important that a special appropriation should be made to protect the banks of the river at this point against the action of floods.

WM. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War.

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF ARIZONA,
CHIEF QUARTERMASTER'S OFFICE,
Prescott, Arizona, August 23, 1873.

CAPTAIN: I have the honor to submit a project for the protection of the banks of the Colorado River at Yuma depot from the action of the current, which has heretofore threatened its destruction during annual freshets. * * * * The direction of the current of the Colorado, from the mouth of the Gila, is toward the rocky bluff on which Fort Yuma is situated; deflected thence, it strikes the left bank of the river directly in front of the depot store-house, where, and also at a point about 250 feet further down stream, the river banks have been washed away by the counter current to a serious extent.

About a year since temporary protection was attempted by use of stone and brush, which have now nearly disappeared.

With a view to determining a method for permanent protection, I have caused measurements and soundings to be taken, under the direction of Captain A. F. Rockwell, assistant quartermaster.

From the profile sketch it appears that the upper stratum of the river-bed, immediately in front of the Government reservation and near the southern shore, is composed of sand, with occasional layers of indurated clay, to an average depth of about 14 feet, underlying which is a compact hard material, apparently clay, difficult to penetrate with the sounding-rod.

The most effective and least costly method of protection is, in my opinion, briefly as follows: (A revetment wall of stone would be more costly.)

Commencing at the projecting point above the steamboat landing, let a continuous row of piles (12 inches diameter at butt) be driven as closely together as possible, and near to the shore, conforming to its general direction to a point about 600 feet below the landing.

These piles to be sufficiently long to be driven through the upper stratum of sand, and penetrate sufficiently far into the underlying compact clay to insure stability. This will require piles of an average length of 22 feet.

The heads of the piles to be sawed off at the line of low-water mark. On the top of the piles, and securely pinned to each pile-head, let a continuous timber-cap of 12 inches square be placed.

At intervals of 12 feet, and 12 feet in rear of the front row of piles, let anchor-piles be driven, and the cap or lower course of timber be securely connected therewith, at intervals of 12 feet, by a land-tie 12 by 12 inches square.

Upon the cap-timber of the front row of piles let a vertical revetment of timber of the same dimensions be raised, each course secured to that next below it by 12-inch wooden pins, 22 inches long, 6 feet apart.

The timber revetment to be secured to the anchor-piles, at intervals of 12 feet, by two land-ties, one about half the height from the cap-piece to the top of the work, the other 1 foot below the top. The space between the timber revetment and the bank of the river to be filled with stone, brush, and earth, carefully laid, to advance pari passu with the timber construction.

This timber revetment to be carried up sufficiently high to be above the highest recorded water, which would require a height of about 18 feet from top of piles when ready for capping.

The back-filling to be done by labor of troops and depot laborers.

I estimate the cost of this work as follows:

715 piles, (12 inches at butt,) 22 feet long, 15,730 linear feet, at 75 cents..	$11,797 50
150,000 feet (board measure) timber, 12 inches by 12 inches, at $100 per M.	15,000 00
Driving piles	3,000 00
Carpenters' labor	3,000 00
Labor, as back-filling and contingencies	2,202 50
Total estimated cost	35,000 00

In view of the great value of public property liable to destruction at Yuma depot, I respectfully recommend such action as may secure the completion of this work, by the foregoing or any other effective plan, before the high water of the summer of 1874.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. J. DANA,
Major and Quartermaster, U. S. A.,
Chief Quartermaster Department of Arizona.

The ACTING ASSISTANT ADJUTANT-GENERAL,
Department of Arizona, Prescott, Arizona.

[First indorsement.]

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF ARIZONA,
Prescott, August 25, 1873.

Respectfully forwarded, approved, and earnestly recommending that this matter receive that prompt attention the subject demands.

GEORGE CROOK,
Lieutenant-Colonel Twenty-third Infantry,
Brevet Major-General, Commanding Department.

[Second indorsement.]

HEADQUARTERS MILITARY DIVISION PACIFIC,
San Francisco, September 5, 1873.

Respectfully referred to the chief quartermaster Military Division Pacific for remark.

By order of Major-General Schofield:

Lieutenant-Colonel, A. A. G.

[Third indorsement.]

HEADQUARTERS MILITARY DIVISION PACIFIC,
OFFICE OF CHIEF QUARTERMASTER,
San Francisco, California, September 6, 1873.

Respectfully returned to the assistant adjutant-general, headquarters Military Division Pacific, with request that these papers, &c., be submitted to the Quartermaster-General.

R. H. ALLEN,
Assistant Quartermaster-General.

[Fourth indorsement.]

HEADQUARTERS MILITARY DIVISION PACIFIC,

Respectfully forwarded to the Adjutant-General.

J. M. SCHOFIELD,
Major-General.

[Fifth indorsement.]

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, September 18, 1873.

Respectfully referred to the Quartermaster-General.

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Adjutant-General.

[Sixth indorsement.]

QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
September 26, 1873.

Respectfully returned to the Adjutant-General of the Army.

The project is defective in not providing a row of sheet-piling, to prevent the whole construction being undermined by the washing out of the loose sand of the bed of the river below low water.

Estimating that this would add $5,000 to the cost, the total cost of the work will probably be not below $40,000.

I recommend that Congress be asked to make appropriation for the work, which is very necessary to save the buildings already erected from destruction.

These buildings are of adobe, well built, and among the best buildings in Arizona. All building is very costly in that country, and they should be saved, if possible.

The condition of the appropriation for barracks and quarters for the year 1873–'74 does not allow me to recommend that the expenditure for this work, or for Fort Brown, be taken from that appropriation.

M. C. MEIGS,
Quartermaster-General, Brevet Major-General, U. S. A.

[Seventh indorsement.]

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, October 1, 1873.

Respectfully submitted to the Secretary of War.

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Adjutant-General.

[Eighth indorsement.]

OCTOBER 4, 1873.

The Secretary of War concurs with the Quartermaster-General that no expenditure can be made at present, and directs that the matter be brought before Congress at its next session, and appropriations asked for.

H. T. CROSBY,
Chief Clerk.

[Ninth indorsement.]

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., October 8, 1873.

Respectfully returned to the Quartermaster-General, inviting attention to the action of the Secretary of War indorsed hereon.

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Adjutant-General.

[Tenth indorsement.]

QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
February 5, 1874.

Respectfully returned to the honorable Secretary of War, inviting attention to first, sixth, and eighth indorsements. The total cost of the work will probably be not below $40,000.

I renew my recommendation of September 26 last, "that Congress be asked to make appropriation for the work, which is very necessary to save the buildings already erected from destruction," as the funds at the command of this Department will not justify the expenditure.

M. C. MEIGS,
Brevet Major-General, United States Army.

INSPECTOR-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
February 20, 1874.

Respectfully returned to the Secretary of War.

The following is an extract from Inspector-General Sacket's report of May 12, 1873:

"I would respectfully call attention to the river bank in front of this depot. The danger from high water is very great. The different officers of the Quartermaster's Department stationed here for the past five or six years have done all that lay in their power, by the use of fascines, piles, (such as they can get,) rubbish stones, &c., to protect the bank from washing away. Last season the buildings were in great danger, and, in case of very high water this season, may again be placed in jeopardy. I think an appropriation should be asked for, for the special purpose of piling and filling in along the entire front of the depot buildings. The piles should be large and long to reach the solid ground below the quicksand. Unless some action is taken for the protection of the bank, the public buildings and property will always be in danger during the season of freshets. The building occupied by Lieutenant Eskridge was very near being washed in last season during the high water. He had his furniture all packed ready for a move at any moment. The banks disappear very rapidly when they begin to cut away.

"These public buildings at this depot are too valuable and have cost too large an amount of money in their construction to risk their destruction, when a small appropriation would render them perfectly safe."

The foregoing representations of Colonel Sacket seem to render it highly important that the work called for should be executed; and as the available residues of the existing appropriations for barracks and quarters and for transportation are insufficient to meet the expenditure, I very respectfully recommend that a special appropriation be asked for from Congress at an early date, and that the design and execution of the work be intrusted to an engineer officer.

I also recommend that Congress be asked at the same time to appropriate the estimated amount for the protection of the public buildings at Fort Brown, Texas.

R. B. MARCY,
Inspector-General United States Army.

WAR DEPARTMENT, May 28, 1874.

The Secretary of War has the honor to transmit to the House of Representatives, for the information of the Committee on Military Affairs, as requested by the chairman of said committee in letter of the 21st instant, letter of the Quartermaster-General of the Army, dated the 25th instant, showing the number and dimensions of Government buildings at Yuma depot liable to damage from freshets in the Colorado River.

WM. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT, QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., May 25, 1874.

SIR: I have the honor to return the letter of Hon. JOHN COBURN, M. C., chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, House of Representatives, referring to the letter from the Secretary of War in relation to a project for the protection of the banks of the Colorado River at Yuma depot, and calling for information as to the number and value of the Government buildings in danger of destruction, and as to the expediency of removing said buildings to a place of safety.

The buildings at Yuma depot, located on the bank of the river, and subject to be undermined and washed away, are—

Quarters for the officer in charge, 45 by 32 feet; walls 3 feet thick, 14 feet high. Kitchen, detached, 30 by 16 feet; walls 3 feet thick, 12 feet high; roofs shingle, and in good condition.

Store-houses: One building 121 by 103 feet; walls 14 feet high; divided into three rooms; shingle roofs; in good condition.

Corral, 246 by 216 feet.

An engine-house, containing a steam-engine and pump for supply of the depot with water through an elevated stone tank or cistern.

All these buildings are of sun-dried bricks, (adobes,) and to remove them is impossible.

If the walls were demolished and rebuilt, a great part of the material would be destroyed in the process.

Labor, in the intensely hot and dry climate of Yuma, which lies on the bank of the Colorado River, but in the midst of the great Colorado Desert, is very costly; therefore, to abandon these buildings and rebuild farther back from the river bank would be very expensive. The country produces nothing, and food for the laborers and teams employed must be brought from San Francisco.

A description of the depot is to be found in Outline Descriptions of United States Military Posts and Stations, published by the War Department (Quartermaster-General's Office) in 1872.

The post is a most important one, and I recommend that the appropriation to protect the banks of the river be made, as already recommended by the Secretary of War, (Executive Document No. 154, Forty-third Congress, first session.)

These buildings have been erected at intervals during many years. They are in excellent condition, convenient, and suitable for their purposes.

I am not able to report their present value, but it is much greater than the amount asked to protect the site; and the cost of rebuilding them would, in all probability, much exceed the sum estimated for their preservation, besides interrupting work of depot.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

M. C. MEIGS,
Quartermaster-General, Brevet Major-General, United States Army.

The Hon. SECRETARY OF WAR,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I suppose that bill must have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole, as it contains an appropriation?

The SPEAKER. Yes; if the gentleman raises the point of order, it must be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I make the point of order.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

WILLIAM H. CARMEN.

Mr. DONNAN, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4190) for the relief of William H. Carmen, Company E, Thirty-second Illinois Volunteers; which was read a first and second time.

The bill authorizes and directs the Secretary of War to cause to be paid, out of any money theretofore appropriated or that may hereafter be appropriated for the support of the Army, to William H. Carmen, late a private in Company E, Thirty-second Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, the pay of a private soldier from the 24th day of December, 1863, to the 14th day of March, 1865.

Mr. DONNAN. If the House will hear me for a moment I think no objection will be made to this bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I reserve the point of order upon it, and ask that the report be read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the report.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw the call for the reading of the report. I am satisfied that the bill ought to pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DONNAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. Has not the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. The morning hour will only expire when something of higher privilege intervenes.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I move that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the fortification appropriation bill. Pending that motion, I also move that all general debate upon that bill be limited to five minutes.

CHANGE OF REFERENCES.

Mr. GARFIELD. Before the question is taken on the motion of the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. STARKWEATHER,] I desire to report back from the Committee on Appropriations certain bills, and have them referred to other committees.

There being no objection, the Committee on Appropriations were discharged from the further consideration of the following bills; which were referred as indicated:

A bill (H. R. No. 3829) for the relief of Joseph J. Brown, of Augusta, Georgia—to the Committee on War Claims;

A bill (H. R. No. 3848) providing for the erection of a penitentiary in the Territory of Arizona—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4020) appropriating money out of certain revenues in the Territory of Dakota—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

E. D. FRANZ.

Mr. ELKINS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4191) for the relief of E. D. Franz; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

S. K. THOMPSON.

Mr. PHILLIPS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4192) for the relief of S. K. Thompson, late second lieutenant Twenty-fifth United States Infantry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CUSTOMS REVENUE.

Mr. KASSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 134) declaratory of an act to amend custom-revenue laws and to repeal moieties, passed June 22, 1874; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

AFFAIRS IN LOUISIANA.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I send to the desk a resolution upon a subject-matter which I know must be dwelling upon the minds of all, and ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the disturbed and revolutionary condition of affairs in Louisiana threatens the destruction of law, order, and civil rule in that State; and whereas by section 4, article 5, of the Constitution it is made the imperative duty of Congress to guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government; and whereas in the judgment of this House the most practicable mode of rendering this guarantee effectual in the case of Louisiana is to remove all sense of wrong and oppression from the minds of its people by a new, fair, and well-guarded election of their civil officers; Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to prepare and report without delay a bill providing for a new election of State officers and Representatives in Congress in Louisiana, under such guards, restrictions, and guarantees as will insure the fullest liberty to every citizen to exercise the right of suffrage without fear and without restraint, and as will provide for such a count and declaration of the result as will insure to the majority their constitutional and legal rights.

The SPEAKER. That requires unanimous consent.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Before the right to object is parted with, I desire to say that I shall object to the consideration of this resolution in its present form. I have no objection to its being referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, but I do object to a declaration by this House that Congress can order a new election in Louisiana or in any other State.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I introduced this only for the purpose of getting an expression of the sentiment of the House upon this most solemn matter. I do not care particularly where it goes, whether to the Judiciary Committee or the Committee on Louisiana Affairs. But I hope the gentleman will not object to an expression of the sentiment of the House, so that we may at once begin to grapple with this most important matter. All that is asked is that the House shall take a vote upon the proposition contained in this resolution. It is not a new thing with me. I have no doubt that the solution of this matter is in accordance with what is embodied in this resolution. I have believed it for two years, and that conviction has strengthened every day during that time.

Mr. KASSON. I desire to interpose an objection now in order to prevent debate in anticipation of the return of our committee.

Mr. COX. Is debate on this resolution to be general?

The SPEAKER. Debate can proceed only by unanimous consent.

Mr. KASSON. I object to it.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I would suggest to the gentleman from Maine to add to his resolution these words:

And that said committee shall have leave to report at any time.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I believe that is not necessary; the resolution provides that the committee "shall report without delay."

The SPEAKER. That would give the committee the right to report at any time.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I do not object because I think there is nothing to be remedied, not by any means. I do not by any means approve of the course that has been taken in Louisiana for the last two years. But I do object to having this House or any other legislative body of the United States brought at once, without any previous consideration, to a vote on so important a proposition as the right of Congress to order and conduct an election for State officers in any State of the Union.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Let me say——

Mr. ELDREDGE. I hope the gentleman will allow me one word. It seems to me——

Mr. KASSON. I must insist on my objection to debate.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I hope not.

Mr. KASSON. If we undertake to go into this question, we shall precipitate a general debate.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Let me say to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] that there can be no more pressing question for the consideration of Congress than the condition of Louisiana at this time.

Mr. KASSON. It is for that reason I insist upon my objection to debating the question now. I do not desire to precipitate a general debate in advance of the report of the special committee.

Mr. RANDALL. We had better precipitate a debate than precipitate civil war.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Then I give notice that at the first opportunity, on Monday next if not before, I will move to suspend the rules in order to put this resolution on its passage.

Several MEMBERS. That is fair.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I will say further that I do not desire to take this question from the committee that has been appointed to investigate Louisiana affairs if the House should see fit to send it there; but the impotency of any committee getting information down there that shall solve this question is already shown by the fact that the most high-handed proceedings have taken place while the committee has been sitting there.

Mr. RANDALL. Who has been guilty of those high-handed proceedings?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I want the action of the House on this question; and on Monday next I shall seek to obtain such action by a motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. ELDREDGE. The proceedings down there are now being managed by the same individual who lorded it over that people when those States were being reconstructed—the same tyrant. [Cries of "order," and loud rapping of the Speaker's gavel.]

Mr. COX. I raise a point of order. The gentleman from Maine has given notice of a resolution he proposes to offer on next Monday. I give notice of another resolution on the same subject.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I presume there will be a dozen.

Mr. COX. My resolution will comprehend the idea of the withdrawal of military force as a means of settling this matter. I hope the line will be drawn on that.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The substance of my resolution is no new idea with me.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I object to further debate. If I have to run a race with the Speaker's gavel, the other side must do the same.

Mr. NEGLEY. I think that before we settle this question we shall have to send more military force down there.

Mr. RANDALL. You will if you want to defeat the will of the people.

Several members objected to further debate.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. STARKWEATHER] has moved to go into the Committee of the Whole on the fortification bill, pending which he has moved that all general debate on the bill be limited to five minutes.

The question being taken on the motion to limit debate, it was agreed to; there being ayes 102, noes not counted.

The motion to go into Committee of the Whole was then agreed to.

FORTIFICATION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. ELDREDGE in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3823) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I ask that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is a short bill; and I think it had better be read through.

The bill was read.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. As general debate on this bill has been limited to five minutes, I desire merely to state that the amount which the bill appropriates—$850,000—is the smallest amount that has ever been appropriated in a bill of this kind. The annual appropriations for these purposes for about five years preceding last year were in the neighborhood of $1,600,000—nearly double the amount recommended to be appropriated in this bill. Last year the amount recommended by the Committee on Appropriations to be appropriated was substantially the same as in the present bill—a trifle more. The amount originally recommendad this year by the Engineer Department was $2,168,700; but upon a careful revision of the estimates, and on consultation with the board of engineers, we have recommended an aggregate appropriation of $850,000—about one-third the amount originally recommended by the board of engineers, and about one-half the amount appropriated for a number of years preceding last year, when, as I have said, the appropriation for this purpose was a trifle more than that proposed in the present bill. The committee have in every case recommended as small an appropriation as they thought the exigencies of the service would allow. I have nothing further to say in regard to the general merits of the bill.

The Clerk, proceeding to read the bill by clauses for amendment, read the following:

For Fort Wadsworth, Staten Island, New York Harbor, $5,000.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. If I recollect aright, there was no appropriation in the fortification bill last year for this fort. The bill was at that time considered quite carefully with reference to the testimony taken before the Committee on Military Affairs and the Committee on Appropriations as to the value of these fortifications. I had supposed that the policy adopted last year was to be pursued hereafter. In pursuance of that policy it was considered at that time that there were certain fortifications upon which it was not worth while to spend any more money, and so they were dropped out of the appropriation bill. I see, however, that the committee have restored a portion of those fortifications; this is one of them; and we have already passed one or two that have been restored. I am not aware that the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. STARKWEATHER] in his preliminary statement called attention to this point; if he did, his remarks escaped my attention. I would be glad if he would state the reasons of the committee for including in the bill of this year fortifications which were left out last year.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I will state that this appropriation for Fort Wadsworth is made necessary by reason of the experiments in torpedo practice recently set in operation with reference to harbor defense. This appropriation is not for any general work, but simply for the modification of one of the casemates.

The Clerk read as follows:

For Fort Mifflin, Pennsylvania, $25,000.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I move to strike out that item for the purpose of inquiring of the gentleman from Connecticut, who has charge of this fortification bill, whether this is not a new appropriation, as well as the appropriation for Fort McHenry, Baltimore Harbor, $20,000? Why should they be included in the bill this year? They were not, I think, in the bill last year.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Fort Mifflin was not included in the bill last year.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Nor I think was Fort McHenry.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. An appropriation was recommended for each of these works last year, but they were omitted by the committee. Certain contingent appropriation was provided so far as some of these fortifications are concerned, but it has been exhausted. As my colleague on the committee [Mr. O'NEILL] knows, Fort Mifflin is now in a condition requiring more work to be put upon it. The Engineer Department last year as well as this pressed strongly for the continuance of that important work. Last year only those works which were more pressing than others were included. In reference to this as well as other works, the appropriation having been cut off, they have nothing to fall back upon. It is deemed essentially important this appropriation should be obtained for the completion of the work at Fort Mifflin. It is not to lay out any new work, but to complete what has been already begun.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I understood in the course of the discussion last year, upon examination of the testimony then taken, Army officers agreed that, with the exception of perhaps a few points, it was hardly worth while to expend money for fortifications, as it was so easy and so much better on the whole to throw up earth-works. The experience of the last war of the rebellion proved it was better, more readily done, and much more effectual in the end to throw up earth-works, and it was hardly worth while to expend money, $50,000 and $100,000 at a time, year after year, to continue work upon these fortifications. The explanation last year was so entirely satisfactory to the House, I thought the policy was regarded as settled, and there was to be cessation of work in the main on these fortifications. Of course if an appropriation should become necessary, as in the case cited a moment ago for changing a casemate, which really is only a provision for repair of an existing work, it ought to be made. But this item seems to contemplate the continuance of this work—a continuation in other words of this expenditure of money, which has been proved to be practically a useless expenditure. So, Mr. Chairman, I am inclined to insist on my motion to strike out the paragraph and take the sense of the committee on it.

Mr. O'NEILL. I believe, Mr. Chairman, the committee will be content to follow the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations in this bill, especially after the explanation made by my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. STARKWEATHER,] who has charge of this particular appropriation bill. The action of that committee last year and its action this year is in perfect harmony. Last year certain works were omitted upon the suggestion of the Bureau of Engineers and this year certain other works have been omitted. The Committee on Appropriations has recommended going on with some fortifications not appropriated for last year. As we understood in that committee, from the reports submitted to us, the necessity for this appropriation for Fort Mifflin at this time is paramount. We have cut off every unnecessary appropriation everywhere and recommended nothing not essentially necessary, so as to be as economical as possible. The gentleman from Connecticut will state that this appropriation for Fort Mifflin is recommended as absolutely necessary by the Engineer Department. If the gentleman from Vermont will examine the Engineer's report of this year and that of last year and compare them with the appropriation bills for this as well as for last year, he will discover that all the works appropriated for last year have not been included in this bill. Some have been left out of the bill entirely, and others have been much reduced below the amounts asked, although recommendations have been made in their behalf by the engineers, as the Committee on Appropriations still desires to follow out the economical plan heretofore adopted.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I am not complaining of the action of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to strike out the last word. I think, Mr. Chairman, the investigation before the Committee on Military Affairs at the last session of Congress satisfied the House that appropriations made for the continuance of these fortifications are substantially a waste of just that amount of money. Not only that investigation, but experience for many years, if not throughout our whole history, has demonstrated in my judgment the inutility of constructing these expensive works of defense, because when a real emergency has arrived our experience has shown that works have to be constructed for defense at other points than those selected for these expensive fortifications, and then earth-works are thrown up which have been found to be the most efficient. I think all these appropriations should be stricken out and barely a sufficient sum appropriated to preserve the public property as it now stands.

I shall seek the floor to submit at the proper moment a motion to strike out the entire appropriation, and invest the War Department with the power to spend $50,000 during the next fiscal year to preserve, as far as may be necessary, the more important of these public works and the public property connected with them. I believe our experience shows that we have expended millions of dollars from time to time on these works, without any benefit accruing, and without any possibility of benefit accruing to the country from the expenditure.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I oppose the amendment. I wish to say to the gentleman from Indiana that even if he allows nothing but earth-works there is something to be done under this appropriation. Upon this work during the past fiscal year repairs have been made to the mastic covering of the magazines, a sand traverse formed over each, a temporary drain dug, the flooring and door of the north magazine placed, and a door fixed on the south magazine. All that has been done in the last year, and is entirely in harmony with the gentleman's theory about sand-works and earth-works. Nothing more is proposed than to complete what is necessary in order to make available the work already done. But little was done there last year—just enough to keep the work from going to decay; and now this appropriation of $25,000 is proposed to complete and render available what has already been done.

The amount appropriated in this bill is considerably less than one-half what the gentleman from Indiana has voted for year after year until last year. It is less than one-half what was voted in 1836.

But $1,800,000 was voted then in a single year for this purpose. The appropriation in this bill is less than one-half that amount. We have exercised the greatest economy. The engineers have reduced the amounts very largely, and the committee, after consultation with them, have reduced the aggregate to the low figure at which it now stands; and we have not placed in the bill an item which we believed could be omitted with a due regard to economy. To omit this would be to let these works go to waste, and would require more money hereafter to supply their place.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I renew it. I admit that this appropriation for fortifications is one about which I have more doubt than almost any other. I wish, therefore, to state the grounds on which, so far as I am personally concerned, I think we ought to support this bill.

We are the custodians of the general public safety, so far as our frontier is concerned. If at any time there should come a foreign war, a contingency against which no man can feel we are always safe, the Congress of the United States would never be reproached enough if it had totally neglected our frontier defenses. The whole theory of fortifications, from the beginning of the Government until now, has been that we ought to keep a system of defenses at the chief strategic points around our frontier, so that if sudden war comes upon us from any quarter we shall have a resting-place for our feet, something for the heel of the giant to press against when the strain comes. And to say that because there is no immediate prospect of war, and because the money that was appropriated during forty years on fortifications was on a system which is now in the main exploded, and that possibly the very system on which we are now appropriating money will prove to be outworn and out of date in a few years—to use that argument is to say that we ought not to do anything in behalf of fortifications until the imminent danger comes. Now, I to some extent sympathize with the views of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] in regard to this bill, and that sympathy I know is felt by the Committee on Appropriations to this extent, at least, that we have cut down this bill lower than we have cut it down before in any year that I have ever been in Congress. It is lower than it was last year even by about fifty-four or fifty-five thousand dollars.

I wish also to call the attention of the gentleman to another fact which I think ought to be remembered in connection with this bill. We appropriate $230,000, out of a total of $850,000, not for the building of forts, but for preparing a system of torpedoes, which is certainly one of the most effective methods now known for defending the coast, and also for contingencies for fortifications and for surveys, which are constantly necessary that we may know what are the points on the coast requiring defense. Those three items together make $230,000 of this bill, which is considerably more than a quarter of the whole amount appropriated. If we are to do anything at all to keep up our fortified points, I think we have done the least in this bill that is consistent with sound policy, with what has been the policy of this Government since its foundation. Of course every dollar we appropriate here may be uselessly appropriated. I hope and trust it may be. It ought to be our hope that every dollar laid out in fortifications may be forever thrown away—that is, that we may never have need to use it; but we never should get over the reproach that would be justly thrown on this Congress if, in case of a sudden war visiting us, it should be said that we had done nothing to keep alive these methods of defense along our coast.

I had some doubt in my own mind whether we ought not to give about one-half of the money appropriated for the making of guns of heavy caliber so that we might not be always merely fortifying without arming. It perhaps is right to keep our arming pari passu with our building of fortifications; and if that proposition were made to authorize the Secretary of War to use one-half the sum appropriated for the making of guns of heavy caliber fit for mounting on the seacoast defenses, I for one would vote for it. I am disposed to think it would be a wise thing to do; but I do not think any man who looks at the general condition of our works in the past and the general condition of our fortifications now, will think that if we do anything at all we ought to appropriate less than the amount in this bill.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The fact that this bill appropriates a small amount is a gratifying fact of course of itself; but it is no reason why that amount should not be reduced, unless the amount is actually necessary. I suppose the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, would not claim with any seriousness that our coast defenses are of such a nature now or are likely to be of such a nature that we should be thoroughly protected from foreign invasion. I apprehend that for the future we have a better protection than that from foreign invasion. We have protection from it in the fact that the civilization of the race of men to which we belong has got by the point where they settle their international disputes by war; in fact it has been one of the boasts of the republican party that it has through the President and Senate inaugurated that grand and peaceful measure of settling international disputes by arbitration; that we shall have no more need of guns or forts or armies for the purpose of defending the country against foreigners.

We have had use for our military undoubtedly at home. The principal use that has been found for them in the last few years has been at home on the frontier and in the Southern States, but these fortifications are expressly defended, if defended at all, on the ground that they are necessary to protect us against foreign invasion and foreign wars.

Now, sir, it is true enough that this money is spent year after year on these works without any appreciable advantage. It is an expenditure like the expenditure upon many of our public buildings, because those in charge of them see where they can expend ten or fifteen or twenty or thirty thousand dollars during the year and keep up the appearance of work on these fortifications. They are never finished. This appropriation is not for the purpose, as I understand it, at all of simply preserving these works from decay. It is for continuing the work upon these fortifications upon some scale or plan such as has been adopted and which contemplates still further appropriations.

I am therefore, Mr. Chairman, not able to see how these appropriations are to be sustained except upon the general theory that we are to appropriate year after year a certain amount of money anyway, this year to one class of fortifications, next year to another, and so on. It does not seem to me to be a wise policy or a necessary policy for the defense of the country.

Mr. GARFIELD. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I renew it. I think we shall after all be obliged to adopt that proposition which the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WILLARD] thinks unworthy, and that is that a certain sum of money must annually be expended on fortifications. I suggest that and I adopt it. It is inevitable; it is inevitable so long as we have important works incomplete. It is inevitable even if the works upon the whole coast be finished in accordance with the plans of the engineers. I hope my friend from Vermont lives in a house at home worth $50,000.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I do not; I wish I did.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. If he does he cannot get along without a reasonable sum for repairs for his house and grounds every year—for grading, for new nails, and new paint, and a thousand other things with which householders are familiar. And so it is with a system of fortifications which has cost $10,000,000: a considerable sum is needed annually to keep it in order. So much for the general proposition. I hold that the appropriation of a considerable sum every year is inevitable.

But the gentleman says that these works are not of such a character as to be a thorough protection. Why, sir, there is no fortification known to the ingenuity of man that is a thorough protection. It is an established axiom that nothing can be made that cannot be destroyed. There is not a Gibralter, and never will be one, that cannot be taken by an engineer if he is given money and time enough. But the question is how much for protection does each one of these works need. There is too much of a disposition to exaggerate the weakness of these fortifications and the extreme power of iron-clads and of heavy guns.

I know that there is no one of these fortifications that cannot be destroyed; I have seen some of them destroyed. Nevertheless they will for a long time check the efforts of the most skillful engineers and the most powerful artillery. Fort Pulaski is by no means the most powerful of our works. It is built of brick, with walls six feet in thickness. But in the late war the Federal Army set down before that place for three or four months preparing its batteries before it was ready to open fire upon Pulaski. During that time there was not a gun-boat in the Federal Navy that was ready to go up the river to Savannah until Fort Pulaski was reduced. Yet after our preparations had been completed we knocked Pulaski down so in thirty-one hours that they were compelled to surrender. But it took us two or three months to get ready to do it. Fort Pulaski then retarded the capture of Savannah for three or four months. It was very valuable to the defense of that place.

So in regard to Sumter and the other forts in Charleston Harbor. Sumter was supposed to be of no particular consequence to those defending the harbor of Charleston, yet that place was not taken until Sherman cut off the approaches in the rear. Yet these works are of the very class which the gentleman sneers at. Sumter was not one of our most important works, but practically it was reduced to a great sand heap before we were done with it; it was made practically an earth-work.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. And stronger then than it was before.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. That may be very true. But what headway would the people of Charleston have made in throwing up earth-works upon that little place? I am not sure there was any land there before Sumter was built; if any, it was only a little sand-spit. Five or six feet extra of tide will sweep over the whole of Cockspur Island. It was necessary, therefore, to carry something to Cockspur Island of which to build a fort.

The gentleman says that it is well enough to build earth-works. Gentlemen object just as much to the experiments with heavy guns. They say that we have not the best kind of heavy guns, and would let other nations experiment upon them to determine which are the best. But if we wait for their experiments the time of war may come upon us, when we would have to get ready, and it would take many months to cast the guns which we would need. So it would to carry sand upon Cockspur Island to build an earth-work there. The course recommended by these gentlemen is an invitation to other nations to make war upon us upon short provocation. If history means anything, it is that it is the part of wisdom in time of peace to prepare for war. I rejoice in peace just as much as the gentleman does. But I must recollect that when all Europe was congratulating itself upon the time of peace, upon the millennium that was reigning there, like lightning from a clear sky the German-French war was precipitated, with the cost of thousands of lives and millions of treasure. If history is good for anything, there is no use in counting at any time upon six weeks of peace. There are men now who want Spain and the United States to go to war. I do not; I hope they will not. But I can imagine circumstances that would bring on a bloody fight in two weeks' time. And I tell you that the navy of Spain is better to-day than is ours. And, if you go on as you have done for years and years, I believe her navy can whip ours to-day.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. They cannot.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I do not say that her men can whip our men. Our men can whip any other men on the globe. But one man is good for nothing against ten or fifteen inches of iron. Brag will not do there. But no matter about that; you are not in a state of preparation either in coastwise defense or in other respects. By the course we have been pursuing, although we may defy them to come into our country, within our borders, on general principles, yet our sea-coast cities are not in a condition to resist a sudden attack on the part of an enemy,

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOLMAN. The difficulty in approaching any question of public expenditures seems to be this: That the argument on all the line of expenditures is founded upon what is claimed to be necessity. Any proposition intended to resist the tendency of extravagance in a government like ours always seems to be objectionable. We have had for three-quarters of a century experience upon the subject we are now considering.

We are all aware that the prestige and martial character of any great national power is a greater guarantee of safety than any fortification that can be erected. We are aware that the progress of civilization in our age renders it practically impossible that war should be precipitated upon us in an hour. The work of diplomacy always precedes the deadly conflict of arms. Judging from the events of the last half century, we can rely with absolute confidence—that kind of confidence upon which men responsible for the safety of a nation may well act—that months of negotiation would precede an appeal to arms. We have learned from the experience of Europe in the Crimean struggle that the whole maritime power of Europe can move but a small army comparatively from one portion of the world to another. On the west we are absolutely protected against anything like an invasion. Upon our eastern shore we have the intervention of thousands of miles of ocean. Three quarters of a century have demonstrated the absolute absence of value in the works of fortification which we are erecting from year to year at heavy expense. Foreign warfare has demonstrated the absence of necessity for these expenditures. In our own recent war, even wooden ships passed with entire safety between the fortifications raised at the mouth of the Mississippi River—two of the strongest fortifications erected by this Government, and erected at the heaviest expense. If even wooden vessels passed with safety between those fortifications, much more readily could this be done by the iron vessels which modern warfare has brought into play.

No, sir; every consideration which should determine a question of this kind shows the absence of any such danger as has been referred to—the danger that by failure to "prepare for war in time of peace" a fearful responsibility may fall upon Congress. There is no such responsibility. We are absolutely secure against an invasion of our territory, not only on account of our geographical position, but by reason of the martial spirit of our people, which of itself is a fortification stronger and more effective than all the fortifications that could be erected.

The nations contiguous to us on the south have no fortifications. The Rio Grande does not bristle with fortified works of defense; nor does the northern coast of this continent. All that can be said is that these fortifications may be needed to protect us against an armed force that may be thrown upon our borders from countries three thousand miles away after diplomacy has exhausted its resources. But, sir, the martial spirit of forty million people already experienced in war is an absolute guarantee that we shall be able to command the respect of the nations of the earth.

The torpedo system, for which this bill appropriates $125,000, is, as the gentleman from Connecticut knows, the only defense that can be relied on for the protection of our harbors. The torpedo system is the great protection in modern warfare against the invasion of a naval power. Hence I say let that appropriation of $125,000 stand; let the appropriation of $75,000 for contingencies stand, if the gentleman insists upon it; let the appropriation of $30,000 for the surveys of our coasts for military defenses be retained, and then if we appropriate the additional sum of $50,000 to be applied to protecting these works and the property of the Government in connection with them, making the entire appropriation $280,000, we shall have accomplished fully what even the most apprehensive gentleman can demand as necessary to defend this nation in any possible contingency.

Several members addressed the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio, or rather the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] but formerly from Ohio.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, on this bill I prefer to come from New York, as the bill especially concerns fortifications on the sea-board. Perhaps the Chair is aware that Ohio, like Wisconsin, is situated inland; and—

> Though inland far you be,
> Your soul has sight of that eternal sea.

I hope the Chairman will have a good voyage! But, sir, the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. WILLARD,] who is also inland, has given us beautiful prospects of the millennium. He is an optimist. I love to hear him talk. He thinks that all these expenditures for fortifications are unnecessary. Why? Because the arbitration system inaugurated by the President ought to relieve us from such large expenditures.

Now, I believe in giving credit where credit is due; and the Committee on Appropriations deserve credit on this bill, because last year they reduced these appropriations $1,000,000, and this year they have cut down the appropriations of last year to the extent of $54,000. Hence they are entitled to credit for this, if for nothing else.

Now, the gentleman from Vermont undertook to tell us that wars would cease, had ceased, or at least were infrequent; that the progress of civilization would thus render such fortifications and their cost unnecessary. Where did the gentleman read his history? There never were such wars as during the last quarter of a century. First we had the Crimean war between three great powers; then the Italian war between the French and Italians and Austrians; then the Prussian and Austrian war; then the great French and Prussian war; and then our own great war, which destroyed $7,000,000,000 worth of values and a million of lives. Why does the gentleman thus ignore all history? Have wars ceased because of the progress of civilization led by this wonderful and peaceful Administration? He says we shall not need troops or fortifications, because we never make wars now-a-days in this land except on our own people! What irony is this! What a commentary on the past ten years or five days! For several years, he said, the Army had only been used at home. He might have said that within the last few days it has been abused at home.

But I do not propose to argue the Louisiana question now. Of course he did not mean that the Army has been used to carry elections. O, no. Nor to destroy States, nor to strike down personal and public liberty. O, no.

Mr. NEGLEY. And put down rebellion.

Mr. COX. And to claim before the whole nation, as one of your generals does this morning in a dispatch which is no doubt a "lie of the Associated Press," that a whole State is made up of banditti, to be tried by such gentlemen as the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. NEGLEY,] sitting as a drum-head court-martial. What a picture is this of the progress of civism and order!

And you call such dispatches a refinement of civilization! You call that progress! You call it answering me, like the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. NEGLEY,] by sitting in your seat and grumbling. Why not rise and defend such outrages! Who dares to do it?

Mr. Chairman, never was there such a fiasco as the arbitration system of this Administration commended by my friend from Vermont. You settled the Spanish question, you settled the Virginius question, did you? Why, it is not settled yet. You are following like a little jolly-boat behind the British steamer on that question. What have you done to enlarge the domain of arbitration—of civilization? We always had more or less of claims commissions, of treaties of peace, of accommodation and comity between nations for a century past; but it was reserved for this nation to hold up the white banner of all the nations of the earth, and then make war upon our own people while in profound peace.

But, sir, I did not mean to be drawn into the Louisiana matter until next Monday. All I have to say is these expenditures as to fortifications are still necessary. As my friend from Indiana has said, most of the protection of our harbors will be through the torpedo system. All our fighting hereafter will be submarine. Torpedoes will best protect our harbors; because, as was demonstrated last year, there is scarcely an English man-of-war which cannot cross the channel at New York as well as other channels of our harbors, blow the city up, and destroy it utterly if they choose, were it not for the fact that recent investigations, improvements, and experiments in torpedoes have demonstrated we can thus, if in any way, protect our coast cities. I therefore am glad $125,000 is fixed in this bill for that specified object, which will protect us when we are not protected otherwise.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I hope we will now have a vote.

Mr. COX. I think I have satisfied everybody. Yes, let us vote.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not wish to continue this general discussion except to make one suggestion which I think ought to be in the minds of gentlemen when they are discussing the Army or Navy or any bill which relates to our military arm. I have been greatly surprised lately, in reflecting on the mass of our public debt that nobody, either in the newspaper press, so far as I know, nor any statistician who is studying political questions, has ever undertaken to figure out how large a part of all the tremendous cost of our war was due to the ignorance with which we entered upon that great struggle. I have had occasion lately to study that with a view to make something of an approximate estimate. And the problem rose in great proportions in my mind as I studied it. For instance, we entered upon a war which, with the most careful and economical management, was of stupendous cost, and we entered upon it knowing almost nothing as a people about the methods of managing a war. The whole vast detail of quartermaster and commissary expenses, the details of making guns and all the accouterments of war were something that had to be learned and experimented upon. It was worse than the crudest possible forms of ordinary experiment in the common business of life. I recollect the story of a great oculist, who, when asked how he learned so great skill in manipulating and managing the human eye, said he had to spoil several hatfuls of eyes before he was acquainted with the business so he could trust himself to operate on an eye with success. Now we had to spoil not merely a million, but hundreds of millions of treasure and a vast number of lives by the sheer ignorance of our people in reference to all military matters. The simple form of knowledge of military accounts brought into the latter days of the war was unknown when we began it. There was waste, far more from ignorance than from a lack of honesty, in the early part of the war; and any man who will go through the old appropriation bills, which appropriated in vast lumps, when we appropriated one or two hundred million dollars in a lump—and then see the orders for transportation and the various methods of paying out money, all of which found their ultimate expression in our bonded debt, but will see I cannot be very far wrong when I express my deliberate belief that 40 per cent. of the vast cost of our war may be set down to the result of the ignorance of the American people about the methods of transacting the great business of such a war. I believe if there had been kept alive in active and ready preparation the knowledge of the methods of war and the methods of keeping accounts for carrying on the various functions of war, we could have saved over 40 per cent. of the expense.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I hope we will have a vote now.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I desire to say just a single word.

Mr. COX. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I rise to say that the remarks of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] who refers no doubt to the democracy who are soon to come into power, makes me inclined to think that we should be prepared for a more belligerent condition of affairs. I therefore withdraw my amendment.

Mr. COX. Will the Chair allow me to say, in response to the gentleman from Vermont——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York offer an amendment?

Mr. COX. Yes, three or four of them.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. COX. I renew the amendment to strike out the last word, in order to say one word in reply to the gentleman from Vermont. I always notice that he keeps a safe distance from anything like belligerency, either as to Cuba or otherwise. I mean the gentleman's State, not the gentleman himself. It was so remote that I believe it did not come into the Union until after the Constitution was made.

Mr. GARFIELD. The Saint Albans raid, for which a bill was introduced making an appropriation to-day, was in Vermont.

Mr. COX. No doubt the gentleman will get every appropriation he can for his district. Most of us do that. But one remark of the gentleman had significance, although it appeared as if he was treating this matter in a frivolous way. Perhaps he does not know that the people of this country were never before so aroused and earnest about the condition of things in several of the States South. Perhaps he does not know that the people of this country spoke something about that condition in the last election. It is a part of the inner thought of that revolution. Perhaps he or his party would like to vote a little more in the shape of arms or fortifications, not for the purpose of preserving the Union and conserving public or personal liberty, but for the purpose of striking down those rights. But I warn gentlemen on the other side, and particularly my late lamented friends who became defunct last fall, that when they cheer certain spiteful sentiments on this floor, as they did yesterday, when they exult over the destruction of State rights and State Legislatures, they are giving cheers not exactly in accordance with public sentiment, and not so cheerful to the common weal.

Moreover, I will say to the gentlemen that if there ever was anything that shook and shocked the public sense, it was the unprecedented order, promulgated by General Sheridan, published this morning. It outraged every sentiment of parliamentary decorum and privilege. No insolent Tudor or Stuart did more or worse. It scorns every regard for public law or public organisms of any kind. It is a satire on public order and safety. The people of this country will not be patient or forbearing toward those who thus use force for such iniquitous purposes. The people of Louisiana have been forbearing. God knows they are still patient. They are warned to be so by the terrible predicament in which they are placed; they are warned by their friends here to continue to be so; and while they fight with suffrage and moral forces against thieves, while they fight despotism with the spirit of freemen, they do not, they have not, they will not raise their hand against our flag. What need, therefore, for the remark of the gentleman from Vermont, that he will vote more money for the purpose of crushing States? I believe that is what he meant by his remark. If he did not mean that, what did he mean? I ask the question, for he is generally so just.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I oppose the amendment.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] does me a great injustice, and really owes me an apology. I have had some knowledge of that gentleman during the short time I have served in Congress, and I have had occasion to know that in our foreign relations he was full of belligerent spirit. I do not say an improper belligerent spirit. I do not say that it was anything out of character that he should be so. But he has been ready at any time, so far as I have been able to judge, to precipitate this country into a war with Spain for the acquisition of Cuba. It was wholly—so far as it might be thought I had any malicious purpose, but I had no malicious purpose—it was wholly in reference to the attitude of that gentleman in respect to our foreign relations that I made the suggestion that possibly we might require coast defenses after the democratic party came into power more than we require now.

Now, sir, let me say further that, whatever the gentleman may choose to say as to the general position of the republican party in this House in respect to southern affairs, he has no right to direct remarks of that character to me. He knows, and every gentleman in this House who cares anything about it knows, that I have stood as firmly here as I have had ability to stand, at all times, for the rights of American citizens—at home certainly—whether they were white or whether they were black. I deprecate as far as any gentleman, no matter what may be his politics, can deprecate, any Federal interference that places in jeopardy the rights of American citizens anywhere. I do not recognize American citizenship as a question of color, but I consider that when a black man is shot down for expressing a political opinion, it is just as much an outrage upon the American flag, and just as loudly calls for redress at the hands of the American Government as when a white man is shot for expressing a political opinion, or is moved away in an attempt to control a legislature. The right does not depend in the smallest degree upon any other question than the question of citizenship, and one citizen is as good as another citizen.

Now, sir, it has not been my custom to rise here and complain whether a black citizen or a white citizen was put in jeopardy or in peril; but it has been my practice, wherever I had occasion to vote or have been called upon to say anything on that question, to say that I believe in equal rights. And I do not care to have the Army strengthened because the democracy are coming into power; I do not care to have our forts strengthened because of any apprehension of a change of administration; for the people of this country are able to take care of themselves without a standing army; they are able to preserve their liberties against all comers without any standing army for their defense. And the republican party will not ask, Mr. Chairman, that the Army be strengthened for the purpose of defending themselves against any anticipated usurpation or tyranny on the part of the democrats if they are so lucky as to get into power.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman from Vermont approve of the conduct of the Army in Louisiana and of the bulletin issued by General Sheridan?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I had the honor to say this morning that I did not approve of the course taken in Louisiana for the past two years, and I am willing that that remark shall cover the last two days.

Mr. COX. Then I make an ample apology to you, and I have to say about Cuba that where you represent my position as in favor of the independence of Cuba and the recognition of belligerent rights, it does not follow that we must make war; that is a non sequitur.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. If we can have discussion of the bill, I hope we shall have it; but for an hour past the discussion has been entirely of a political nature.

Mr. COX. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. BECK. I renew the amendment for the purpose of saying a word. I will not take long. A good deal has been said about civil liberty and human rights. I desire in view of those remarks to read the following dispatch:

HEADQUARTERS MILITARY DIVISION MISSOURI,
New Orleans, Louisiana, January 5, 1875.

Hon. W. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.:

I think the terrorism now existing in Louisiana, Mississippi, and Arkansas could be entirely removed and confidence and fair dealing established by the arrest and trial of the ringleaders of the armed white leagues. If Congress would pass a bill declaring them banditti they could be tried by military commission. This banditti, who murdered men here on the 14th of last September, and also more recently at Vicksburgh, Mississippi, should, in justice to law and order and peace and prosperity of this southern part of the country, be punished. It is possible that if the President would issue a proclamation declaring them banditti no further action need be taken except that which would devolve upon me.

P. H. SHERIDAN,
Lieutenant-General United States Army.

The city is very quiet to-day. No unusual demonstrations in any quarter. The military still occupy the State-house.

In this connection I want to call attention, in the face of that dispatch, to what the Supreme Court, in 4 Wallace, page 124, decided:

It is claimed that martial law covers with its broad mantle the proceedings of this military commission. The proposition is this: that in the time of war the commander of an armed force (if in his opinion the exigencies of the country demand it, and of which he is to judge) has the power, within the lines of his military district, to suspend all civil rights and their remedies, and subject citizens as well as soldiers to the rule of his will; and in the exercise of his lawful authority cannot be restrained, except by his superior officer or the President of the United States.

If this position is sound to the extent claimed, then when war exists, foreign or domestic, and the country is subdivided into military departments for mere convenience, the commander of one of them can, if he chooses, within his limits, on the plea of necessity, with the approval of the Executive, substitute military force for and to the exclusion of the laws, and punish all persons, as he thinks right and proper, without fixed or certain rules.

The statement of this proposition shows its importance; for, if true, republican government is a failure, and there is an end of liberty regulated by law. Martial law, established on such a basis, destroys every guarantee of the Constitution, and effectually renders the "military independent of and superior to the civil power;" the attempt to do which by the King of Great Britain was deemed by our fathers such an offense that they assigned it to the world as one of the causes which impelled them to declare their independence. Civil liberty and this kind of martial law cannot endure together; the antagonism is irreconcilable, and in the conflict one or the other must perish.

I have called attention to the law of the land, as decided by the Supreme Court of the country, in view of this proclamation or telegram to the Secretary of War by the commanding general in Louisiana, demanding that these people shall be treated as banditti and turned over to him to be tried by military commission or to be treated as he may think fit, and I do it for the purpose of saying to Congress and the country that the President of the United States will come short of his duty if, in view of such a dispatch, he does not remove that commander and put a man there who has some regard to the rights of the people.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I believe there is no amendment pending.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending, and the gentleman can oppose it.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I ask for a vote. We have had no talking on the bill for some time, and I want a vote.

Mr. TREMAIN. I rise to oppose the amendment.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I give notice that hereafter I shall oppose the withdrawal of any amendment the object of which is to keep up this political discussion.

Mr. TREMAIN. The amendment can be renewed in another form. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment is already pending.

Mr. TREMAIN. Mr. Chairman, I have observed during my short experience in this House that the discussion of an appropriation bill seems to be like a sort of safety-valve, to allow gentlemen of the opposition to discharge surplus steam, and thus probably save themselves from an explosion. Now, I do not know that I ought to complain of the practice that seems to have been resorted to here on the part of the opposition of taking occasion in the discussion of every appropriation bill to attack the Administration and everybody connected with it, because I have observed that it amounts to nothing; in all the harangues and all the complaints and the groaning and howling I have heard here, I have not discovered that a single dollar has been stricken out of an appropriation bill or an amendment of any kind carried; indeed, it does not seem to be desired that such a result should be attained. It allows gentlemen to select their own point of attack. It allows them, too, without reports and without testimony, to present their own statement of the case. It allows them to build up a man of straw in order to show with what facility they can knock it down. They are not under the necessity of confining themselves to any issue, to any report, to any facts. Consequently they have the broadest latitude, and we see how liberally they have availed themselves of it.

They have another advantage. If they have brilliant imaginations, they can draw upon their imaginations for their facts. If they are men of genius, as they are, if they are men of invention, and they are rich in that quality, all they have to do is from their imagination to build up a state of facts and then show how adroitly they can knock down what they have built up. They may take as evidence the reports that come up to us from an associated press under the control of Ku-Klux in the form of white-leaguers; they may take testimony coming from men covered all over with crime, and say they will act upon that.

And then, when an officer of the United States, who is now on the spot, educated in the Army, and bound by all the traditions of his profession to adhere to the truth, sends, as he did yesterday, a communication like this—

NEW ORLEANS, January 4, 1875.

Hon. W. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.:

It is with deep regret that I have to announce to you the existence in this State of a spirit of defiance to all lawful authority, and an insecurity of life which is hardly realized by the General Government or country at large. The lives of citizens have become so jeopardized that unless something is done to give protection to the people, all security usually afforded by law will be overridden. Defiance to laws and murder of individuals seem to be looked upon by the community here from a stand-point which gives impunity to all who choose to indulge in either, and the civil government appears powerless to punish or even arrest. I have to-night assumed control of the Department of the Gulf.

P. H. SHERIDAN,
Lieutenant-General.

Dispatches of this character are hooted down as of no consequence. Reports that hundreds and thousands of men have been murdered in cold blood simply because they chose to exercise the rights that belong to them as freemen are whistled down the wind. Unquestioned facts are before the country and the world showing that hundreds, yes, thousands of men have been ruthlessly slaughtered in cold blood because they dared to have political opinions, and no man in the South has been brought to punishment for it. All that evidence goes for naught. And why? Because the testimony of Ku-Klux men, the testimony of white-leaguers, the testimony of rebels in disguise is that all this is false.

Mr. DURHAM. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. TREMAIN. I have no time. The gentleman can take time after I am through. All I ask is time, and I will answer any question. My colleague [Mr. COX] speaks of the republican party as a dying party.

Mr. DURHAM. I propose to ask the gentleman a legal question.

Mr. TREMAIN. If I can have the time I will yield to any interruption and answer any question.

Many MEMBERS. Take the time.

Mr. TREMAIN. Very good; I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DURHAM. I want to ask the gentleman, who is a distinguished lawyer, whether he indorses the telegram of General Sheridan which my colleague [Mr. BECK] read here?

Mr. TREMAIN. That question is wholly impertinent. But if I can have time I will tell what I think about that. But I was speaking of what was said by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.] He says that these movements on our side are the throes of a dying party. And I think he said during the debate upon the finance bill that that was the groan of a dying party. My colleague [Mr. COX] knows how it is himself. A party can be dying for fourteen years and yet exhibit some considerable signs of life, when the occasion calls for it. It may be that the republican party is a dying party. If it is prepared now, because of one single unfortunate campaign during a brilliant career of fourteen years, to go back upon those great principles to which it stands pledged before the country; if the republican party refuses to learn from the precedents set for it of pluck and resolution by the democratic party of this country; if the republican party are ready to say that by reason of one single disastrous campaign during fourteen years they are ready to abandon the great principle that every man within the jurisdiction of the United States, be he black or white, shall be protected in the enjoyment and expression of his constitutional rights, including the right of the elective franchise, then indeed is it a dying party.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BECK. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I object to the withdrawal.

Mr. DURHAM. I want to give the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] an opportunity to answer my question; and if the Chair will give me the floor for five minutes, I will yield the whole of the time for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the amendment, and the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. ARCHER. I move to amend the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN What amendment does the gentleman propose?

Mr. ARCHER. I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not in order. An amendment to an amendment is already pending.

Mr. MYERS. I understood when the gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] was interrupted by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DURHAM] that there was a distinct understanding that further time would be allowed him.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has had nearly ten minutes already.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I think this side ought to have two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will determine that question.

Mr. RANDALL. I should like to have about two minutes in reply to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TREMAIN.]

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. BECK to strike out the last word, it was not agreed to.

Mr. ARCHER. I move to amend by striking out the two last words.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] has seen fit to lecture this side of the House. We might well return the lecture to the republican party, of which my friend is an honorable member. Sir, it is an undeniable and undisguised fact that fraud, corruption, tyranny, and misrule have existed in Louisiana, and this with the republican party holding control of every branch of the Government. For all the long years since the termination of the war, the republican party has controlled the various departments of the Government; yet no peace, no good government has come to the oppressed people of Louisiana. Whose fault? Does the fault rest with the democratic party? No, sir; the fault lies with those who have had the power. The people of Louisiana have cried for peace and good government; they have been willing to accept a government of almost any form which the Congress of the United States or the President would give them. But, sir, this has been refused. Although the President himself more than a year ago called upon this Congress to enact some law upon this question, yet no action has been taken by Congress to give peace and quiet to that people. They cry aloud for it, and they are willing, I venture to assert, to have that peace under either republican or democratic rule; but the only government you have given them is the government of the bayonet, and that most miserably administered.

Mr. DURHAM. I rise to oppose the amendment. Mr. Chairman

I should not have said a word upon this question but for the extraordinary exhortation of the distinguished gentleman from New York, [Mr. TREMAIN.] I certainly do not desire by any means to treat this question in a partisan light. But my colleague [Mr. BECK] announced a simple legal proposition. He read a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, and threw out the suggestion that as General Sheridan had outraged law and propriety, it was the bounden duty of the President to remove him. I understood the Representative from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] to justify everything that the Administration has done, either in person or through General Sheridan, who is now there in command. The simple inquiry which I put to the distinguished gentleman from New York, and which I now repeat, was, does he, as a legal gentleman, indorse the telegram issued and published by General Sheridan. I yield to him the remainder of my five minutes that he may answer this question.

Mr. TREMAIN. I say to the gentleman that if the question comes to be whether unoffending and peaceable white and black men are to be cut down without the forms of law or whether officers of the Army of the United States shall use their power to cut down their murderers, I justify the Army of the United States. But, sir, the question, as I have said before, is impertinent.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DURHAM. I did not yield to the gentleman to deliver a lecture. I put to him a categorical question—does he indorse that telegram? And I do not intend that he shall dodge that question.

Mr. TREMAIN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the amendment is exhausted.

Mr. ARCHER. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I object to its withdrawal.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. ARCHER, to strike out the two last words, it was not agreed to.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. If we can have five minutes more of this discussion on each side and then go on with business, I shall be satisfied. I hope that may be agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to amend by striking out the last three words. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. TREMAIN,] who has just taken his seat, has read a telegram received here yesterday from General Sheridan, and he has alluded to that officer in words of high praise, characterizing him as possessing, as one of the qualities of a good soldier, truthfulness. Now, I assert that this officer has forgotten the first duty of a man and a soldier; he has forgotten his love of truth. Not one word of fact accompaning this telegram of yesterday justifies its assertions; and I am glad to see here to-day that when this military despot attempts to advise that Congress shall by law authorize him to execute his whim and caprice in that sovereign State, and when he tells us that if we fail to do this all he needs is the proclamation of the President of the United States, under which he will finish the matter by trying these citizens—white citizens they may be—by drum-head court-martial. I am glad to see that no Representative of the people here to-day has courage to justify or approve such a proposition. As the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] has suggested, if the President of the United States wants to clear his skirts of such a man, he has but one way to do it; and that is to remove him from the trust he is abusing.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I rise to oppose the amendment. I wish to suggest to the House that an officer of the Army should not in my judgment be removed until he does something that is illegal or unpatriotic, and that if we were to adopt the principle that every man who gives bad advice is to be removed from his place, I am afraid we should clear this House of the democratic party.

Mr. TREMAIN. I rise to oppose the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the pending amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. TREMAIN. I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, the question put to me by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DURHAM] simply is a carrying out of the most extraordinary position assumed by the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber, which is that men are to be punished for opinion's sake. No verdict is necessary, for if they dare to think as others do not think they are to be sacrificed. White men are ruthlessly slaughtered by a band of bandits who seem to make murder a part of the political institutions of the day, and they are to be sheltered and not a word of condemnation is to be uttered against them. Where have you heard one single word of complaint from gentlemen on the other side, who are assailing the Administration and the officers of the Administration in regard to those unjustifiable assassinations, murders, and crimes with which the escutcheons of the Southern States have been so shamefully disgraced?

The gentleman says there is no authority for the telegram which came up yesterday. Is there any dispute about the fact that a returning board, clothed with full power to give prima facie evidence of election, had given certificates of election, and in advance of those certificates an armed body of men took possession of the State-house, and by force resolved there should be no fair trial of the merits of these contesting claims, but they should become prima facie clothed with all power? Is there any dispute about the fact that the State of Louisiana has been engaged for years in a revolutionary attempt on the part of a minority to obtain possession of power by force?

The gentleman says that in certain cities there is peace. Yes, there is peace wherever the democracy have power, but where the democracy have not power there is no peace. And what is the reason for it? Because they are determined to overcome all fair and possible expression of the will of the people, in the forms prescribed by law, by armed force and by violence; and if the officers of the Army or the President of the United States thinks proper to put forth the power of the Government to protect and defend peaceable and unoffending citizens they are to be assailed, while not one word of complaint is uttered here against the men who have rendered this intervention necessary.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman from New York permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. TREMAIN. I have not the time, but will not object if it is not taken out of my five minutes.

Mr. RANDALL. So far as I am concerned, I will give you part of my time for answering you.

Mr. TREMAIN. Mr. Chairman, I was about to answer my colleague from New York, [Mr. COX,] but was interrupted, when he said this party is dying. I had proceeded so far as to say if the republican party was now prepared to abandon the black man of the South, prepared to go back upon its pledges and upon its platform, prepared to destroy its reputation for consistency and integrity——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. NIBLACK. What is the state of the question?

Mr. RANDALL. I should like to ask the gentleman from New York a question.

Mr. NIBLACK. I rise, Mr. Chairman, to oppose the amendment. The gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] will persist in wandering away from the real question in this case. I know it is interesting to discuss the birth, growth, and death of political parties, but that was not the question addressed to him by the gentleman from Kentucky. The question was whether in the State of Louisiana the alleged lawlessness does exist. That crimes are committed there everybody knows, and we upon this side of the House are just as conscious of that fact as the gentleman from New York or anybody else on the other side. The question, however, is whether that lawlessness, if it does exist, shall be punished under civil or military law; whether proceedings shall take their usual course in the civil courts of the country, or punishment shall be meted out by martial law.

General Sheridan, now in command of the district of Louisiana, has sent a telegram, to which allusion has been made, asking that martial law shall be proclaimed, and the people of Louisiana turned over to be tried by him under the authority conferred upon him, as he claims he has the right to exercise it under martial law, as these men are, as he claims, banditti and therefore out of the pale of civil law. Now the gentleman from New York could have told us, if he saw proper and desired to be candid, as to whether he is in favor of punishing these people by martial or civil law; and whether if he is in favor of punishing them by martial law, how then we shall get rid of the State government of Louisiana. How shall we get rid of that responsibility which devolves upon the courts of the State of Louisiana first, and on the courts of the United States next, which have to enforce the law if the courts of Louisiana fail in their duty in this respect? How shall we get quit of that constitutional provision that these people shall be punished under indictment preferred under well-recognized forms of law, which is found in the Constitution not only of the United States but of every State in the Union of which I know anything? It is all very well to talk about free speech——

Mr. TREMAIN. Does the gentleman desire me to answer his question?

Mr. NIBLACK. Yes, sir; I should like the gentleman to say whether he is in favor of civil law or of martial law.

Mr. TREMAIN. I am entirely in favor of enforcing the civil law when the civil law can be enforced. But if murder after murder is committed and State courts refuse to interfere, then I am in favor of declaring martial law, and would bring the whole power of this Government to bear in order that peace and order may be preserved.

Mr. NIBLACK. We have in Louisiana a State government in harmony with the Administration, in harmony with the party which has power in the United States; and if the General Government, assisting Governor Kellogg who is recognized by it as governor of the State of Louisiana, cannot maintain peace and order by civil law, it is not a republican government that prevails in the State of Louisiana. That is my answer to the practical question now before the House.

Mr. TREMAIN. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I renew it.

Mr. Chairman, I would not have uttered a word on this occasion but for the wholesale and unjust accusation of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] that crime and murder were committed in the South and that the courts and governments there were found inadequate or unwilling to punish the offenders. Sir, I cannot permit such charges to be made, so unjust, so untrue, without a flat denial of them.

Pardon the digression when I state that I think party politics ought not to be introduced when the important questions involved in the orders of General Sheridan are being discussed. Those questions rise above party and strike at the very foundation of constitutional government and civil liberty. They raise the question whether this is a government of prescribed limits, whose powers are clearly defined by organic law, a government republican in fact as well as in form, or whether it is but a military despotism in which the Legislatures of the States are to be made and unmade by a military commander at his will and pleasure, and the lives of the people to be intrusted to his keeping and by him to be tried and executed without the forms of law or trial by jury. Yet, as the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TREMAIN,] instead of dealing with the great legal principles involved, goes out of his way to inject a stump speech into the discussion, I will be pardoned for saying a word in reply.

I want the country and this House, especially the gentlemen on the other side, to know that law, order, and good government prevail in every State South where the conservative or democratic party has control, and that there has been no material disturbance or any crime committed there which was not promptly punished by the courts of the country. There freedom of speech, of franchise, of every right guaranteed by the Constitution, is enjoyed to the fullest extent by all classes and colors, without exception, with none to complain, because there is no cause for complaint. Look at old Virginia, snatched from the hands of carpet-baggers just as they had begun to suck the last drop of blood, and see how good order and good government prevail there. See, too, Tennessee, North Carolina, Georgia, and Texas, where the conservative party have control, how in peace they progress.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentlemen on the other side to look to Mississippi, Arkansas, and Louisiana, where these disturbances do exist, and see who has control of the governments of those States, and it will be seen, sir, they are all under the control of republicans or carpet-baggers. Look to Louisiana. Where began your troubles there? Between two Illinois carpet-baggers, Warmoth and Kellogg, who went to promote their own interest and not to protect the people, who went to enrich their pockets at the expense of the State. Like thieves falling out about the plunder, they fall out about their power in the State, raise a disturbance which is kept up for two or more years, and then, when the people in the majesty of their strength rise above them all, and by popular will in legal form take control of the legislative branch of the government, the military, with the usurper's sword, deprives the people of their just representation, and again hands the government over to those who have despoiled it. Of this the people complain, and for this they are to be declared bandits and to be shot down as outlaws and highwaymen.

How with Mississippi? That State is in the hands of the republicans, from the sheriff who collects the people's money without security up to the governor. Yes, in every branch and department the native republican and carpet-bagger have unlimited control. If they do not keep the peace, it is the result of their own bad conduct, and proves what good men have said, that they are not fit for the positions they occupy. Look to Arkansas. What is the result there? Again we find republican office-holders quarreling with each other like dogs over a bone; they fight for the loaves and fishes; and when they become alarmed at the storm which they themselves have raised, one side or the other cries help; telegraphs for the military. The Attorney-General converts himself into the Commander-in-Chief of the Army of the United States, gives military orders, disposes of the Army, the effect of which is to raise a row generally, and then the republicans on this floor exclaim, The spirit of the rebellion still extant! Men are butchered and no one punished. Thus seeking again to inflame the public mind of the North and to hold the democratic party responsible for the result of their own bad acts.

I call upon the country to bear witness that good order and good government prevail in all the States under the control of the democratic party, because it is just to all; and that disorder and bloodshed, if they exist at all, are in republican States, because their rulers are just to none.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. McKEE rose.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. This political discussion has continued for some two hours. I wish to have the debate confined to the paragraph of this bill now pending. I think both sides have now been fully heard.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending amendment is exhausted.

Mr. McKEE. What is the pending amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is to strike out the last word.

Mr. McKEE. Then I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I rise to a question of order. The amendments on which this discussion has taken place are the same amendments offered over and over again. I object to any gentleman continuing this political discussion on the pending bill.

Mr. TREMAIN. You cannot stop it.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. We have had twelve speeches and more than twelve men have been heard on each side.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I object to the amendment that it is the same amendment which has already been voted upon, no other amendment having intervened.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman objects to the amendment because it is simply formal, it would be the duty of the Chair to declare that it is out of order.

Mr. McKEE. Then I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment is already pending.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I withdraw it.

Mr. McKEE. I renew it. The gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HARRIS,] as usual, misstates the question in the South.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I must object to the continuance of this discussion as not pertinent to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's point of order will be good when the occasion for it arises. The gentleman from Mississippi will proceed in order.

Mr. McKEE. I speak on striking out the paragraph, of course.

Mr. BURROWS. Would it be proper to inquire what the amendment is?

The CHAIRMAN. It is to strike out the paragraph making an appropriation for Fort Mifflin.

Mr. BURROWS. I would be glad to hear it read.

Mr. McKEE. I decline to be interrupted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is entitled to the floor and will proceed.

Mr. McKEE. We have heard enough to-day of democratic lecturing, and I have been ashamed for one of the cowardly conduct of my republican friends. They stand here beneath the lash of the democracy, who make all manner of assertions, false as every one knows them to be, and gentlemen of the republican party get up and apologize for Phil Sheridan, and almost apologize for their republican faith. I do not blame the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRIS] for not liking Phil Sheridan; that is natural in a democrat, and especially a Virginia democrat.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I submit that this discussion is not in order.

Mr. McKEE. The gentleman will allow me. He must wait until I come to the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken, and the gentleman from Mississippi must confine himself to the subject-matter of the paragraph.

Mr. McKEE. Other gentlemen have not been confined to the question, and I want the same latitude of debate. I am especially after the gentleman from Virginia, who states that in Warren County, in my State, the trouble arose because a sheriff of the county had stolen the taxes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is out of order. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. STARKWEATHER] objects to any discussion of anything but the paragraph, and the gentleman must confine his remarks to that.

Mr. McKEE. Well, I am coming to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman had better come to it at once.

Mr. McKEE. I have a right to speak in my own way. How does the Chair know how I am going to come out?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will strike in where he intends to come out.

Mr. McKEE. The gentleman from Connecticut had better not get up any more. Now, in the case of Warren County, to which reference was made, not one dollar of taxes has been stolen by that sheriff. He has collected and accounted for them all. I do not wish to discuss the Mississippi case further than to say this much, for I prefer to wait until we hear the report of the special committee that has been sent down to investigate these occurrences, but I am not going to have it said that a republican sheriff stole the taxes when it is not true.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is out of order. It is apparent now that he does not get to the paragraph.

Mr. McKEE. Why, Mr. Chairman, I might say that it is necessary that these taxes should be collected and accounted for if we are to build Fort Mifflin; there can be no doubt about that being pertinent.

Then again, Mr. Chairman, comes the charge here that order reigns in the South wherever the democratic or conservative party holds sway. Now, I know better than that, and I believe they do. They say that wherever the democracy have been supreme, there law and order have reigned supreme. God save the country from white-league "law and order." They say that law is enforced; that crime is always punished. I say I do not believe you can find ten instances in all the South where a white man has been hung for killing a colored republican, and everybody knows that thousands of them have been killed since the war. In my State I cannot find a single instance where a white man has been hung for killing a colored man, and hundreds of colored men have been killed since reconstruction commenced. You search the records of our courts in vain for such an instance; and our State is the best one in the South. When democrats come here talking about law and order in the South, and telling us about the troubles and outrages in Louisiana, I ask them who murdered the men at Coushatta? Who killed the hundreds in Grant parish? Who slaughtered men in Saint Landry? Who murdered republicans at Mechanics' Institute, and sprinkled the streets of New Orleans with loyal blood? Every one of the parties engaged in those outrages belonged to the democratic party, attending the democratic caucuses, and voting the democratic ticket. Their platform is red with the blood of slaughtered men, and if, in order to stop these outrages, it is necessary to declare martial law to protect the citizens, I would proclaim it and welcome it. They say that in Louisiana the republicans have committed robbery; that they have stolen money. Even if true they are not so bad as the democrats, for if the bad republicans are thieves, the vicious democrats there are assassins. The history of Louisiana reconstruction is written on a bloody page. It is red all over with the blood of republicans, and no man has been punished for these slaughters. If Phil Sheridan will punish murderers who will otherwise escape, I bid him God-speed. Gentlemen need not tell me that law and order reign there.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. McKEE. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I hope now we shall proceed with the bill.

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ELDREDGE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 3823) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and had directed him to report the same to the House without amendment.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I move the previous question on the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STARKWEATHER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONTUMACIOUS WITNESS—RICHARD B. IRWIN.

Mr. DAWES. In pursuance of the order of the House, the Sergeant-at-Arms has at the bar of the House Richard B. Irwin.

The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar of the House, having in custody Richard B. Irwin, alleged to be in contempt of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Sergeant-at-Arms brings to the bar of the House Richard B. Irwin, alleged to be in contempt of the privileges of the House in that he has refused to answer questions addressed to him by a committee authorized to examine him. It is the duty of the Chair, under the order of the House, to address to the witness this question: Are you now ready to answer the questions which have been addressed to you by the committee, and which you have heretofore refused to make answer to?

RICHARD B. IRWIN. I am not, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The witness who is alleged to be in contempt of the House is at liberty to make a statement if he desires. It is a liberty always accorded to one at the bar of the House.

RICHARD B. IRWIN. Mr. Speaker, I am not in contempt of the House of Representatives; I am not in contempt of its authority. The House of Representatives has never ordered this investigation. I have not refused to answer any questions which this House has authorized the Committee on Ways and Means to ask.

After requesting the Committee on Ways and Means daily, for five days, to furnish me with copies of the resolutions under which they were, or professed to be, acting, there were handed me, on the fifth day, five documents purporting to be the resolutions or orders. Two of these documents were resolutions passed by the House of Representatives in the Forty-second Congress; the third, was a resolution offered on the 3d April, 1874, and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, but not passed by the House, and upon which no further or other order has been taken. This resolution, if it had been passed by the House, would undoubtedly have authorized so much of the present inquiry as was necessary to substantiate the statement of Legrand Lockwood, that a large sum of money was appropriated and used by the Pacific Mail Steamship Company to procure this subsidy. But that resolution, even if it had been passed, would have directed no inquiry beyond the substantiation of Mr. Lockwood's statement; and it was never passed.

The fourth document refers the testimony taken during the Forty-second Congress to the Committee on Ways and Means, but without any order whatever by this House.

The fifth paper authorizes the Committee on Ways and Means to send for persons and papers, and administer oaths in matters from time to time pending and under examination before said committee. I am advised that "pending" means properly pending, duly pending, pending under the standing rules or orders of this House, or under the special order of the House.

The inquiry into the Pacific Mail Steamship subsidy forms no part of the duty of the Committee on Ways and Means under the standing orders of the House, the functions of that committee being confined to the raising of revenue, and I do not find among the papers handed to me by the committee, or anywhere else, any special order of this House directing that committee to undertake this investigation. I therefore most respectfully submit, Mr. Speaker, that in declining to answer a question which this House has never authorized or directed to be put, I am not and cannot be in contempt of the authority of this House.

I have stated to the committee, under oath, that I did not employ any member or officer of this House who was also an officer or member of the last House. In other words, that I did not employ any person subject to the jurisdiction of this House to the extent of these inquiries; that I did not pay any money to any such person; that I had no understanding that any money was to be paid to any such person, and that I have no knowledge that any money was paid to any such person.

There is not a shadow of evidence to oppose my statement; and in my judgment there never will be, and never can be.

I most respectfully submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that this House has no jurisdiction; certainly that the Committee on Ways and Means, without the order of this House, has no jurisdiction, to the extent of this inquiry over my transactions with other citizens who are not under control of this House.

So far as I myself am concerned, the committee will bear me witness that I have answered frankly and fairly and truly every question that was put to me, including even some questions which neither this committee nor other human power had any right to ask: such, for example, as "what was my salary as agent of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company at San Francisco," and the inquiry into my bank account with a firm of private bankers in the city of New York, which I myself voluntarily exhibited to the committee, showing and stating that it had nothing to do with this inquiry, and which the committee returned to me as irrelevant to this inquiry, but which they afterward proceeded to examine during my absence in the city of New York.

These things, Mr. Speaker, this committee had no more right to examine than they had to examine my underclothing.

While therefore, as far as I have gone, I have told the committee the truth and nothing but the truth, I am prepared to tell the committee the whole truth as far as relates to myself, but when it comes to revealing matters which exist in confidence between myself and other citizens beyond the jurisdiction of this committee and of this House to the extent of the inquiries put to me, I stand upon my duty as a man, upon my honor as a gentleman, and upon my rights as an American citizen, and most respectfully decline to answer these inquiries, and in doing so I disclaim any intentional disrespect for the authority of this House.

In the second place, I submit that neither the House of Representatives nor any other power in this land has any right to deprive an American citizen of his life, of his liberty, or of his property without due process of law; and, as the authority for this opinion, I refer to the Constitution of the United States. I refer, Mr. Speaker, to the Constitution framed in 1789 by the Convention of which George Washington was President. I refer to the clauses framed by Thomas Jefferson, without which Virginia refused to ratify that Constitution. I am advised by my counsel, and do myself firmly believe, that there is no power in this country to punish any citizen for anything, either in his person or his property, without due process of law.

It is the prerogative of Congress to make laws for the Government of the people, and to hang them up where every citizen can see them. Outside of these laws there can be no crime and no punishment.

I am told that this House can compel me to answer whether it has or has not the right to do so. I know that you can direct against me the whole physical power of this nation. It is deposited in your hands as a sacred trust, to be exercised by you not as partisans but as judges. Against that overwhelming power I should contend in vain. On no man in this land would that mighty hand rest more heavily. In all ages men have been forced to lie by every conceivable torture, but never on the earth has one man been compelled by physical force to tell the truth against the dictations of his honor or of his conscience.

Finally, I appeal to the common sense of this House to consider the practical effect of insisting upon a reply, which in the course of events has become unnecessary, to a question which I consider the committee had no right to put and which this House has never directed them to put.

The committee and the House must by this time perceive that substantially all the information that could possibly be obtained from me by an answer to the questions at issue is now being elicited from other sources; that the truth of my answer is confirmed by every line of evidence, and that it has become of small consequence particularly whether I reply or do not reply to the questions of the committee.

Under these circumstances the only practical effect of any action the House may take in insisting upon an answer to the questions in dispute will be to suppress a mass of valuable and interesting testimony for the most part not available from other sources, which I am and always have been ready to place at the disposal of the committee, either voluntarily or in reply to their questions; and I can imagine no one that will be gratified at this result except those who are interested in the suppression of that testimony.

If my testimony be true, as it is in every word and every line, allowing for the imperfections of the human memory at this distance of time, it must be evident to every impartial member of this House that the House of Representatives not only has no right to insist upon an answer to these questions which it has never authorized to be put, but that no practical good can result from such persistence. And, Mr. Speaker, I have told the truth, and that truth will stand to all eternity like a rock, against which all the forces of nature and all the powers of man will hurl themselves in vain.

Mr. DAWES. I offer the following; upon which I call the previous question:

Ordered, That the Speaker propose to the witness at the bar the following questions:

First. Give the names of the persons whom you employed to aid you in procuring the subsidy from Congress in 1872 for the Pacific Mail Steamship Company.

Second. What was the largest sum paid by you to any one person to aid you in procuring that subsidy?

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the order was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. Richard B. Irwin, I am directed by the House to propound to you the following question:

Will you give the names of the persons whom you employed to aid you in procuring the subsidy from Congress in 1872 for the Pacific Mail Steamship Company?

RICHARD B. IRWIN. I am compelled, Mr. Speaker, to decline doing so, for the reasons I have already stated.

The SPEAKER. I am also directed to propound to you the following question:

What was the largest sum paid by you to any one person to aid you in procuring that subsidy?

RICHARD B. IRWIN. Two hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars.

Mr. DAWES. I offer the following resolution; upon which I call the previous question:

Resolved, That Richard B. Irwin, having been heard by the House, pursuant to the order heretofore made requiring him to show cause why he should not answer the questions propounded to him by the committee and by the Speaker of this House in pursuance of its order, has failed to show sufficient cause why he should not answer the same; and that said Richard B. Irwin be considered in contempt of the House for failure to make answer thereto.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I am directed by the Committee on Ways and Means to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That in purging himself of the contempt for which Richard B. Irwin is now in custody, the said Irwin shall be required to state to the House forthwith, or as soon as the House shall be ready to hear him, whether he is now willing to appear before the committee of this House to whom he has hitherto declined to make answer, and make answer to the questions for the refusal to answer which he has been ordered into custody; and if he answers he is ready to appear before said committee and make answer, then the witness shall have the privilege to so appear and answer forthwith, or so soon as said committee can be convened; and that in the mean time the witness remain in custody; and in the event that said witness shall answer that he is not ready to so appear before said committee and make answer to said questions so refused to be answered, then that said witness be recommitted to the said custody for the continuance of such contempt; and that such custody shall continue until the said witness shall communicate to this House through said committee that he is ready to appear before the said committee and make such answer; and that in executing this order the Sergeant-at-Arms shall cause said Irwin to be kept in his custody in the common jail of the District of Columbia.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I desire to call the attention of this House to the fact that the commitment which it is asked to order is made contingent upon a certain event; that is, that in the event that said Irwin shall hereafter refuse to answer, then he shall be committed. It seems to me the proper course would be to have the House affirm the fact that he has refused to answer; otherwise the Sergeant-at-Arms, in committing a person to the common jail, is to judge whether that certain event has or has not happened. If the witness comes before the House and refuses to answer, then there should be an affirmation of the fact that he has so refused.

Mr. DAWES. That was the design of the committee.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. My colleague will permit me to observe that if any recusant witness should apply to the court for a writ of habeas corpus, this point which I suggest would be a very grave one in upsetting the whole proceeding.

Mr. DAWES. The first resolution adopted was for the very purpose of having the judgment of this House that this witness is in contempt for not answering. The second resolution offered by my colleague on the committee [Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS] proposes that the witness may at any time appear before the committee and relieve himself of this contempt. It provides a way for him at any time to appear before the committee if he desires. And I will say that this resolution is copied word for word from the resolution adopted by my colleague's committee in the case of Stewart.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I did not approve of that.

Mr. DAWES. What my colleague says is true in point of law. I agree with him; but I think it is provided for by the resolution.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to ask the gentleman whether the commitment to jail, as provided for in this resolution, is not new to this class of proceedings—whether commitment to jail is not the thing provided for in the act of 1857 as the result of a trial by jury?

Mr. DAWES. I will say, in answer to the gentleman, that this is not a commitment to jail; it is a commitment to the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, who is directed how he shall keep him. That is all.

Mr. MAYNARD. Upon that point, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. I do not propose to antagonize him; but——

Mr. DAWES. One word more as to the question of precedents. This resolution is taken word for word from the proceedings in Stewart's case.

Mr. GARFIELD. But Stewart was not committed to jail.

Mr. DAWES. The Sergeant-at-Arms was ordered by the House to keep Stewart in his custody in the common jail of the District of Columbia.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think not.

Mr. MAYNARD. Stewart, as a matter of clemency, was confined in an apartment in this wing of the Capitol.

Mr. DAWES. In the Simonton case and in the Wolcott case the contumacious witness was actually confined in the common jail.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire that we shall consider carefully whether in the action here proposed we are or are not proceeding to execute a statute. If we are merely holding a witness in the custody of the House, that is one thing; but if we are administering a punishment, which the law regards as the end of a trial before a jury, we ought to be careful how we proceed.

Mr. MAYNARD. I am informed by officers of the House that in neither of the cases mentioned was the party put in jail. There is, I understand, an apartment in this wing of the Capitol that has been used for the confinement of contumacious witnesses. While I know nothing about the merits of this particular case, I hope, if there is to be an exception made, there will be good grounds for it.

Mr. DAWES. In point of fact, as the Journal of this House will show, the order of the House in the cases of Simonton and Wolcott was that they be confined and kept in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms in the common jail. I know that Wolcott was so confined; for I visited him in jail many times; and I take the liberty of adding that, as the record of the House will show, the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] who has expressed some doubts to the power of the House in this matter, voted for the resolution to commit Simonton to jail.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. The form of this resolution, with the exception of the closing clause, is copied from the resolution in Stewart's case; and it is in accordance with all the precedents. It is true, as the chairman of the committee has stated, that in at least two cases the recusant witness has been placed in the common jail. In other cases the place where he should be kept has been left to the discretion of the Sergeant-at-Arms. The committee in this case have thought it wiser for the House to name the place in which the witness shall be confined, rather than leave it to the discretion of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

It seems to me that the point raised by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] does not properly arise. The House does not assume to punish any more in keeping this witness in one place than in keeping him in another. But the place where he is to be confined should be named by the House and not left to the discretion of the officer.

Mr. GARFIELD. In matters of this kind we ought to be careful about the precedents we make as well as those we follow. The common jail—the jail of the District of Columbia—is named, not by the House of Representatives but by Congress, by a law of the United States as the place where a contumacious witness shall be kept as a punishment after a trial by a jury. The jail is understood to be a place of punishment, not merely a place of detention.

Mr. TREMAIN. I wish to put a question to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.] If a witness should refuse to testify before a court in this District, could not the court confine him in the common jail? Is not the jail of this District the property of the Government of the United States, and cannot Congress exercise the same power over a contumacious witness as could be exercised by a court of this District?

Mr. GARFIELD. But has the House of Representatives the custody of the jail of this District? It is of no possible consequence where this witness may be confined, except that we should be careful to tread upon safe ground—ground that we have the right to tread upon. The House of Representatives has the custody of the rooms and apartments of this Capitol.

Mr. LAWRENCE. By what law?

Mr. GARFIELD. Because they are the rooms of the House of Representatives. But I want to pursue the inquiry still another step.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question in reference to this matter?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I could not hear all that the gentleman said; but I understood him to suggest what seems to me very apparent, that the jail of this District is not under the control of one branch of Congress.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is what I said.

Mr. ELDREDGE. It seems to me that must be apparent to every lawyer. Now, supposing that the person in charge of that jail should decline to receive this man, as he well might do, because he might be subjecting himself to legal responsibility if he should take any person to be kept as a prisoner without lawful authority; supposing the jailer should refuse to receive this man, what can the House do about it? The jail, it seems to me, is under the control of Congress, and no man can be committed to jail, the jailer cannot be required to receive any person whatever, unless under authority of a law passed by the House and the Senate and approved by the Executive.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to make a further inquiry of the Committee on Ways and Means, as they have undoubtedly considered this question more fully than I have.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I wish to say the only instance I am aware of, certainly the only instance since I have been in Congress, where anybody has been committed to jail was the case of Pat Woods; and I do not suppose there is a man in all this land who does not look upon that as one of the grossest acts of tyranny and as a case where there was an entire lack of power on the part of this House to order any such commitment.

Mr. MAYNARD. I think there have been several cases.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to make this further inquiry and suggestion to the gentlemen of the Committee on Ways and Means. The jail of the District of Columbia is under the control of an officer whose power is given by law. I do not suppose the House of Representatives—at least I raise the question whether the House of Representatives has any power as a sole House to give an order to the marshal of the District of Columbia or to the keeper of that jail. Of course the House of Representatives may respectfully request him to lock a man up in the jail, but have they any right as a matter of law to order the keeper of that jail to put him in confinement? Could he not raise the question of custody; whereas if we put this witness in the hands of the Sergeant-at-Arms, in the usual place of custody in the special room in this building which is under our control, I do not see but we should have a safer custody of him and have him more fully under our control.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state as briefly as possible what I understand to be the views of the committee under which this order is asked to be adopted. And first as to the precedents. If any gentleman will turn to his copy of the Rules, he will find on page 231 that the failure or refusal of a witness to appear or refusal to testify is a breach of the privileges of the House, and has been punished by commitment to the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, by expulsion from the floor as a reporter, and by commitment to the common jail of the District of Columbia.

Now, it will be observed we have a right to punish, and not merely to keep in custody, for an ascertained and adjudicated contempt—adjudicated by the House. So far, then, as the question of punishment is concerned, this is proper and legitimate under the practice and rules of the House and under parliamentary law.

Then the question recurs as to the place of punishment. No gentleman can fail to remember the process by which persons in contempt have been confined in a room of this building where they have lived like princes and enjoyed a higher order of existence, perhaps, in some respects than they could anywhere else. The Committee on Ways and Means therefore desired, in a matter so serious as this, to provide a place of confinement which would give assurance to the country of the earnestness of the committee to get at the truth of such facts as are alleged to the disgrace and dishonor of the House of Representatives. For that reason, and in accordance with the precedents, they have recommended the custody of this witness shall not be in a room in this building where he will be fed and entertained in the best manner, but in a place known as a place of punishment for the alleged misdemeanor committed by him. And in doing that they have avoided the difficulty suggested the other day, and not by directing commitment to the jail, but commitment to the Sergeant-at-Arms, telling the Sergeant at the same time in this instrument where the prisoner is to be kept until he has purged himself of contempt.

One step further. Now suppose, as gentlemen say, he goes to jail and the jailer says he has not authority, or he will not receive him, then the question comes again before the House, reported by the Sergeant-at-Arms, and the House will provide another place for his custody; but if he is received at the jail as in former cases, then the order of the House will be carried literally into effect. I do not see any difficulty in executing the order suggested by the resolution.

Mr. KELLOGG. Let me ask a single question of the gentleman from Iowa, whether it would not be better for Congress to pass a law providing for the incarceration of such recusant witnesses under the Sergeant-at-Arms in the jail of this District before we undertake to commit this man to the jail when there is no law upon the statute-book for it. Would it not be better before acting in violation of the law to pass a law authorizing the keeping of such witnesses in the jail of this District?

Mr. KASSON. I have only to answer, that to the committee the law seems now to authorize it; and unless objection comes from another quarter, they do not see the propriety of any legislation other than now exists on this subject.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to call the attention of the House to the proceedings in the case of Joseph B. Stewart, a contumacious witness in connection with the Credit Mobilier investigation. I ask the Clerk to read the portion of the Journal of the proceedings of January 30, 1873, which I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. DAWES submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to, namely:

Resolved, That Joseph B. Stewart, having been heard by the House pursuant to the order heretofore made requiring him to show cause why he should not answer the questions propounded to him by the committee, has failed to show sufficient cause why he should not answer the same, and that said Joseph B. Stewart be considered in contempt of the House for failure to make answer thereto.

Mr. JEREMIAH M. WILSON submitted the following resolution, namely:

Resolved, That, in purging himself of the contempt for which Joseph B. Stewart is now in custody, the said Stewart shall be required to state forthwith, or as soon as the House shall be ready to hear him, whether he is now willing to appear before the committee of this House to whom he has hitherto declined to make answers, and make answers to the questions for the refusal to answer which he has been ordered into custody, and if he answers that he is ready to appear before the said committee and make answer, then the witness shall have the privilege to so appear and answer forthwith or so soon as the said committee can be convened, and that in the mean time the witness remain in custody; and in the event that said witness shall answer that he is not ready to so appear before said committee and make answer to the said questions so refused to be answered, then that said witness be remanded to the said custody for the continuance of such contempt, and that such custody shall continue until the said witness shall communicate to this House, through the Speaker, that he is ready to appear before the said committee and make such answers, or until the further order of the House in the premises.

The same having been read,

Mr. JEREMIAH M. WILSON demanded the previous question.

When

The House refused to second the same.

Mr. HOAR submitted the following amendment in the nature of a substitute for the resolution, namely:

Resolved, That Joseph B. Stewart be remanded to the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, to abide the further order of the House, and that while in such custody he be permitted to be taken before the committee of which the honorable Mr. WILSON is chairman, if he sees fit, to answer such questions as may be lawfully put to him.

The same having been read,

Mr. SARGENT moved to amend the amendment as follows, namely: Strike out all after the word "resolved" and insert the following, namely:

"That J. B. Stewart, now in custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, be, and hereby is, committed to the jail of the District of Columbia, there to be held in close confinement until he be released by further order of the House, upon his own application, saying he has purged himself from all contempt by answering truly all questions that have been or may be propounded to him by order of the House through its committee."

And the question being put,

It was decided in the affirmative.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The question then recurring on the amendment as amended,

It was put,

And decided in the negative—yeas 56, nays 139, not voting 45.

The yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the members present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are—

Messrs. Ephraim L. Acker, Stevenson Archer, John Beatty, Austin Blair, Thomas Boles, Benjamin F. Butler, Aylett R. Cotton, John M. Crebs, Edward Crossland, John J. Davis, Ozro J. Dodds, Peter M. So the amendment as amended was disagreed to.

Mr. MAYNARD. The gentleman from New York [Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS] was one of the gentlemen who voted with me against the amendment proposed by Mr. SARGENT, of California, to send the witness to jail. I submit that unless there be something to this case out of the ordinary rule we had better follow the precedent and adopt the resolution we then adopted.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I think there are cases that justify the course which the committee have taken. It will be in the recollection of gentlemen upon this floor that the witness who was then confined in the Capitol became the lion of the Capitol. Our object is not to make a hero of any one. Our object is not to punish any one unjustly. We desire to obtain necessary testimony; or, failing, to render emphatic our condemnation of the refusal to testify. It has been suggested that we have not the control of the common jail; that is, that one branch of Congress has not the control of it. So it might be equally claimed that one branch of Congress has not the control of any portion of this Capitol except that portion which is occupied by that branch of Congress or its committees. The witness will not be refused a place in the jail, in the custody of our Sergeant-at-Arms.

I yield to my colleague, the chairman of the Committee, Mr. DAWES.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Before the chairman of the committee proceeds, I desire to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS] this question: Whether under this resolution, which is to be a precedent for all like cases, if the witness says to the Sergeant-at-Arms, "I am now ready to answer the question," whether that does not ipso facto discharge the witness from custody, so that he will escape and the whole proceedings will then have to be gone over again?

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I think not.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I think if the gentleman will read the resolution he will see that that is the effect of it.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I have read it in connection with the preceding resolution, and I think there can be no doubt about its effect.

Mr. MAYNARD. Before the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] proceeds, I wish to say that I hope he will be good enough to state to the House what, in his judgment, is the condition of this gentleman's health. This of course is to be taken into account as a matter of common humanity.

Mr. DAWES. I was about to say that the Committee on Ways and Means have no desire to invoke any action of this House upon this witness that shall be harsh, unreasonable, or unnecessary. They are aware that the witness is not in good health. They believe, and they have presented to the House the reasons for that belief, and the House has passed upon them as sufficient, that he has in his possession testimony of vital importance to an investigation which this House has ordered—an investigation touching the purity of legislation in Congress and the character of the members of both Houses of Congress. Their investigation has gone so far as to satisfy them that he holds in his hand the key to unlock any door that this House may shut upon him. He has that power consistently with his duty as a man and a citizen; for no duty as a man or citizen can rest upon him or any other person that conflicts with just and proper measures for the purification of legislation and of the character of the House of Representatives; and he who sets up the idea that he can himself, under the pretense that what belongs to him as a man or a citizen is in conflict with that larger duty which every man and every citizen owes to the country to bring to light every scheme of corruption, every measure that tends to sap the purity of legislation in this or the other Hall of Congress, sets up that which if this House recognizes they throw away not only all their power but their character too.

Therefore, sir, though I am willing to answer in the affirmative the question of the gentleman from Tennessee, that this man is in poor health, I say to him that if this House shall order the Sergeant-at-Arms to confine him in the parlor of the Arlington House or in any other room that the Sergeant-at-Arms can procure for him which this House shall think is a proper place in which to keep a man who says he holds in his possession evidence that shall tend to elucidate the question whether money has been improperly spent to procure legislation in this Hall, they ought to do so. He says to us here at the bar of this House, that while he has that evidence in his possession, he has some idea that it is inconsistent with his duty as a man and a citizen to come up to the aid of this House in ferreting out the improper use of that money; if we do that, I say, sir, that he has at any moment an opportunity to relieve himself from any such burden.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the House to a precedent in the Thirty-fifth Congress, when I was here in a minority, and when a man was brought here from my own State as a witness to testify to facts exactly analogous to these, having confessed that he brought here, instead of three-quarters of a million dollars, $79,000 to use in securing the passage of a bill through Congress. When he was asked what he did with that money he refused to answer that question, and the House of Representatives passed the following resolution:

Whereas John W. Wolcott has failed satisfactorily to answer the questions propounded to him by order of this House and has not purged himself of the contempt with which he stands charged: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the said John W. Wolcott be committed by the Sergeant-at-Arms to the common jail of the District of Columbia, to be kept in close custody until he shall signify his willingness to answer the questions propounded to him by the select committee of this House and all other legal and proper questions that may be propounded to him by said committee; and for the commitment and detention of the said John W. Wolcott this resolution shall be a sufficient warrant.

Resolved, That whenever the officer having the said John W. Wolcott in custody shall be informed by said Wolcott that he is ready and willing to answer the questions heretofore propounded and all proper and legal questions that may hereafter be propounded to him by said committee, it shall be the duty of such officer to deliver the said John W. Wolcott over to the Sergeant-at-Arms of this House, whose duty it shall be to take the said Wolcott immediately before the committee before whom he was summoned to appear for examination, and to hold him in custody, subject to the further order of the House.

Now, I want to call the attention of the House to the difference between these resolutions and the resolution before the House. Under these resolutions, by a very large majority, I think of more than two to one, this man Wolcott was taken and put into the custody of the jailer, out of the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, and there, according to my recollection, he staid six weeks, resorting to every method known to the law to relieve himself of that custody, and failing in that, he came to this House and asked this House to discharge him, and they discharged him.

Here we propose that the House shall order the Sergeant-at-Arms to hold this witness in custody, and the only question is where shall he keep him. This House has no control over any room, whether it be in the Arlington, in this Capitol, or in the jail. The House can instruct their Sergeant-at-Arms to keep this man in some room in this Capitol, but it takes something besides this House to control the rooms of this Capitol.

Mr. MAYNARD. Not in this wing of the Capitol.

Mr. DAWES. There may be some rooms in this Capitol that this House has by joint rule committed to its custody, I know, but outside of this Capitol, that there may be no cavil upon the question, you cannot control any rooms. Now, suppose we order the Sergeant-at-Arms to keep this man in custody, and while keeping him in custody to keep him in a room at the jail, and he finds that the jailer will not permit him to keep him there, he has but to come back to the House and say that he cannot execute its order in that particular, and take further instructions from the House.

Unless this House desire to make a farce of this investigation, unless they desire that the Committee on Ways and Means shall stop the investigation here or be subjected to the indignities that have been attempted to be cast upon them this day by other witnesses, who say that until you make Richard B. Irwin answer this question they will decline to answer, you must take some such action as this. Since this House has assembled to-day we have been told in our committee room that until we make Richard B. Irwin answer this question other witnesses before us under oath shall decline to answer. Let us not, therefore, deal with this matter as if we did not care whether these questions were answered or not, by merely telling our Sergeant-at-Arms to take Mr. Irwin into his custody and keep him as others are kept when constructively in his custody until the end of this session; but let your committee know whether you intend to exert the power of this House for the discovery of the truth.

Now, I would not have this man kept one hour in the common jail, not one hour, as a punishment. I do not believe that in this case we have the power to punish him by an hour's confinement, but I believe that we have the power to hold him until he will answer; and it is for us to say whether we shall put him upon a bed of down and make assistant sergeants-at-arms take him, like the Sultan of Turkey, out upon their shoulders into the air night and morning to enjoy the luxuries and the refreshing breezes of this city, or whether we shall say to him, "We are in earnest; we believe that we ought to have these facts;" and, so believing, whatever power this House can exert, consistently with proper treatment to him in the condition of his health, they should and will exert to compel him to so answer; or else they should say to the committee, what the committee would welcome most heartily, "Stop your investigation where it is."

But, until you order your committee to cease its labors in that direction, do not tie their hands by telling witnesses, through the treatment you propose to exercise toward this witness, that it matters not whether they answer or not.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS obtained the floor.

Mr. BECK. Allow me to say a word.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. BECK. There seems to be some difficulty about the power of the House over this question. I desire at some time or other, before the subject is exhausted, to offer the following resolution, for the purpose of endeavoring to perfect the present law by further legislation of Congress:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to report a bill to this House, as soon as possible, so far amending the law punishing contempts as to authorize imprisonment of the person or persons guilty of contempt, under the control of the Sergeant-at-Arms, in the common jail, for any period not exceeding twelve months from the date of the judgment, unless the person or persons shall be sooner excused or released by the same or the subsequent Congress.

Some time before this question is exhausted I desire to offer that resolution for reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TREMAIN. I desire to say that when this question was up before I endeavored to obtain the floor of the House for the purpose of saying that in my judgment it would be found that the whole of this question has been deliberately settled by the Supreme Court of the United States in an action for false imprisonment brought against Mr. Clay, as Speaker of the House, for enforcing the order of the House against a party adjudged guilty of contempt for attempting to bribe a member of the House, not in the presence of the House, but outside. In that case the whole question of the power of Congress to punish for contempt was considered and adjudicated in a most elaborate opinion, and determined by the Supreme Court of the United States. In that opinion two propositions were determined; first, that this power is an implied power belonging to this House, growing out of the general power to legislate and the other general powers. In the second place, that the House had a right to imprison for contempt in any manner that in its discretion it thought proper, provided the term of imprisonment did not extend beyond the session of the House.

I had before me the whole subject in Story's Commentaries, where the matter was fully discussed and where the questions discussed the other day were deliberately disposed of and settled. But I was not able then to obtain the floor. The gentleman who promised me ten minutes refused to give it to me when he found out that I was going to talk against him. The case is the case of Anderson against Dunn, and is reported in 6 Wheaton, page 229, in a long, elaborate opinion, covering the entire ground in this case.

Mr. LAWRENCE. If the marshal of the District refuses to allow the Sergeant-at-Arms to imprison this man in the jail——

Mr. TREMAIN. We can find another place.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Would not the marshal himself be in contempt of the House?

Mr. TREMAIN. I do not say that; but we could find another place.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Do we not have as much control over the jail of the county as we do over this Hall?

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. There are no reasons why the witness now before the House should appeal to the sympathy of the House. According to his own evidence he comes here laying down $750,000 at the door of this House to control legislation. He does not excuse himself from testifying on the ground that the answer which he might give would criminate himself. He has gone so far as to testify that he has brought the money hither. No answer that he can give can criminate himself more. It is not on any plea on his own behalf that he can ask for sympathy.

Nor does he plead, nor can he plead, that his employers object to his making answer. It is not in the interest of his employers that he refuses; it is not in the interest of his employers, from whom he testifies that he received this immense sum, that he can ask for sympathy. Certainly not in the interest of pure legislation can he appeal to any man upon this floor. Either he has brought this money here to corrupt legislation or he stands here libeling this body. Not in the interest of the people can he ask for sympathy, because the people are interested that this body shall act not only without being bribed, but without suspicion or charge of bribery. This House is called upon in the interest of pure legislation to see to it that no witness shall come to its doors testifying that he has brought money hither to control legislation and then refuse to declare how he has used that money.

No point has been raised to-day that Congress has not the right to commit this witness. My colleague [Mr. TREMAIN] has cited a case which I had intended to cite, the famous case of Anderson against Dunn, decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, where the court decided that as a matter of self-preservation and self-defense this House has the right to punish for contempt. In that case, reported in Wheaton's Reports, volume 6, page 230, Justice Johnson says:

> The present question is what is the extent of the punishing power which the deliberative assemblies of the Union may assume and exercise on the principle of self-preservation? Analogy and the nature of the case furnish the answer: "the least possible power adequate to the end proposed;" which is the power of imprisonment. It may at first view and from the history of the practice of our legislative bodies be thought to extend to other inflictions. But every other will be found to be mere commutation for confinement. Such commitment alone is the alternative where the individual proves contumacious. And even to the duration of imprisonment a period is imposed by the nature of things, since the existence of the power that imprisons is indispensable to its continuance. And although the legislative power continues perpetual, the legislative body ceases to exist on the moment of its adjournment or periodical dissolution. It follows that imprisonment must terminate with that adjournment.

The Supreme Court has placed the rights of the House in such cases on this simple ground of self-preservation. The case arose out of an offer of a bribe of $500 to the chairman of the Committee on Claims in 1818. In the House a long and interesting debate arose. My own eminent predecessor, Hon. Henry R. Storrs, urged the rights of the House to punish for contempt, as based on the supreme power of Congress in the District and as included in the power to legislate. He said:

> Since gentlemen had, in the course of the argument, resorted to the authority of names and to the dogmas of civilians, he would ask their attention to an opinion of the late Executive of the Union, to be found in a work justly considered the text-book of construction. In that part of the Federalist which was from the pen of Mr. Madison, when considering that clause to which he had referred, the language is so emphatic and peculiarly applicable to the question now before the House, that he would read the extract: "The indispensable necessity of complete authority at the seat of government carries its own evidence with it. It is a power exercised by every Legislature of the Union, I might say of the world, by virtue of its general supremacy. Without it not only the public authority might be insulted, but its proceedings interrupted with impunity." Can a more palpable exposition of the futility of the assumption on which these distinctions are founded be offered? Will the effect of these observations be evaded by referring them to the power of self-preservation? The whole scope of them assumes, as an axiom, that the supremacy of Congress, at least within this District, is clothed with all the attributes of sovereignty which are vested in the State governments. The offense committed by John Anderson against the privileges of the House has therefore been perpetrated in our exclusive territorial jurisdiction.
> Mr. S. said that the power of Congress, as well as of every other legislative body, to punish for contempt or breach of privilege, (he cared not by which name it was called,) was inseparably annexed to and included in the power itself to legislate.

Mr. Tallmadge, of New York, stated the ground afterward assumed by the Supreme Court. His words were:

> I do maintain that this House possesses the power, as incidental to its existence, and an inseparable attendant upon its formation. The Constitution created this House and gave it existence. The power of self-defense and self-preservation follows as an incident, an inseparable attendant, and a necessary consequence. The functions of the Constitution terminated with the formation of this House; and we ask not to deduce this right of self-defense and self-protection from any construction of the Constitution, while we claim this right to the House as inherent and self-evident to its existence. Our opponents have denied this power to the House; they have said we have no common law, and it is not delegated by the Constitution; and have therefore called on us to show the authority for the power which we claim. Let me, in return, ask any one of those gentlemen to show their individual right to use any means of self-defense. The right is not given in the Constitution; there is no statute, and they say there is no common law. But yet no man doubts that each individual has the right of self-defense and self-preservation; and that this right is incidental to his existence, and that he possesses it as a right derived from nature. In like manner does every corporate body, formed for judicial or legislative purposes, possess the right of self-defense and self-protection as an inseparable attendant upon its formation. This, said Mr. Tallmadge, is the extent of the power which we claim. And this power has been claimed and exercised by every legislative body or judicial tribunal recorded in history. This power was claimed and exercised by all courts in our own as well as in every other country. The gentlemen could not show by what right courts of law possessed this power. It was not given by the Constitution, nor by any statute; and yet it was claimed by them and daily exercised.

But to-day the power of Congress is not denied.

Nor does the fact that an indictment may lie against an individual for the same offense exclude the House from the exercise of this power, because the offense of contempt is a separate and distinct offense from refusing to answer. This House has the right to punish for contempt independently of the other offense of a refusal to answer. This point is distinctly stated in a letter of Attorney-General B. F. Butler, in 1834, in the case of General Houston, as follows:

> ATTORNEY-GENERAL'S OFFICE, June 25, 1834.
> SIR: In answer to the question submitted to me on the memorial of General Houston, who appears to have been indicted, convicted, and fined in the criminal court of this District for an assault on the person of a member from the House of Representatives, after having been previously punished by that House for the same act, as a contempt and breach of privilege, I have the honor to state that, in my opinion, the proceedings of the House constituted no bar to the subsequent indictment and conviction. The fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which provides that no person "shall be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb," does not apply to cases of this sort. Courts and other bodies which have the power of punishing for contempts are invested with that power, and are supposed to employ it for the purpose of protecting themselves in the due exercise of their appropriate functions, and not for the purpose of vindicating the general law of the land, which may also have been violated by the same act. Technically, therefore, General Houston has not been twice tried for the same offense. The act committed by him was one and the same, and it constituted but one indictable offense; and he was, therefore, liable to only one conviction on indictment. But if this act was also a breach of the privileges of the House of Representatives, and a contempt of the House, they had a right to punish him for the contempt independently of the action of the criminal court; and so vice versa.
> I am, sir, &c.,
> B. F. BUTLER.
> To the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Thus the power of the House cannot be denied, nor in this case can the necessity for action be denied. Therefore the passage of a resolution substantially such as the committee has reported is absolutely required by the circumstances. I am directed, however, by the Committee on Ways and Means to withdraw the particular form of resolution which has been reported, and to submit that which I now send to the Clerk's desk; and upon it I call the previous question.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Richard B. Irwin be remanded to the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms to abide the further order of this House; and that while in such custody he be permitted to be taken by the said Sergeant-at-Arms before the Committee on Ways and Means, if he shall declare himself ready to answer such questions as may be lawfully put to him, including those asked of him by order of this House; and while he shall so remain in custody the Sergeant-at-Arms shall keep the witness in his custody in the common jail of the District of Columbia.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope the gentleman will allow me to move to amend by striking out the words "in the common jail of the District of Columbia."

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I cannot yield for that purpose.

Mr. MAYNARD. Then I will ask the Chair whether, if the previous question should not be seconded, the amendment I suggest would be in order?

The SPEAKER. Of course it would be.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution of Mr. Ellis H. ROBERTS was adopted.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to call the attention of the House to a point which affects his own duty in this matter. The Clerk will read the third section of the act relating to cases of this kind.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That when a witness shall fail to testify as provided in the previous sections of this act, and the fact shall be reported to the House, it shall be the duty of the Speaker of the House or the President of the Senate to certify the fact, under the seal of the House or Senate, to the district attorney for the District of Columbia, whose duty it shall be to bring the matter before the grand jury for their action.

The SPEAKER. The question in the mind of the Chair is whether this witness having refused to testify and having been brought before the House, the time has arrived for the action of the Chair under this statute, which seems to be mandatory. On this point the Chair will follow the instructions of the House.

Mr. DAWES. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that possibly something may occur which will obviate the necessity for that step; and as it is not peremptory that it shall be done forthwith, the Speaker might wait a little while to see whether such action will be necessary.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The act imposes the duty on the Speaker; there is no doubt about that.

Mr. DAWES. Certainly; it is a duty under the law.

Mr. LAWRENCE. And there is no escape from it.

The SPEAKER. The statute appears to be mandatory in imposing this duty. In the case of Joseph B. Stewart, two years ago, it was not performed, and there was some criticism in consequence. The attention of the Chair was not called to the precise language of the statute in that case until some time afterward.

Mr. DAWES. I suppose, Mr. Speaker, the meaning of the statute is that this certification shall be made if there should be a final refusal. But we have provided a further opportunity for this witness to answer. Therefore I suggest to the Chair that though when the proceedings are complete the duty provided by law will be incumbent upon the Chair if the refusal be persisted in, yet it does not seem to me necessary that this action be taken by the Speaker forthwith—to-day.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the Chair allow me to make a remark? If the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] should prevail, the Chair will have to wait until the 4th of March, at noon, to determine whether the proceedings will be finished or not, so as to require the performance of this duty; and when the gavel comes down at that time, you, sir, will cease to be Speaker, and cannot possibly perform this magisterial duty which the statute imposes; so that the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts would make the statute null so far as the duty of the Speaker is concerned. Having committed the offender to jail, it seems to me we ought now to proceed to determine by some process whether we have any right to put him there.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. As I understand, a witness who refuses to testify, in answer to a lawful question put to him by authority of this House, is in precisely the same position as a man who should come within these doors and strike a blow at the Speaker or any member of this House during its session. First, he commits a contempt of the House; but besides he commits a penal offense under a statute of the United States. Under the statute, when that penal offense has been reported to the House, it becomes the duty of the Speaker to certify the fact to the district attorney. That offense has been reported to the House in this case by the committee, and it has been found as a fact by the resolution adopted by the House that such an offense has been committed. Now, whatever the witness may do hereafter to purge himself of contempt or to mitigate the punishment which should be inflicted upon him by the House, his offense in disobeying this statute was complete when he refused to answer lawful questions; and when that fact has been reported to the House and affirmed by the House to exist, the duty of the Speaker has become imperative.

Mr. KASSON. Allow me a single additional suggestion. This case under the statute, as I understand, must go before a grand jury in the District of Columbia. There may be such a body in session at the moment the offense is committed. But if we postpone action, then before any process could be issued upon which the party could be arrested he might be out of the reach of such process; he might be in Europe. Consequently, I apprehend the intention of the law to be that as soon as the offense is committed this communication is to be sent to the officer having charge of such prosecutions in the District of Columbia, that proceedings may be instituted at the earliest possible moment; and then it may be reported to the House that process for him has been issued; and he may be discharged or not by the House. At the conclusion of our authority on the 4th of March, he is still subject to that process wherever it may find him.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The grand jury is now in session.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I agree in the main with all that has been said by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR.] I think, however, he has overlooked one point. The House has already taken action with reference to this question. It has determined that this witness shall be held in custody until he shall purge himself of this contempt. Now it has become the duty of the Speaker under the statute to certify this case to the district attorney. Now the district attorney will find it to be his duty to proceed at once and have the case presented to the grand jury. But the court cannot get control of this case, or at least the body of this witness as a defendant, until the House is through with him. He is all the time in the charge and custody of the House; and although the Speaker does the duty which is required of him by the law, that does not in any sense take the case away from the House of Representatives. This is a distinct offense, and he is to be punished by the law of the land as any man is to be punished who commits a crime. Therefore I differ from the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR,] who, when the duty of the Speaker to certify the case to the courts has been carried out, would then seem to imply the case would be taken away from the control of the House of Representatives.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Not in the least.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. The gentleman from Iowa said so then.

Mr. KASSON. Not at all; but, on the contrary, the 4th of March, if not before.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Now, then, the grand jury cannot act on this case for a considerable time—cannot act on it until after that time; but it is the duty of the district attorney to bring it promptly before the grand jury, so he may be indicted and turned over to the courts when Congress is compelled to give him up, if before that time he has not purged himself of the contempt committed against the House of Representatives. Therefore I say there is nothing inconsistent at all in the Speaker certifying this case up to the district attorney—nothing inconsistent with the action of the House to-day. They are not in conflict at all.

Mr. MAYNARD. It seems to me this law is as plain as one can make it. It provides that any witness who shall fail to testify as provided in previous sections of the act and that fact is reported to the House, it shall be the duty of the Speaker of the House to certify, &c. Here the facts have not only been certified to the House, but it appears in the presence of the House itself that this witness does refuse to answer; and therefore the case contemplated in the third section of the act is made out, and the duty of the Speaker under the law is beyond his discretion and is mandatory.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has brought the matter to the attention of the House simply for the reason that in previous cases it may have been overlooked or neglected. As he reads the statute, the duty seems to be mandatory upon him officially; and unless otherwise instructed by the House, he will perform it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move the House adjourn.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. Before the motion to adjourn is put let me say that the duty of the Speaker cannot be such as to interfere with the bringing of this man before the Committee on Ways and Means as a witness.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not so understand it.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. The point I made a while ago was that the performance of that duty by the Speaker can in no way interfere with the action of the House hereafter. Although the witness may be indicted in a court in the District of Columbia, there would be no power on the part of any such court to take him out of the custody and control of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. The Chair merely desires to repeat that according to his reading of the statute his duty is plain. Should the House think otherwise, he would of course be governed by the expression of the House, if they made any such expression; but in absence of any such expression, the Chair will feel it to be his duty to certify the case up.

And then, on motion of Mr. GARFIELD, (at four o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BANNING: Paper relating to the application of Sarah Taylor for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts: The petition of Joseph Carter, for a pension, to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812.

By Mr. CALDWELL: The petition of citizens of Alabama, for the establishment of a mail-route from Red Sand, Cherokee County, Alabama, to Rock Mills, Randolph County, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Also, the petition of citizens of Georgia and Alabama, for the establishment of a mail-route from Bowden, Carroll County, Georgia, to Red Sand, Cherokee County, Alabama, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. CHITTENDEN: The petition of Moses Taylor & Co. and others, of New York, in respect to their just claims upon the so-called Geneva award for losses by confederate cruisers during the rebellion, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. GARFIELD: The petition of soldiers and sailors of the late war, for the equalization of bounties, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. HAGANS: The petition of John A. Thompson and others, of Jefferson County, West Virginia, for the passage of a law to authorize the issue of paper currency which shall be legal tender for all debts, public and private, and exchangeable for 3.65 bonds, and for the abolition of the national banking system, to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia: Papers relating to the claim of John Heater, of Loudon County, Virginia, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. G. F. HOAR: The petition of the Methodist Episcopal church of Winchester, Massachusetts, for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. LAWRENCE: The petition of Charles C. Hill, of Urbana, Ohio, to be reimbursed expenses incurred as paymaster's clerk, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. LOUGHRIDGE: Numerous remonstrances from citizens of Iowa, against the removal of the United States district court for Iowa from Keokuk to Burlington, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. LOWNDES: Memorial of the county commissioners of Frederick County, Maryland, asking an appropriation to rebuild bridges over the Monocacy River destroyed by Major-General Lewis Wallace, to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. McCRARY: The remonstrance of several thousand citizens of the southern division of the district of Iowa, against the removal of the United States court from Keokuk to Burlington, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, the remonstrance of citizens of Van Buren County, Iowa, of similar import, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. McDILL, of Wisconsin: Petitions of F. D. Demers and 28 others, and Oliver Demers and 27 others, of Barron County, Wisconsin, for reservation of lands to actual settlers within the limits of the Saint Croix land grant, to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. MONROE: The petition of colored citizens of Oberlin, Ohio, for the passage of the civil-rights bill, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SENER: The petition of William Tobb, of Spottsylvania County, Virginia, for indemnity for losses in the late war, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. STEPHENS: The petition of Mrs. Lucy R. Speer, widow of Thomas J. Speer, deceased, member of the Forty-second Congress, for relief, to the Committee on Accounts.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, January 7, 1875.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SCOTT presented a petition of workingmen, citizens of Huntingdon County, Pennsylvania, praying that the Texas and Pacific Railway Company's application for the guarantee by the Government of interest upon its bonds be granted; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. SCOTT. I present a petition of Pennsylvania soldiers, in the late rebellion, setting forth that their applications heretofore made to former sessions of Congress for a portion of the public lands to be set apart for their benefit and relief on such equal terms as were granted to soldiers and sailors of other wars, have failed to receive favorable response; that they are now in want of immediate aid, and asking the Government to grant unto each of them one hundred and sixty acres of the public lands, without restrictions or reservations. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask leave to present the petition of Jearum Atkins, asking a rehearing of a case before the Committee on Claims with reference to his patent for rakes for harvesters, and I move its reference to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SCOTT. As I recollect, that is a case in which there was an adverse report; and I would inquire of the Senator from Illinois whether this petition sets out new and additional evidence?

Mr. LOGAN. I think so; but I will not say that it does positively. I did not draught the petition. It was brought to me, and I introduce it for this old gentleman, he being a constituent of mine. He states in the body of the petition that he has new and additional evidence which will change the features of the case as it appeared before the committee; but what that evidence is, I do not know. He told me he would present the evidence to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. SCOTT. I do not desire to deprive the petitioner of the right to be heard; but I call the attention of the Senator for his constituent to the forty-ninth rule of the Senate, so that, upon examining that, unless this petition is brought within it, it will not be considered by the committee.

Mr. LOGAN. That rule requires that new evidence shall have been discovered.

Mr. SCOTT. And that the petition shall state specifically what the new evidence is. I only call the Senator's attention to it for the benefit of his constituent.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PRATT, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3707) granting a pension to Louisa Thomas, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2680) granting a pension to Mrs. Jane Dulaney, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3427) granting an increase of pension to Mary W. Shirk, widow of James W. Shirk, deceased, late commander in the United States Navy, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. INGALLS. The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a copy of a letter of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in relation to the sale of certain Indian lands in the State of Kansas, have had the same under consideration, and instruct me to report that as a bill upon this subject was passed at the last session of Congress they ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The committee will be discharged, if there be no objection.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. JOHNSTON (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1092) for the relief of Maria V. Brown, assignee of T. F. Brown; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1093) for the relief of Reuben Goodrich; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1094) for the relief of Francis M. King and Thomas Ross; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. McCREERY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1095) for the relief of Lafayette Elder; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1096) amendatory of the act in relation to the Hot Springs reservation in the State of Arkansas; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

GOLD BANKING ASSOCIATIONS.

Mr. SARGENT. I move that the Senate proceed to consider Senate bill 1068, which was reported from the Committee on Finance with some verbal amendments.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 1068) to remove the limitation restricting the circulation of banking associations issuing notes payable in gold was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill repeals so much of section 5185 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as limits the circulation of banking associations, organized for the purpose of issuing notes payable in gold, severally to $1,000,000, and provides that each existing banking association may increase its circulating notes, and new banking associations may be organized in accordance with existing law, without respect to such limitation.

The amendments reported by the Committee on Finance were in line 7 after the word "million" to strike out the word "of," and after the word "each" in line 8 to insert the words "of such."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ARKANSAS JUDICIAL DISTRICTS.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3621) to abolish the western district of Arkansas, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WRIGHT. I am authorized by the Committee on the Judiciary to offer a substitute for the bill, and when it is read I will explain the difference between the bill and the substitute.

The Chief Clerk read the proposed substitute, as follows:

That the judge of the district court for the eastern district of Arkansas shall hold the terms of the district court now provided by law in the western as well as in the eastern district of said State; and all judicial powers now exercised by or conferred upon the judge of said western district are hereby conferred upon and shall be exercised by the judge of the said eastern district of Arkansas; and all acts and parts of acts providing for the appointment of a district judge for said western district of Arkansas are hereby repealed.

SEC. 2. That section 2153 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

In executing process in the Indian country, the marshal may call to his aid to assist in executing process by arresting and bringing in prisoners from the Indian country one person when necessary, or two when the judge of his district shall certify in writing that two are necessary, and they shall each be allowed for their services, in lieu of all expenses, three dollars per day. When two are deemed insufficient, the marshal shall apply for aid to the nearest commanding officer of the Army, whose duty it shall be to furnish the men.

Mr. THURMAN. I suggest to the Senator from Iowa to let this bill go over until to-morrow, in order that the substitute may be printed, that we may have an opportunity to examine it.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have no objection to that, with the understanding that the Senator will call it up in the morning or allow me to do so in the morning hour to-morrow.

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly; it ought to be acted upon.

Mr. WRIGHT. It is important the bill should be disposed of at as early a day as possible. Let that be the unanimous understanding.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will lie over until to-morrow.

Mr. THURMAN. I understand it will be called up in the morning hour to-morrow.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move that the substitute offered by me be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

GENERAL SAMUEL W. CRAWFORD.

Mr. SCOTT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2093) for the relief of General Samuel W. Crawford, United States Army, which was reported by the Military Committee, to which I ask the attention of the chairman.

Mr. LOGAN. Does the Senator desire to call that bill up this morning?

Mr. SCOTT. I wanted to call the attention of the chairman to it.

Mr. LOGAN. I have an amendment to offer to it, which I left at my room, and I should like to submit it to the Senator before the bill is considered.

Mr. SCOTT. Very well; if it is not agreeable to the Senator to proceed with the bill this morning, I withdraw the motion. I am anxious to have it disposed of.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT PORTLAND, OREGON.

Mr. MITCHELL. I move to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 46) for the construction of a custom-house and bonded warehouse at Portland, Oregon.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Allow me to ask whether there is any communication from the Treasury Department in regard to it?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, sir, there is; or at least I have it at my desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oregon to take up the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I certainly am opposed to taking up any bill for the construction of new public buildings or incurring new items of expenditure, until the policy of the Government is determined as to whether or not new taxes are to be imposed. It is patent to every Senator that the Government of the United States is now running in debt. During the last month our deficiency was between three and four million dollars. We cannot enter into new sources of expenditure until we determine either to impose new taxes or to reduce the existing expenditures. It is perfectly idle for us to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to erect a new public building, even if the wants of the country be ever so great, until the main question is settled whether or not we are to leave open a deficiency of revenue, instead of providing new sources of revenue. I consider it my duty, therefore, to object to any proposition looking to new sources of expenditure, until the question is determined by the only authority in this Government—that is, the House of Representatives—whether new revenues shall be imposed on the people. I hope, therefore, the bill will not be taken up now.

Mr. MITCHELL. This matter was fully considered by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds at the last session, and the bill was unanimously reported. A recommendation has been made in very strong terms by the Treasury Department in favor of the construction of this very modest building at Portland, Oregon, a port where two hundred vessels were cleared last year. It is not a building for show, but simply a building which is absolutely demanded by the necessities of the Government at that place.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I concur with the Senator from Ohio, that the time has come when we must stop every expenditure that is not absolutely necessary, until by a diminution of our current expenses or an increase of revenue we shall get means by which these expenses are to be met.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, we seem to be somewhat unfortunate with our buildings in Oregon. A court-house, custom-house, and post-office, has been built at Portland, but it is so far from the steamboat landing, being more than a mile away, that it subjects the commerce in that city, which has increased very considerably within the last few years and is still further expected to increase, to great inconvenience. But we have a building at the Dalles still more inconvenient, costing over a hundred thousand dollars and nearly though not quite completed, which the Government has already abandoned. Now, the matter has come to us at the present session and been referred to the Committee on Finance on a proposition for an assay office at Portland; and there is no sort of doubt but what an assay office at Portland is more required than it is at Boise City, or at the Dalles. We have this building on hand at the Dalles, and I have proposed to some of the members that we should make a sort of Yankee trade and swap and give them that building, provided they furnish a store-house at Portland, but as yet I believe the terms have not been accepted. There is no question but what they need further accommodations at Portland, and there is still less question that we have been particularly unfortunate in locating some of our public buildings in Oregon and at Boise City.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oregon to take up the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like the sense of the Senate as to whether we shall embark in any new source of expenditure unless the occasion is of an extraordinary character, such as the use of a public building which may be rented is not. I ask whether the Senate are willing to take up new sources of expenditure until some provision is made to pay the expenditures already provided for by law. I think it would be bad policy for us to embark now in the building of public buildings of any kind whatever, indeed in any kind of expenditure that does not involve the actual public safety or the supreme public good, unless provision is made for new taxes or unless a very large reduction is made in the existing expenditures. It is a matter for the Committee on Appropriations to consider.

Now, it may be said that it is the duty of Congress to levy new taxes. Well, it is the duty of Congress to levy new taxes, but we are not the power to judge of that. The Senate of the United States cannot institute or originate a bill to tax the people of the United States. That is the constitutional privilege of the House of Representatives. They may in their own good time exercise that power and submit to us some proposition for increasing taxes. They have not done it yet; and until they do it, we have no right to extend the expenditures of the Government beyond the means now provided by the revenue laws; and we must unquestionably reduce our expenditures to the amount of revenue provided by law, or else we must in a time of profound peace increase our public debt for current expenditures. Under these circumstances certainly it is not wise for us to embark in the erection of any more public buildings or any new items of expenditures.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oregon.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 17, noes 18; no quorum voting.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I suggest to my friend from Oregon that he postpone this bill to a later period of the session, and then it can be judged better of by him, as well as by the Senate, whether it ought to pass or not. We have a custom-house at Portland, but it is too far off from the commerce of the place. It was thought at the Treasury Department that there ought to be better accommodations there; but I suggest to my friend that he will stand a much better chance for his bill if he postpones it until a later period of the session.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am disposed to listen to the suggestion of older Senators; but I know what it means perfectly. I understand what the postponement of the consideration of this bill to a later period of the session means. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion which I made.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us try it again by a count. We can save time in that way.

Mr. MITCHELL. I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will again divide the Senate on the motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by the Senator from Oregon.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 22, noes 18.

So the motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 46) for the construction of a custom-house and bonded warehouse at Portland, Oregon, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

An amendment was reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be constructed a suitable brick building, with a fire-proof vault extending to each story, at Portland, Oregon, for the accommodation of the United States custom-house and other Government offices; and the sum of $100,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose aforesaid; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause proper plans and estimates to be made so that no expenditure shall be made or authorized for the full completion of said building beyond the sum herein appropriated: Provided, That no money hereby appropriated shall be used or expended until a valid title to the land for a site, independent and unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings, shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of Oregon shall cede its jurisdiction over the same and also duly release and relinquish to the United States the right to tax or in any way assess said site or the property of the United States that may be thereon during the time that the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask if there is a report accompanying the bill?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is no report.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is there a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury recommending the bill?

Mr. MITCHELL. I send to the desk to be read a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., May 29, 1874.

SIR: Inclosed please find a communication from Hon. J. H. MITCHELL, United States Senator, recommending an appropriation for the construction of a plain and substantial brick warehouse in Portland, Oregon, for the use of the custom-house department in that city, the building being intended to be used as an appraisers' store and United States warehouse, and also to provide accommodations for the various officers of the custom-house.

I also inclose a report of the Supervising Architect on the subject, which fully sets forth the facts in the case, and have to say that the Department is satisfied that the interests of Government would be promoted by the erection of a plain, substantial brick building, to be used for the purpose indicated above.

The Department is fully satisfied that it is inexpedient to remove the custom-house to the new building, and also that the building is needed for the other branches of the Government service.

The Department has not felt during the present session of Congress authorized in recommending the erection of any new buildings. The present application, however, stands on a somewhat different footing, the building being intended for revenue purposes only, and not for the convenience of the citizens or for the ornamentation of the city of Portland. I therefore feel justified in commending the application to your most favorable consideration.

Very respectfully,

WM. A. RICHARDSON,
Secretary.

Hon. JUSTIN S. MORRILL,
Chairman Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, United States Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. Where is the report of the Supervising Architect?

Mr. MITCHELL. I send that report to the desk to be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF SUPERVISING ARCHITECT, May 29, 1874.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of a communication from Hon. J. H. MITCHELL, recommending the erection of a plain, substantial brick building in Portland, Oregon, in which to provide accommodations for the custom-house and appraisers' department and for the storage of bonded goods in that city; and have the honor to report the following as being the facts in the case:

The act approved July 20, 1868, authorized the erection of a custom-house, court-house, and post-office building at Portland, Oregon, in accordance with the authority contained in which the Department purchased, on the recommendation of Hon. H. S. Corbett, United States Senate, a block in the city of Portland for the sum of $15,000, and proceeded to erect a building thereon, which is now very nearly completed.

I visited Portland last summer for the first time, and found that the building was at least a mile and a half from the steamship landing, and that as a consequence the removal of the custom-house to the new building would compel shippers and officers of vessels to make a journey of at least three miles each time they had business with the custom-house. I also found that Portland was increasing rapidly in importance, and that the building was not larger than would be required by the post-office, United States courts, and the Internal-Revenue Department, in addition to which the Director of the Mint has notified me that it will be necessary to provide a room in the building for the assayer, should Congress decide to establish an assay office at that point, which the Director believes will be done, and which he strongly recommends. In this case it will be impossible to provide accommodations for the custom-house building. I have therefore to recommend that the custom-house be continued in the rented building where it is now situated, and that the plan suggested by Mr. MITCHELL be carried out at as early a day as the finances of the country will warrant.

I have been informed that the leading shipping merchants and shipping companies would be willing to give the Government a suitable site, provided authority can be obtained for the erection of a building. I am also of the opinion that it is for the interests of the Government to provide storage for the better class of bonded goods, and that a large revenue could be derived from such a building. My knowledge of the amount of business transacted at Portland is not sufficient to enable me to determine the size and consequently the cost of a suitable building, and I would suggest that authority be obtained to investigate the subject and determine the character and size of the building required.

Very respectfully,

A. B. MULLETT,
Supervising Architect.

Hon. WM. A. RICHARDSON,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SHERMAN. The purpose, it seems, is to erect a temporary building to cure a mistake made in the erection of the custom-house. A custom-house has already been built in Portland, Oregon, as in most of the capitals of the States, and is now there intact, in good order, but badly located, it seems, for the transaction of the business. Now it is proposed to erect a store-house for the purpose of supplying this defect. In New York City, and in most of the cities of the Union, the Government of the United States rents store-houses. There does not appear to be any difficulty in renting for a store-house a convenient building in Oregon. These recommendations are entirely based on the natural desire of our colleague, the Senator from Oregon, to get a new building in Portland in his State. There is no recommendation by any officer of the Government that this building should be commenced now. All these officers expressly say that this building ought to be erected as soon as the financial condition of the country shall authorize it. These letters were written at the last session. Congress at that time did not see proper to act upon them. Now the head of the Treasury Department tells us distinctly in his annual report to us that it would be improvident to commence any public buildings whatever in the present condition of the finances. We have this last statement of the Treasury Department against this or any similar appropriation of the kind; and what is proposed is a mere temporary provision at best, because if a new custom-house must be erected in Portland at some time, it ought to be erected in accordance with the general plan of the custom-houses throughout the country.

I appeal to the Senate whether, in the changed condition of our finances—because they stand much worse than they did six months ago when these letters were written—in view of the fact that at the last session of Congress no action was taken upon the subject, it not being deemed necessary to put it upon a regular appropriation bill or on a special bill, in view of the fact that during the last month the deficiency in revenue is $3,800,000, in view of the fact that our customs receipts have fallen off rapidly, amazingly, growing I think out of the habit of economy that has sprung up among the people and perhaps out of other causes—I ask whether it is wise for the Senate of the United States now to start new public buildings against the advice of the Secretary of the Treasury, and without any prospect of any increase in the public revenue?

I know it is very hard, and it is unpleasant for me and for any Senator to oppose the wishes of any of our body. Here in a small body of men, and when two Senators from the State of Oregon come here and say, "This is only $100,000; we can get along with this," it is hard to resist; but if we cannot resist their appeals, how can we resist the appeals that will be made from other quarters? How can we refuse to start other public buildings that have been recommended ten times as strongly as this by the former Secretary of the Treasury and the former Supervising Architect? How can we resist them? How could my colleague and I vote to resist any demand that may be made from our own State, as we have such demands from Cleveland and other places? We must do it as Senators of the United States. In view of the general condition of public affairs, in view of the condition of our finances, we must suspend and put a stop to all expenditures that are not really demanded by the present public exigency; and this is not such a case. It is the mere erection of a fire-proof warehouse which no doubt could be rented in Portland. Merchants no doubt could be found willing to build it on a reasonable contract to rent it and supply the defect really in the location of the custom-house. Under the circumstances, it does seem to me we should not make this an entering wedge even when we have two Senators who desire it as the two highly honorable Senators from the State of Oregon do. We must make a stand, and I appeal to the Committee on Appropriations whether they are prepared now to provide further appropriations when they know that the actual wants of the Government absorb every dollar of revenue that we can reasonably hope to come in under our existing laws; and I ask whether they see in the present condition of matters any prospect ahead for increased taxation or increased revenue from any source whatever. If not, it is their duty, not mine specially, to resist all propositions like this. I simply say, as the chairman of the Committee on Finance, that we have no power to impose new taxes, because we cannot act upon this question until the House of Representatives shall have acted, and I see no probability of their acting in that direction. Therefore we must confine ourselves within the present limits and revenues of the Government, and must cut our coat according to our cloth, or else run in debt, and I take it that nobody in this country desires at this time to run in debt beyond the ordinary revenues of the Government.

Mr. KELLY. I need hardly add anything to what has already been put before the Senate by the letters which have been presented from the Secretary of the Treasury and the Supervising Architect. They show the absolute necessity of some building of this kind for the accommodation of the custom-house at Portland. At present there are no accommodations of this kind. The building that was erected some time ago for that purpose is, as has already been shown, quite unsuitable for the purpose; it is situated a mile and a quarter or a mile and a half from the commercial point of the city of Portland. It is true that building was erected for a custom-house, court-house, and post-office, and it could hardly be expected, in the erection of one building for these three purposes, that the location could accommodate all. It is suitably located for the people of the city of Portland for a post-office, and so it is for a court-house; but the commercial interests of the city are at an entirely different place. While I admit that the financial condition of the country is such that we should consult economy, yet it is necessary that we should have some public building for the accommodation of the commercial interests of that city; we cannot get along conveniently without it. Oregon has asked very little; and let me say that it is better to economize in some other respects, say in the fortification bill. In that and in other appropriation bills that will be before us we can certainly lessen the expenditures $100,000 for the purpose of facilitating the commercial intercourse of the country. I hope, therefore, the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury will be adhered to, and that this bill will pass.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, this bill comes so near, in one regard, being a local measure, that I feel a reluctance, shared, I know, by other Senators, in interposing any objection to the wish of the Senators from the State to which it applies; but, in addition to the objections made by the Senator from Ohio, I submit that there is as utter an absence of justification for this bill on the case presented to us as could well occur in any instance of a proposal for a public building. Not only is there no recommendation from the Secretary of the Treasury, not only is there no recommendation from the Supervising Architect of this bill as proposed, but the facts, as they appear from all sources, teach me that this bill ought not to pass.

It is said that the custom-house in Portland, Oregon, is a mile and a quarter or a mile and a half from the floating place of commerce. I should not have been surprised at that statement, if the Senator from Vermont had not said that the building, for that reason, was deemed inconvenient. The custom-house in the city of Philadelphia, my honorable friend on my left [Mr. SCOTT] tells me, is at least two miles from the great center of commerce where it floats and lands; and, when you take into account the crowded and obstructed streets of a city so large as Philadelphia, inasmuch as time measures distance now, it is a great deal farther. The custom-house in the city of New York, in every practical sense, is farther from the place where merchandise floats and merchandise lands than it is in the city of Portland. I want to call the attention of the Senate to a fact, which I think is the prominent one presented here, in a moment. Store-houses, in the city of New York and elsewhere, are rented and located where convenience suggests. Such has been the case in Oregon; and now there comes from the Secretary of the Treasury and the Supervising Architect a suggestion that a store-house near to the landing-place of merchandise in Oregon would be a convenience; and the original bill referred to the committee proposed such a building for such a purpose. What have we now? A substitute from the committee, striking out everything after the enacting clause, in which I read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be constructed a suitable brick building, with a fire-proof vault extending to each story, at Portland, Oregon—

For what? Now I ask the attention of Senators—for the accommodation of the United States custom-house and other Government offices.

It is to be not only a warehouse but a custom-house; not only a custom-house but a building for the accommodation of all the United States offices.

There is another thing that I observe about this, Mr. President. The original bill contained these words:

A building suitable for the accommodation of the custom-house, bonded warehouse, and other Government offices in said city not now provided for.

There the Senate will see was a distinction. This building was to contain nothing except accommodation in respect of offices not provided for in the building already erected. Here comes a substitute which provides, ab initio, to set up a public building for all manner of purposes. Can the Senators from Oregon justify that at this time, and justify it upon the ground that the custom-house stands a mile and a quarter from the wharves at which vessels unload?

Mr. EDMUNDS. The custom-house in New York is farther than that from Jersey City.

Mr. CONKLING. My honorable friend from Vermont was not in a moment ago, I observe, by the suggestion he makes to me. He reminds me that the New York custom-house is practically farther off. So I said; so I said of the Philadelphia custom-house; and my honorable friend, more familiar with the location in Boston than I am, will bear me out in saying that a large part of the merchandise coming to the port of Boston is landed at a place farther from the custom-house than the landing-place in the city of Portland. The Presiding Officer of this body knows whether I am right in that regard or not.

Now, I submit, Mr. President, that if the Treasury was overrunning, if this was the accepted time for such a work, all that can be fairly said upon this evidence is that a warehouse near the sea is a convenience in Oregon, and under guise of that, having built a custom-house, and I am told an expensive custom-house, unobjectionable, except that it is a mile and a half from the water, we propose to go on and build another custom-house, another court-house, another post-office, a complete outfit of public buildings, according to the unmistakable language of this substitute.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator from New York allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator said there was no recommendation of this proposed building. I understand there has been a recommendation in the case by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Supervising Architect, and the proper construction, and the only construction that can be placed upon the language is that this recommendation is not based upon the fact that the custom-house is a long distance from the shipping, which is not so material, but it is based upon the other more material and important fact that in the building that was erected not solely for a custom-house, bear in mind, but as a custom-house, post-office, and court-house, there is no room for the custom-house. There is no room there, and it is inexpedient and improper, in the judgment of the Treasury Department, to remove the custom-house.

Mr. CONKLING. Does the Secretary of the Treasury say that?

Mr. MITCHELL. He does.

Mr. CONKLING. Not in the communication to which we listened.

Mr. MITCHELL. Here is what he says:

The Department is fully satisfied that it is inexpedient to remove the custom-house to the new building, and also—

Bear this in mind—that the building is needed for the other branches of the Government service.

What are the other branches of the Government service for which accommodation is needed?

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator will pardon me at this moment, I challenged that the Secretary of the Treasury said the present building was not large enough. Under that allegation the Senator reads from the Secretary that he deems it inexpedient to remove the custom-house to the new building. The Secretary nowhere says that it is not large enough.

Mr. MITCHELL. He does say that the building "is needed for the other branches of the Government service," in so many words.

Mr. SHERMAN. That it is needed for an assay office which has never been established by law.

Mr. MITCHELL. I beg pardon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CONKLING. I yield with pleasure to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not know that there is any reference in any communication of the Treasury Department to any assay office.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, I beg to read the strongest suggestion coming from anybody in this behalf, and that is from the Supervising Architect of the Treasury:

I also found that Portland was increasing rapidly in importance, and that the building was not larger than would be required by the post-office, United States courts, and the Internal-Revenue Department, in addition to which the Director of the Mint has notified me that it will be necessary to provide a room in the building for the assayer, should Congress decide to establish an assay office at that point.

Nobody will doubt that the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, speaking as he did, honestly, in my belief always, speaking notwithstanding with something of the pride of a man who was constructing most creditable public buildings, visiting Oregon, said, of the future, that it was growing in importance and that this building would be—when? At some time in the future, which he thought he could safely make a remark about—no larger than would be necessary for all these various purposes, including the internal-revenue office. How long is the internal revenue in this country to need offices? Very likely had the architect thought of that, it might have occurred to him that the necessity for internal-revenue accommodations would subside just about the time when they ultimately get ready for this room of the assayer, or when Portland has flourished until she has grown up beyond the capacity of this building.

Mr. President, it is an utter fallacy, I undertake to say, to suppose, in the language of one of the Senators, that shippers, thereby meaning either the owners of merchandise or the masters of vessels, go to and fro on these errands to the custom-house. It is not so. Owners go to warehouses; clerks and agents go to the custom-house. The business is formulated and understood, and as to its being a part of its necessity that all the men engaged as owners and otherwise pass to and fro between the wharf at which merchandise lands and the office where some manifest is exhibited, no such thing exists. On the contrary, the warehousing of the goods is the point which convenience requires to be somewhat proximate to the landing-place; and beyond that I undertake to say that nothing is shown in this case which cannot be demonstrated in the case of every large seaport city in the way of inconvenient distance between the ship and the custom-house.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning hour having expired, the Chair will call up the unfinished business of yesterday, which is the resolution introduced by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN.]

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLINTON LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 103) granting the Memphis and Vicksburgh Railroad Company the right of way along the river bank at the national cemetery at Vicksburgh, Mississippi;

A bill (H. R. No. 1678) to provide for post-quartermaster-sergeants;

A bill (H. R. No. 2724) for the relief of certain States and Territories on account of ordnance stores issued to them during the late civil war;

A bill (H. R. No. 3823) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876;

A bill (H. R. No. 4187) to donate certain artillery equipments, &c., to the trustees of the Soldiers' Orphans' Home of the State of Illinois;

A bill (H. R. No. 4188) to release the Fort Butler military reservation;

A bill (H. R. No. 4185) for the relief of Brevet Brigadier-General B. S. Roberts; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4190) for the relief of William H. Carmen.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 1044) to provide for the resumption of specie payments.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (H. R. No. 2032) to amend section 2324 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the development of the mining resources of the United States; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3745) to remove the political disabilities of James Howard, of Baltimore, Maryland.

BILLS RECOMMITTED.

Mr. OGLESBY. I ask permission for one moment to make a motion. I ask the Senate to reconsider the vote to indefinitely postpone a bill at the last session, being the bill (S. No. 578) granting a pension to Elizabeth Loebrick. It was indefinitely postponed, and we can only get it back before the committee by the unanimous consent of the Senate to its reconsideration. I ask that it may go back, for the reason that I made the report in the case myself without having all the papers before me as I now find out; and in justice to the petitioner I think the bill ought to go back again to the committee for re-examination with the papers that were overlooked at the time. I ask unanimous consent to the reconsideration of the vote postponing the bill indefinitely, and that it be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions, with all the papers in the case.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the reconsideration proposed? The Chair hears none, and it is now moved that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

JEFFERSON W. DAVIS.

On motion of Mr. FENTON, it was Ordered, That the bill (H. R. No. 1054) granting a pension to Jefferson W. Davis, first lieutenant of Company F, Sixty-fourth Regiment New York Volunteers, reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment on the 9th of June last, be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions.

LAFAYETTE ELDER.

Mr. McCREERY. I ask for the adoption of the following order:

Ordered, That the Quartermaster-General be directed to transmit all papers in the case of Lafayette Elder to the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. "Copies" it ought to be.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be so modified.

Mr. SCOTT. I would suggest to the Senator from Kentucky that I do not know that that order is necessary or that it is customary, or even proper that the Senate should order the Quartermaster-General to send papers here; but I will say to him that the practice of the Committee on Claims has been, whenever papers of that kind are required, to request the Quartermaster-General to send them. I never before heard of the Senate making such an order on the Quartermaster-General. I will say to the Senator that the committee will send to the Quartermaster-General to get such papers as are necessary in the examination of the case.

Mr. McCREERY. The papers are necessary and the Quartermaster-General has them. I withdraw the order, however, at the suggestion of Senators.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. HARVEY, it was Ordered, That the memorial of Michael Hennessy, praying to be allowed a pension on account of services in the Mexican war, be withdrawn from the files and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

USE OF THE ARMY IN LOUISIANA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution, submitted by Mr. THURMAN on the 5th instant:

Resolved, That the President of the United States is hereby requested to inform the Senate whether any portion of the Army of the United States, or any officer or officers, soldier or soldiers of such Army, did in any manner interfere or intermeddle with, control or seek to control, the organization of the General Assembly of the State of Louisiana or either branch thereof on the 4th instant; and especially whether any person or persons claiming seats in either branch of said Legislature have been deprived thereof, or prevented from taking the same, by any such military force, officer, or soldier; and if such has been the case, then that the President inform the Senate by what authority such military intervention and interference have taken place.

The pending question being on the amendment of Mr. CONKLING to insert the words "if in his judgment not incompatible with the public interests," after the word "requested."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. HAMILTON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I yield to the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON,] who desires to have a few minutes for a personal purpose.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. President, I rise to make a personal explanation, and I ask the attention of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.] During the debate of yesterday, in reply to some harsh words addressed by the Senator from Vermont to me personally, I allowed myself to be betrayed by the use of the phrase "irresponsibility" into an injustice to that Senator. I desire to say that the responsibilities of the Senator, as a statesman, as a jurist, and as a member of society—and I referred to no other—are in my opinion of the highest order and most honorable character. Having under the impulse of the moment done injustice to his character, to my own estimate of that character, as well as to my personal feelings for the Senator, I wish now, in the presence of the Senate, to express to him personally my sincere regrets for not taking leave, as I might under the usages of the Senate have done, to erase anything of a personal character in the revision of my remarks, and I now make the only reparation left me.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I certainly express my obligations to the honorable Senator from Georgia for the very handsome way in which he has spoken touching what I felt yesterday he would believe, on reflection, was an injustice to me; and I can say with great sincerity in reply that I did not intend yesterday to address to him any harsh remark, or to reflect upon his personal conduct or character in any manner whatever. If he so understood me, I am very sorry for it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING.]

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Mr. President, the country was startled a few mornings since by the intelligence that the State-house of the State of Louisiana was in possession of soldiers of the United States, interfering with the organization of the Legislature of that State. Necessarily this gave rise to great excitement and comment; and from the almost unprecedented—I may say with but one exception in this country the entirely unprecedented seizure of the State-house by the Federal troops, the people of the country might well take alarm, and every friend of free institutions and constitutional liberty should feel himself called upon to do something to promote the expression of a proper sentiment touching such a condition of things. It was felt, I do not doubt, as well upon the other side of the Chamber as upon this. We have not been accustomed to such scenes in this land of constitutional liberty, however usual it may have been in other countries and under all forms of government, whether monarchical, aristocratical, or republican. Therefore, the Senate of the United States being in session, every member—I take it for granted—on this floor, as well on the other side of the Chamber as on this, desired to know the reasons why such an extraordinary spectacle was presented to the American people. That gave rise to the resolution introduced by the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] and that resolution has been the cause of this debate.

It is always becoming in this body to be respectful to the Chief Magistrate. That is a part of our public duty. No one understands this better than the honorable Senator from Ohio, and no one is more disposed than he to observe all rules of decorum. The resolution he offered was drawn in respectful terms, requesting the Chief Magistrate to communicate to Congress the reasons why soldiers of the United States were in the State-house of Louisiana interfering with the organization of the Legislature of that sovereign State.

Senators on the other side of the Chamber felt the force of that resolution; nay I do not question but that they felt the propriety of it; and addressed to another President of the United States, not in such close relations with them, I feel that it would have passed without a single word of comment. However, exceptions were taken to the language of the resolution, or rather not to the language itself but to the omission of certain words in the resolution. It was thought by the honorable Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] that it was not sufficiently courtly in its phraseology. I do not question that had that honorable Senator drawn the resolution himself, under any administration of the Government, whether inimical to him in its political opinions or not, he would have drawn it just as he desired this one should have been drawn; but other Senators, not quite so courtly in their language, not quite so polite probably in their intercourse with men generally or with officers of the Government as that Senator, though as respectful as even he could wish to be, thought proper to use the language of the Senator from Ohio, as incorporated in the resolution submitted by him, and which the honorable Senator from New York would seem to think too curt to be considered in parliamentary language a simple request instead of a specific demand.

I am not here to contend over terms or words. The resolution in either aspect would answer all the purposes. The resolution is sufficiently respectful, and trenches upon no executive right. It requests the President of the United States to communicate certain information to this honorable body, a co-ordinate department of this Government, equal in dignity and authority, and entitled to as much consideration as that department which the President represents. Surely so, sir, and I believe, furthermore, that the President will be satisfied, nay, in view of the responsibility of the proceeding, be only too glad to respond to the resolution in the belief that he has the means of justification. Indiscriminately, and under all administrations, offered by friend and foe, resolutions similar to this one have been passed. But I am not here, I repeat, to dispute about words or forms or phrases. The resolution is right, and it answers the purpose; whether it is polished by one phrase or another, is perfectly immaterial. I shall not vote for the amendment offered by the honorable Senator from New York, for it amounts to nothing that is material or substantial. I consider the resolution as worded appropriate and respectful, but in either form it will accomplish all the objects desired.

But in that very amendment offered to the resolution by the Senator from New York was manifested a sensibility on that side of the Chamber which one could not fail to observe. Feeling was touched; anxiety betrayed, hesitancy for a time as to what course to pursue, but finally it seemed to settle down to a support of the resolution, whether amended or not.

But in the debate on the resolution, as to the effect particularly of its language, the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE,] noted for the logical characteristics which would have given him eminence among even the most disputative philosophers of the old Greek schools, undertook to demonstrate these two propositions: First, that the President was Commander-in-Chief of the Army; and, second, that the President would answer if he chose. I admit the truth of both propositions.

As to the first, as President he is Commander-in-Chief of the Army of the United States; and the honorable Senator very significantly said, for he feels possessed of power in this capital and in every State of the Union, that the President could use that Army as well in the capital of the State of Ohio as he did in the capital of the State of Louisiana. Upon that point I am not willing to enter into any dispute. That is the opinion of the honorable Senator; but I want that honorable Senator to understand that the President of the United States is Commander-in-Chief of our Army, of the Army of the people of the United States, created by them, sustained by them, fed by them, not, I trust, that its bayonets should be pointed against the people who themselves give life and being to it, as in this case has been done by a portion of it.

Mr. HOWE. My friend, of course, in replying to what I said, wants to understand what I did say.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Certainly, sir.

Mr. HOWE. He evidently, if he apprehended my language, did not apprehend the point of it. I think my language was that I was in hopes it would turn out, when the information called for was communicated, that the President had done nothing with the Army in Louisiana that he could not and would not be required to do with equal promptitude in Columbus, Ohio, or any other capital.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I understood the significance of the language of the honorable Senator. It was that, having this power, the President commanding the Army would exert it just as he thought proper, as in his judgment the exigency should require, whatever that might be. I understand the point very well. But I was saying that it is our Army, organized by the people, the instrument of the people, and not of the President of the United States or of any governor of any State, and especially not of any mere party.

As to the second, the honorable Senator says that the President may or may not respond to our request. True; but a respectful message like this, from one of the co-ordinate branches of this Government to the Executive, I trust will be replied to and without hesitation; but if in his judgment the public interests require that he should not respond, he can so communicate to this body and give the reasons why he declines. I take it for granted he would do so. If he should communicate the information which is requested by the resolution, then we are prepared to act with knowledge; but if he should refuse, then we can take means to derive the desired information from other sources.

If the President refuses to tell us why he had soldiers of the United States in the capital of the State of Louisiana upon that day surrounding the State-house and upon the very floor of the legislative halls, we as representatives of the States ought to be able to find some means by which we should arrive at the real facts of the case. And we will do it. We have the remedy in our hands and can apply it; and whatever the Executive may do with the soldiers of the United States, we have them still within our own control.

If the President should refuse to give to this body and to the House of Representatives the information requested by either as to the disposition of troops that he was then making, and which disposition might be arousing the fears and apprehensions of the country, either branch of Congress could refuse to vote supplies for the support of that Army; or the united action of both could disband that Army and leave no Federal soldier to tell the tale of its organization. Congress can strip the Executive of every armed soldier in the land, take from him every vessel of war, and all the cannon, now pointed upon the defenseless city of New Orleans.

These are some of the resources of our power when we are called upon to exercise it, and they are our great security. If the Executive undertakes to put itself above the people and above Congress, and undertakes to use the Army of the United States for improper and unlawful purposes, we can arrest not only the march of that Army, but we can arrest it by even a majority vote, nay by non-action itself. It requires no articles of impeachment; it requires no trial in this Chamber where two-thirds are needed to convict. No; a simple majority of the representatives of the American people can stay the march of that Army by refusing to vote it supplies. Here is a remedy against an Executive who would treat this body and the House of Representatives and the people of this country in any such manner. Honorable Senators on the other side of the Chamber will understand that I do not undertake to say that the Executive will refuse to answer this request for information and give to us what has occurred in the city of New Orleans and in that State-house, although of course it will be done in his own mode and manner. We cannot write the communication for him or direct how the facts shall be communicated. He will have a defense, no doubt, and that defense is to be passed upon by this body, by the House of Representatives, by the American people, and he is to stand or fall upon that defense. Therefore the importance of deliberation, for it is a grave matter; it does thrill the American heart; it does affect the American mind that in this land of liberty, of law, of order, and of constitutional forms of government, we should see Federal soldiery—not the soldiery of a State, not the citizens of a State, but hired soldiery, as alien almost to the people of the State as the soldiery of a foreign power, march into the capitol of a sovereign State and disperse the representatives of a free people. It is a thought that ought to thrill the American heart and the American mind, and it will tell upon the American people. They have their modes and means of redress and we have ours as their Representatives; and if we should fail to disband an army employed in any such unlawful and unholy act, not being able in any other way to arrest the Executive arm in thus striking down the liberties of any portion of our people, we should be false to our duty. This is not revolutionary, nor in my judgment ill-timed. We have been taught by our liberty-loving ancestors that the great hold that the English Parliament had upon the King and upon all his kingly prerogatives was the control of the army in granting supplies. It was their charter of liberty by which the Parliament held possession of that army and restrained the power of its kings.

The act of Congress of 1795 providing for the suppression of insurrection and of domestic violence in all proper cases and when it could be lawfully done under the Constitution and its limitations, and to that end authorizing the President to call out the militia, did not authorize the employment of the regular Army, and it was not until 1807, and by the act passed that year, that the President could use the regular soldiery at all for such purpose.

There must have been a reason for the omission in the act of 1795, and it may have been the fear of putting down such violence by the mere soldier, who, from his employment and discipline, had nothing in common with the citizen, but rather that the people themselves should, when called on, suppress it.

Therefore, Mr. President, so far as that is concerned, we want this information in order that we may take the proper means of redress if anything should be wrong. I am not here to misjudge or misstate facts. I admit that in the discussion of this resolution we have been thrown upon a wide sea of fact and of conjecture, and that we should not come to conclusions, or hasty action, without a full knowledge of all the circumstances surrounding this most extraordinary case; but we have enough upon the appearance of things, we have enough shadowed forth; we have the simple, glaring, prominent fact, that in the State-house of the State of Louisiana Federal soldiers marched upon the day of the organization of the Legislature of that State and interfered in that organization to put the Administration—to put the Executive upon his defense and to show good cause why this was done, if any cause under any circumstances could justify such a proceeding.

Mr. President, the discussion has taken a wide range. We have gone far beyond the simple terms of the resolution and its construction. We are now debating upon facts which we expect to get officially under this very resolution; and what we do not know absolutely as facts, as gathered from the dispatches or current news in the papers, we supplement with conjecture. In order to justify this interference of the Executive, imaginary facts are pressed into service. It goes to show how delicate this subject must be to our friends on the other side of the Chamber. Unable on the first blush of this case to justify any such action, they put their wits to work to imagine a state of facts by which Federal troops might be intruded into the State-house of that State upon that occasion and their action justified. The honorable Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE,] to whom I shall now address myself in some comments upon the position he took upon one of his own supposed statements of facts that might have justified this interference of the Executive, put this proposition to this body for your consideration and for the consideration of his own constituents and of the American people:

I want to say also—

Says that honorable Senator—

before I sit down, that if it should turn out, after all, that the Army was not employed yesterday in New Orleans to prevent the organization of a Legislature, but simply to aid the organization of a Legislature—

The Army of the United States, the hired soldiery of the United States, to aid in the organization of the legislative body of a sovereign State!

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator be kind enough to read a little further?

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Yes, sir.

and that it was put in motion upon the direct call of the executive of that State, the Legislature not being in session.

Does my honorable friend mean to say that? By what authority, I would ask that Senator, was the governor to aid in the organization of the Legislature any more than that soldiery he called upon and who did it? What, sir, has it come to this, I again ask that honorable Senator, that the governor of a State has a right to organize a Legislature, or to aid in the organization of a Legislature? His duties are prescribed by law, and that is not one of them. The Legislature has its appropriate functions; and one of them, and that which exclusively belongs to it, is to organize itself. Who constitutes the Legislature and who are the judges of its members? By the constitution of Louisiana, the respective houses of the Legislature are the sole judges of the elections, returns, and qualifications of their own members, and not the governor of the State of Louisiana; and this I would wish to impress upon the mind and conscience of that Senator. That Legislature must organize itself, and that should be done without any other human interference, for all other interference is unlawful. If the organic law, which is supreme, prescribes a mode, that mode must be observed, but nothing beside; all else may be directory, as that passed by a preceding Legislature, for illustration, but not authorized or warranted by the organic law. It is not binding and cannot be in the nature of things upon the succeeding Legislature.

The presumption in law is that Legislatures will organize, and do so properly. The fact is that they generally so do without disorder. Just here, having in my eye the honorable Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. WEST,] who stated that if there was a legislative enactment prescribing how a future Legislature should be organized, it could not be legally organized unless it followed the forms thus prescribed. I deny the legal conclusion that the Senator would attribute to any such legislative enactment. Such enactments for precaution's sake may be passed as tending to preserve order, but they can have no legal binding power upon an incoming Legislature. The Constitution may do it; or if the constitution of the State authorizes it to be done, that is another question; but that a Legislature preceding the one that is coming into power has upon its own mere motion, and without any warrant in the constitution, the power to declare how it shall be organized, and that that incoming Legislature is bound by such declaration I deny. It cannot be done. There is nothing that can justify any such encroachment of one Legislature upon the rights and powers of any future one. The Legislature elected by the people in conformity to the constitution, and duly returned as required, is that body which has supreme control over its own organization, and only qualified by the limitations of the constitution of the State and the laws authorized by it to be passed in relation to the organization. The organization is a fact; it is an entity; and whether that organization is effected by a clerk of the past house who may hold over, either by courtesy or by some statute, or by any other power or in any other way—the organization, in fact, settles all controversy; for then instead of being only members holding general relations to each other by virtue of their elections, it is a body, a Legislature into which individuality is absorbed.

Mr. WEST. Will the Senator permit me a question?

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Certainly.

Mr. WEST. The Senator contends that the Legislature of Louisiana cannot prescribe the form of the organization of its successors.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Unless it is provided for in the constitution.

Mr. WEST. Allow me to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the words of the Constitution of the United States and the words of the constitution of Louisiana are precisely similar; and that the House of Representatives here prescribes the manner of the organization of its successor.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. There is nothing in that or in what the law of Congress says. The House of Representatives, when it meets, is authorized to organize by virtue of its election, and not by the authority of any law passed by any preceding Congress. It is required to meet, and it alone is to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its members. No other power or person on earth can do this for it. For if otherwise, in great partisan extremity and where some advantage might be taken in having precedent legislation of the kind to control or direct the organization of an incoming legislative body, the very worst species of legislation could be inaugurated for the studied purpose of preventing the organization or of involving in trouble a legally-elected Legislature. Such legislation is in itself an infringement on the rights conferred by the constitution of the State upon those men who are elected as the Legislature, and also upon the inherent and natural rights belonging to it for its own existence and independence. And so careful in language is the Constitution of the United States, as well as of all the States, in this respect, and, as stated by the Senator from Louisiana, the language of the constitution of Louisiana, that the independence of one branch of the Legislature cannot in any way be violated by the action of the other, or by the joint action of both, under the ordinary forms of legislation.

I give the section in point—the fifth section of article 1, Constitution of the United States—

Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members; and a majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do business; but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members, in such manner and under such penalties as each House may provide.

Mark the language—each House! Each House shall act for itself. Each House is independent, as it should be, from any control by the other in this respect, and surely independent of any other power. Each House has in its own keeping its own existence, its own integrity as a House, and no one besides has the rightful power to interfere.

By virtue of that constitution as soon as the people have cast their votes and the proper returns are made and it is ascertained who are elected as prescribed by law, that concludes the subject, and those who are thus elected are members of the Legislature, entitled to act in that capacity, and no one besides; and no antecedent prescription of any preceding Legislature can make it otherwise, nor can it by any pretense of establishing rules to govern organization, generally, qualify or in any way restrain or impinge upon the absolute rights of such elected members to organize themselves into a legislative body as they shall for themselves determine. I know that there are laws passed directing the mode and manner of organization, and I suppose generally observed; but upon great occasions either of sentiment or of interest, in times of great party excitement, when passion is inflamed, when the blood is hot under the idea of incoming or of departing power, then are the times when our institutions are put to the test, and then too we are obliged, if at any time, to go back to elementary principles and rely upon the rights and powers secured by the organic law which gave them being.

Will the Senator from Wisconsin say that these regular soldiers were justified in organizing or, taking his own language, aiding to organize this body, because the governor of that State directed them to do it? I ask that honorable Senator whether there is any precedent for any such thing as that in the history of this country? Shall I demand from him the law under which it could be done? Did any governor, anywhere, ever before call upon the soldiers of the United States to enter the State-house of a State, and there, distinguishing between individuals on the floor of the legislative chamber, put out certain ones and allow others to remain? Did any governor ever before dream of possessing such power by virtue of any law, and particularly under the clause of the Constitution which authorizes him upon a proper occasion to call upon the Executive of the United States to suppress domestic violence or insurrection?

Mr. HOWE. Did the Senator put that question to be answered?

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Yes, sir; if the Senator chooses.

Mr. HOWE. I am not so familiar with the history of this country as I ought to be. I am not prepared to say, at this moment, that there has ever been an instance of the kind. I am very much in hopes that, if we ransack the history of the country, it will turn out that there has never been a precedent of the kind, and I pray my God most earnestly that there may be no other instance of the kind; but I shall take occasion by and by to tell the Senator from Maryland that, if the President of the United States did what I assumed the other day in the absence of information he did do, he did no more than what the laws of the country charge upon every President in such a case.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. That the governor of a State can require the President of the United States to command soldiers to march into the State-house, into the halls dedicated to the purposes of legislation, to aid in organizing a Legislature! Think of it! That the governor of a State can call upon soldiers of the United States to aid in organizing a Legislature! That is the Senator's language—"to aid in organizing the Legislature!" That is American statesmanship belonging to the period in which we now live—none other.

My honorable friend says that he does not wish that there should be any more such precedents. Neither do I. But there have been occasions when just such things might have been done on the same theory now advanced by the Senator. There was one memorable occasion in the State of Ohio when you had tumult and disorder, if there can be tumult and disorder in having two presiding officers sitting near by one another in the same hall and presiding over two distinct and separate bodies, each claiming to be the rightful Legislature and each attempting to legislate for the same State. This continued for three weeks or thereabout before any adjustment was had by which the regular order of things was once more established. Here in the case of Louisiana, if the facts alleged be true, we do not see any such exhibition as that—two houses and two speakers for three weeks in the same room amid tumult and disorder undertaking to legislate for a State and doing this without interruption or attempted interruption by any officer or person. With a knowledge of constitutional law like that of the Senator from Wisconsin the governor with the aid of soldiers of the United States could have soon solved the trouble! He could have proclaimed one or the other illegal, and have called upon the President to have dispersed either as a lawless mob.

In the case before us how different? The members of the body assembled in the proper chamber and organized; whether in some respects hasty or irregular in their action, they nevertheless organized. Five men peaceably sitting there among the recognized members of the body, who were candidates before the people in different parishes of the State of Louisiana, and as against whom and as against whose undoubted election the turpidity of the returning board could not find itself mean enough and reckless enough to give certificates of election to their opponents; but having by its dishonest action given certificates of election so as to secure a republican majority in the House, referred then those gentlemen to its tender mercies; and those five gentlemen, sitting quietly in seats in that body, it is claimed, created the domestic violence in that house which it was the duty of the governor to suppress, and to be assisted by United States troops! What a caricature upon domestic violence! What a folly are written constitutions if all this be real! All the other persons upon the floor were acknowledged to be members of the body, and these five were unquestionably elected as members of the body, and whose cases were expressly referred to the body by the returning board to be passed upon by it, and which were in fact, if reports be true, passed upon by the body and admitted to seats as members. The governor, the usurping governor—I call him governor, but he is not governor any more than I am, of the State of Louisiana, fairly chosen by the people to that position—that governor determines that it would not do that these five gentlemen should be seated as members, and accordingly directs United States troops to arrest them, those five gentlemen who were sitting quietly in their seats in that body, where they had the equitable right to be, nay the legal right to be, until they were turned out by the body itself. And you call that disorder! You call that tumult! You call that domestic violence requiring the aid of the Army of the United States to suppress!

No, Mr. President. Let us not be deluded by any such folly. It was simply an arrest of quiet citizens disturbing no one and without any warrant of law. Nay, it was graver than that, as grave in itself as that could be to any American who cherishes the personal liberty of the citizen; it was an invasion, a ruthless, reckless, wanton invasion of the sacred halls of legislation where the sovereignty of the people dwells as in the very temple of Liberty itself, and from whence should always emanate their will in the laws which are to govern society, independent of any other power and free from all restraint other than that imposed by the Constitution which gives to its expression the force of law.

Mr. President, there are other instances where the Executive might have interfered on the same principle. You remember the tumult and violence that occurred in the State of Pennsylvania, I think in 1838, in the organization of the Legislature of that State. We all remember it. Why did not the governor interfere then? Why did he not call upon the President then? The idea of interfering in the tumult of a legislative body just attempting to organize had not then been originated. The sovereignty of the people as represented in its highest character, functions, and attributes in the halls of legislation was then regarded with a veneration approaching awe. There was then no sacrilegious hand to assail its independence or corrupt its integrity.

There may be tumult in a legislative body; there may be disorder and violence; but we must remember with all that when any one interposes to put it down he is approaching the very sanctuary of all political power and of all social order. If the persons elected by the people cannot meet together quietly in order to take upon themselves the great trust committed to them as they should, and as they did when legislative bodies first were organized, and whence we have a regular succession, there is an end to republican government, there is an end to regular representative government, there is an end to free institutions; and we might be obliged, in order to have peace at any price, to turn to that condition of things when the executive, with the soldiery of the country, is to initiate legislative assemblies, see to their organization, and, as a consequence of all, concentrate upon himself all the powers of government.

Mr. President, there is another instance, that of the contested seats of the New Jersey delegation in the other House of Congress. The members sat for days without any one presiding. There was tumult and there was disorder at times among the members. Those who claimed seats by virtue of certificates, and those who were really elected, but had no certificates, were present. The political power of the House was supposed to depend upon that delegation. After a fearful excitement wise and temperate counsels prevailed, and there was a temporary organization by consent. It might have been so here; but it was not. Suppose it had been otherwise in that case; suppose the members of that House would not have agreed; suppose they would not have organized; would that have justified the President of the United States, though it was in the District of Columbia, to have marched his soldiery into the Hall of the House of Representatives and to have arrested and excluded five or any number of either those who held or those who did not hold certificates of election? No, sir. They might have remained there in that condition until the law of necessity proved stronger than faction, until a sense of propriety, patriotism, love of order, their sense of duty, should have rebuked their conduct, and should have directed different action; but in the absence of all that, and until this spirit began to prevail, I ask you again whether the President of the United States could have marched his soldiery into that House of Representatives, arrested persons upon the floor claiming to be members and not excluded by the body in session, and thus, in the language of the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, "could have aided that House of Representatives to organize?"

Nay, more, within my own personal experience the House of Representatives sat for three weeks balloting for Speaker. I remember—it was just in the initiative days of political freesoilism and abolitionism, when it was first acquiring political significance in the organization of a political party, and I remember well the men who represented that spirit or sentiment in that House then, and how they moved amid the disturbed elements which the condition of parties in the country had sent into that House. We remained for weeks without a Speaker, voting day after day, and varied at times with tumult and disorder; but at length the sense of propriety, the love of order, the fear of anarchy, and the sense of duty prevailed, and the House finally organized. The members of that body met daily, proceeded in the regular discharge of duty in the election of a Speaker, daily failed for three weeks or more to organize, finally organized, and without any power to compel them to do it, save their simple duty.

Suppose that it had been otherwise; that amid the hot blood growing out of the exciting questions of the day and of the condition of parties, by which on that floor neither had an absolute majority, the members could not and would not agree to an organization and had kept on voting, and thus had put a stop to all legislation, or not being able to agree upon an organization the members should have dispersed and gone to their homes, would that have justified the President of the United States in marching his soldiery into the House of Representatives to organize that body, or to aid in organizing that body, either by the arrest and exclusion, or by the admission of any particular members? Or in case the members should have dispersed, could he have arrested them, brought them back, and compelled an organization? No one conceives any such thing.

When our American governments get to that point, when the representatives of the people fail to meet, or fail to organize, and refuse to proceed with regular legislation, then there is anarchy, then there is revolution, then the people must act for themselves, and just as the exigencies may require; but that gives no power to the President nor to any governor to organize legislative bodies and compel legislation; nor can either direct how such bodies shall be organized. Mr. President, I have noticed instances where this power of executive interference might have been used with just as much propriety as it has been in Louisiana. It was used in Maryland. True it was not used to organize a Legislature there, but to control legislation by arresting nearly all the members of a Legislature, imprisoning some of them; in fact breaking it up; but that was in times of war, say the apologists of this outrage; and I am willing if they are to get by the war if I can.

Mr. SCOTT. McClellan did that.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I do not care if it was done by McClellan. That does not make it right. I do not care any more for General McClellan than for President Grant. I never did consider it the duty of officers and soldiers to be arresting legislators in the discharge of their constitutional duties; and one doing it does not make it any more commendable to me than if done by another.

I have shown instances where there was just such an opportunity for executive interference. Now, let me come for a moment to the facts in this case, and see whether there is any material fact already ascertained, from the telegraphic communications and newspaper reports in relation to the conduct of Mr. Kellogg. I have before me a portion of the examination and evidence of Mr. Kellogg, as given in the newspapers, in regard to this very matter; and if you agree with me that, though recognized by the President, the governor has no power to direct a soldiery to aid in the organization of the Legislature, it is precisely what he has done and nothing else. He declared the body organized by the election of Mr. Wiltz as speaker to be an illegal assembly, and directed the soldiery to exclude from the hall all persons not returned by the returning board. They marched into that hall for that purpose, not to control a tumult, not to quiet disorder, not to suppress domestic violence, but to arrest and take five men from that body. They were there. Their respective cases, by this very returning board, were referred to the body. They were admitted as members, and they were sitting in their seats in that chamber when these United States troops entered the chamber, as they were ordered, not, I again repeat, to put down disorder, not to quell any tumult, not to suppress any violence; but that these five members might be pointed out and arrested and marched out of that hall by the soldiery.

Mr. President, is that a case of domestic violence or of insurrection? Does that come within the letter or the spirit of the Constitution which allows the governor of a State to call for soldiers of the United States? The governor told them that he wanted a number of men put out of that body then in session, who were not only allowed to remain there, but were admitted as legally elected by the members. If they were allowed to remain there by the other members, why interfere? If they were not members it was time for every acknowledged member of that body to do its own fighting through its own officers or otherwise and to put them out. It was the redress they possessed, and had that body been so outraged they would have used the necessary force to do it. It was for them themselves to purge their own body. But there they remained, and would have remained in quiet; and yet, forsooth, these soldiers were sent in to suppress disorder! No, sir; they were sent there for the purposes of arrest and for nothing besides; and, if the details that we see be true, they went there and demanded the speaker then presiding over that body, organized as it was, to point out these men whom they were sent to exclude from that body. They were in peace; there was no tumult; there was no disorder; and when no one sitting in that body could be got to point out these men, the officer in charge of the soldiers was obliged to get some one upon the outside who knew them to point them out individual by individual, and then they were marched out of the hall at the point of the bayonet—five men of the one hundred or more present, who were recognized members.

Think of a condition of things like this! Might not one naturally suppose that these five men, if they were really disturbing the peace, were in arms with a revolver in each hand, and girded around with bowie-knives? No; these soldiers of the United States who were sent into the chamber were obliged to take with them some one to point out these men, who in their demeanor were as the others sitting in their seats, in order to exclude them from that body, and thus to aid in organizing the Legislature of the State of Louisiana! That is Kellogg's substantial statement of the case.

Now, sir, if these be the facts or anything near them, can it be possible that there is any justification on earth for this extraordinary exercise of executive power?

Mr. CLAYTON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLAYTON. If I do not annoy the Senator or interfere with the line of his remarks, I would like to ask him a question. He says the governor of Louisiana had no right to use United States troops in any way in the organization of the Legislature. Suppose he had used State troops, not to eject persons from the legislative halls, but had surrounded the State-house with them with instructions to let no one in who had not a pass from the militia commander; would the Senator consider him under any circumstances authorized to do that?

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Certainly not. What has the governor to do with the organization of the Legislature?

Mr. CLAYTON. I am glad to hear the Senator say so, because hereafter there will be a question coming before this body in relation to the late organization in Arkansas under democratic control where that proceeding was adopted.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. We shall see about that when it comes before us; but I say the governor has no power to organize a Legislature or to interfere in its organization. The Legislature organizes itself by virtue of the powers given to it by the people, as laid down in the organic law. I want to see democrats rebuked when they act badly. I would sooner punish them for bad conduct than my friends on the other side, because they ought to know better and behave better, being democrats. [Laughter.]

I stop here for the present on this branch of the subject, and I desire to direct a remark or two to the speech of the honorable Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON.] Distinguished as he is for ability and for force in argument, and not afraid to take any responsibility, especially when party exigencies may require, he has upon this question manifested a spirit from the beginning in its origin two years ago, that knows no compromise, no peace, to the white people of the South. In that spirit he is for their subjugation, to an element there, that may control under the lead of bad men, carpet-baggers or scalawags, or whatever you choose to call them—I call them simply bad men. In his speech the other day there was an iteration of the old scenes which we have witnessed in this body and in the country many times before. I looked casually over the speech as published this morning in the RECORD, and I listened to it the other day with great attention, as I always do to what falls from that honorable Senator, knowing his position on this floor and before the country, and that speech as I heard it and as I read it is filled with "lies"—not in the offensive sense of that term, I beg the honorable Senator to understand—but filled with the word "lies." From the beginning of that speech to the end of it, it is falsehood, it is "lie" after "lie;" and not satisfied with single lies or even double lies, he throws them in by thousands upon thousands. When I say that the speech is filled with this, I speak a literal truth, and yet not call in question the sincerity of the honorable Senator. As to the rest of the speech, though not clothed in the same rugged language, it is not the less rigorous. I attribute all to mistakes in fact, to bad logic, to false statesmanship, and to party zeal; but it all exhibits a temper upon this extraordinary occasion which ought to influence no Senator on this floor. And that I may not seem to exaggerate, I give the following as one of the sample portions of the Senator's speech.

In commenting upon some remarks made by Senator THURMAN, the honorable Senator continues:

He says "the outrage business" did not pay last fall. Well, these statements were published, and then there came ten thousand times ten thousand lies, denying them, or excusing them, or justifying them, until the public mind in many places was confused and confounded by the innumerable lies that were told. What was the remark of Talleyrand? "The same lie never wins a second victory;" and a victory won by these innumerable falsehoods cannot be held by the same instrumentalities.

The whole southern people are branded, and some of our colored people too are branded, because the truth about the matter is that many of the sensible class of that portion of the people, those who are willing there should be peace, that there should be thrift and prosperity once more among all classes, do not accord in sentiment any more with the honorable Senator, and would escape from the rule that that Senator and his colleagues would impose upon the whole people.

The Senator flaunts again the bloody shirt before the people; I will not dignify it by calling it a flag. Once more the public mind is to be agitated and excited and frenzied. I would admonish the honorable Senator that there is not an election on hand, unless it be the elections in Connecticut and New Hampshire, to which he could refer; but then it may be considered that the session of Congress is short and there is but little probability that the Executive will call together the next Congress before the time appointed by law; so it must be done now or not at all, at least for some time. The honorable Senator knows the value of that kind of stock in political trade. It only goes to show the peculiarity of mind, the direction of thought, and what is required to influence an ignorant or an excited people to vote against the democratic party. I ask him whether he knows a gentleman by the name of Thomas J. Brady, who represents himself to be chairman of the republican central committee of the State of Indiana, and whether this be authentic, for, being an Indiana production, it shows to be so much in keeping with what has influenced the Senator in the past and is influencing him to-day and with what he still expects to influence others in the future:

ROOMS OF THE REPUBLICAN CENTRAL EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE,
Indianapolis, September 3, 1874.

EDITOR OF UNION,
Rensselaer, Indiana:

I desire to call your attention to the horrible scenes of violence and bloodshed transpiring throughout the South, and suggest to you to give them as great prominence as possible in your paper from this time—until after the election.

THOMAS J. BRADY.
Chairman.

[Laughter and applause in the galleries, at which the Presiding Officer used his gavel.]

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Whether that be true or whether it be false, the honorable Senator can answer. I do not know; I saw it in the current newspapers of the day. It bears upon its face the evidence of truth, and what was done in order to influence the plain people of the State of Indiana against the people of the South. "The bloody outrages" that were being daily perpetrated—at least in the newspapers and upon the hustings—were to be kept before the people of the North until after the election, so that the party in power could still continue to hold it, and still keep in its possession the Government it is so much abusing. Then there may be rest from this selfish and cruel clamor until the elections again come round. The speech of the honorable Senator must impress the members of this body living in other portions of the country with what is done among the people of the North just before the elections, and how that public mind is kept on fire, prejudices inflamed, hate engendered, untold evils let loose, and all done for the benefit of party and in the interests of men who live upon party, and not with a single thought for country nor with a single sentiment of humanity.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will allow me, right there in his speech, I wish to say a word. I happened incidentally the other day to allude to the outrages in the South myself, and inasmuch as he treats these as mere electioneering stories, I ask him is he candid before the country when he states that these outrages were heralded before the country merely for campaign purposes? Does he mean that?

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Do you ask the question?

Mr. LOGAN. I do.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I have no question about the fact that outrages have been committed, and I am as much shocked at them as the honorable Senator could possibly be; but that all this was intended for an electioneering campaign purpose and to inflame the public mind against the democratic party is beyond all doubt.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask the Senator if the statement was true that these outrages were going on, was it not proper that the country should know it? If the Senator says that these statements were not true in reference to the outrages there, I should like to have him allow me to read now during his speech the testimony of the murder of one hundred negroes at one place, most of them shot in the back when they were lying on their faces. If he thinks there is no such thing, I can produce the evidence.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. No, I thank you; I will attend to that myself.

Mr. LOGAN. I merely refer to this to say to the gentleman that it will not do before the country to treat these statements as electioneering stories. If that is the programme, I am prepared right here with reports sworn to before committees to show that every statement made in reference to these outrages is true; and it will not do to say to the country that they are electioneering stories; it will not do to say that republicans make these statements, being false, for electioneering purposes. When "murder!" was ringing through the ears of every man in this land, and the charge known to be true—not the murder of one man or two, but of the dozen, and the score, and the hundred—men who jeer at the talk about murders, and say it is merely for electioneering purposes, are seared with iron and have no sympathy for human life. [Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) The Chair will observe here that the Sergeant-at-Arms will see that the rules are enforced in the galleries. It is contrary to the rules of the Senate to applaud. I trust citizens will observe the rules of the Senate.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Mr. President, I am not here the apologist for murders and outrages. I condemn them as much as the honorable Senator from Illinois or as much as the honorable Senator from Indiana, and no one will go further than I for the punishment of such crimes. I live in a State where peace and order prevail; and among this very population there is none to complain of the administration of justice there. Not only are the rights of all protected, but all the common courtesies of life are generally observed. I live among a people who understand that class of our population, realize their true condition, and who, I believe, never will fail in charity and mercy and justice toward them; who will punish crime whenever it raises its hand to strike, whether it be by white or black. I must state that I do not know the occasion to which the honorable Senator refers in which hundreds were shot. I know there has been trouble in the Southern States, and there must be trouble until they have settled forms of government. You will not allay that trouble by sending soldiers there, you will not allay that trouble by exciting those people to frenzied acts of vengeance and retaliation; but when you allow them to institute legitimate forms of government, regularly established, controlled, and directed by the people, you will have peace and order, wherever such a condition of things prevail. In no place on earth, whether in the State of Louisiana, or in the Kingdom of Great Britain, or France, or anywhere else, will you have forms of government observed or laws executed and crime punished where the government itself is not derived from some lawful authority. In Maryland, in Virginia, in Missouri, in Alabama now, in Tennessee, in Georgia, in Texas—yes, I dare to say in the presence of my venerable friend from Texas, [Mr. FLANAGAN,] in Texas now—in these States where you have governments instituted by the people and supported by the people you have peace. Criminals themselves are not the ones to suppress crime or exalt virtue.

Mr. FLANAGAN. Will the Senator yield to me? I will say to him that to-day the existing government in Texas is in direct violation of the law as decided by the supreme court of the State.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I do not know anything about the supreme court of that State or what its decisions may have been. That is a matter of opinion. But whether it was legally or constitutionally established according to the opinion of my friend, it was nevertheless established by the people of that State; and the people of that State are in power by their regularly-elected officers under it. My honorable friend will not deny that. A majority of the people of Texas are now under this government, regulating and controlling their own domestic affairs; and, doing that, there is peace in the State. Allow the same poor boon to the unfortunate and unhappy people of the State of Louisiana; allow them to be governed by their own laws, allow them to make their own laws and elect their own officers, and as sure as one sun succeeds another upon the morrow, so sure will there be peace, law, order, in the State of Louisiana, and prosperity and thrift will once more return to that impoverished people. But with men at the head of the government who are not recognized as officers elected by the people, with no Legislature even, with men alien to their feelings and interests, and without the virtue of an honest election to regulate their domestic concerns and all that is dear to them in person and property, a free people never will be contented nor will the laws be executed; they cannot be. In the doubtful authority that must exist between officers elected who are not in power and those in power without an election, there is no respect for the law itself. They compromise the dignity of the office they are not entitled to hold, and with it compromise the power that should make or enforce the laws.

My honorable friend from Indiana [Mr. MORTON]—and this brings us to this very point—has said that the fact that there are violence and bloodshed in Louisiana and in Mississippi grows out of this; that, peace prevailing wherever the democratic party in the South controls, therefore it is a self-evident proposition that the democratic party kill and slay and murder and destroy in those States in order to bring them also under their control.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator does not mean to say that I said there were peace and order where the democratic party reigns. I said no such thing. That was a statement made by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] to which I was replying.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I am speaking of the Senator's proposition, and that is sufficient for my purpose; that, having no power in the State of Louisiana, democrats are determined to get it, if necessary, by intimidation, by threats, by violence, by murder. Can it be possible that my honorable friend can be sincere in the utterance of such a sentiment as that? As I said before, until you have regular government you cannot have peace. You must have in this country free government; you must have fair and just laws, executed in good faith; you must have wise and sound legislation for all classes of people. Until you have regular, settled government—that is, a government having the consent of the governed—you cannot have any of those accompaniments of government indispensable to the security and prosperity of the people. Can it be in the heart of that honorable Senator, knowing as he does that the outrages that are perpetrated are heralded to the people of the North for political purposes, to charge that as any part of the policy of the men whom he denounces and stigmatizes upon this floor? No, Mr. President; common wisdom would impress upon every conservative man in the South the necessity of peace now as a matter of policy. Peace is as important to the conservative party of the South as a policy as it is to the people of the North as a sentiment. To take these "outrages" from the North is to take from them the very aliment, the very nourishment upon which our friends upon the other side of the Chamber live.

In the argument of the honorable Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON,] he stated what was true, that it is in the interest of the dominant party to manufacture "outrages" upon the eve of an election or any other important event likely to be affected by it to fire the northern heart against the people of the South. It is, on the contrary, the highest interest of all true southern men to keep the peace, enforce the laws against crime, and suppress disorder and violence, that the northern people may be able to judge and determine freely and fairly, uninfluenced by passion or resentment. Is it not reasonable and natural that our southern people should act according to their interests? Their instincts are right. Their interests and instincts alike must lead them to proper conclusions. They are not savages, nor assassins, nor barbarians; they are men like yourselves; intellectual men, high-minded men, wise men, men of cultivation, industrious men, business men, men once of property, now with ruined fortunes. Can it be possible that the motives of such men should impel them to do those very things upon which my honorable friend feeds; to do those things which my honorable friend holds up before a mixed audience in the State of Indiana to fire his people against the democratic party and against our people in the South? The very reverse of that proposition is necessarily true; and while it is true that there are disturbances, while there are wrongs growing out of the unsettled condition of things, and it cannot be well avoided, irritation and wrong producing them on the one hand and revenge or ignorance upon the other, those things cannot be well helped in unsettled communities like those. But let me assure that honorable Senator that if he gives to those people a government of their own choice—that is, a government of the people—let them have fair and free elections; let them participate and let their voice be fairly heard in the count by those conducting elections; let justice be administered impartially and the laws executed without favor; satisfy them in these respects, and a more obedient people to the supremacy of such a government will not live on earth. Peace and order will once more prevail; and if they are still obliged to suffer through mistaken policies or by unwise laws, they will endure all with the patience of freemen, depending upon the change of opinion likely to take place where the interests of all are alike in the end affected.

Intimidation and threats! I suppose here and there such things are occurring in the South as they are occurring everywhere. We know what appliances are used everywhere to influence the votes of men not only in the South but in the North. In New York, in Maryland, in Louisiana, appeals are made to the interests of men as well as to their passions and fears. Is my honorable friend fair? A colored man may be discharged because he will not vote the conservative ticket; or a colored man may be mobbed because he votes the democratic ticket. Is there anything more unfair in this respect than the appeal made to the common mind of the North by which they are inflamed in their judgment to do a wrong to the people of the South? One is just as bad as another. One may threaten that he will not employ him if he does not vote with him; another may threaten that he will discharge him unless he votes to suit him; another will, as the honorable Senator does here and elsewhere, tell "how the colored people in the South have been murdered and outraged," and then charge the democratic party with being responsible for it all, and then with an appeal, that is passion itself, ask how they could act with such a party, and especially how the colored man could do it without the danger of being himself murdered or outraged in some way. The last is the worst of all. The former appeals to the interests of the voter, the latter to his fears, passions, and interests. It is not fair anywhere; it is wrong everywhere; but happily it failed in the last election. The people are growing tired of the subject. The northern mind is beginning to look at it more calmly and to take a more comprehensive view of it, and while, as my honorable friend admits, the "outrage business" was largely used during the last election and daily reports made and heralded of hundreds slain here and hundreds there, one here and another there presented to the fairer minds of the North, it seems to have amounted to nothing.

But I gather from what my honorable friend says that all the statements of "murders and outrages" as gotten up, of course by the very saints of purity and truth in the republican party, were overwhelmed with a torrent of "lies." His friends in the North, though hitherto able to stand much, became so confused under the overwhelming torrent of "ten thousand upon ten thousand lies" that they did fail him; but the Senator flatters himself, in the language of Talleyrand, that "the same lie never gains a victory twice." I do not know that Talleyrand ever said so. The honorable Senator may know better than I; but he should begin to understand that the "outrage business" is in about the same condition with Talleyrand's "lie;" that whatever it has done in the past, it will win no longer in the future.

Mr. MORTON. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question? Does the outrage consist in committing the murders or in telling about them?

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. In both.

Mr. MORTON. In both, is it?

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. In both. The outrage is in committing murders, and the outrage is also in telling them for the purpose of inflaming the people of the North against well-disposed and honest men.

The idea that the honorable Senator should undertake to put the good people of the State of Louisiana, the sensitive, high-minded, and honorable men of that State, who are as cultivated as the people whom the honorable Senator so ably represents on this floor, as intelligent, as patriotic, and though differing with them upon one great question, who yet are patriotic, always true to the free institutions of their country, and never failing once, or, if you please, but once in their lives, under absolute negro control by the use of such instrumentalities as those used by the Senator upon this floor, because some ruffian in their midst may have outraged or murdered an unprotected colored man, or because in the midst of excitement, it may be an accidental collision or fray, some persons were injured or killed, to charge the whole of that people with these outrages and endeavor to put them under such a rule, is beyond all my comprehension of charity and of justice and of common right. Yes, I say it is wrong, and the people of the North understand it to be wrong. You may desire to find excuse for the late action of the people of the North by asserting that they were confused by the falsehoods that were sent abroad by the Associated Press of the South, by the newspapers North and South, by democratic speakers North and South, but the people begin to understand this "outrage business," and they want peace; for their experience teaches them now that wherever there is a lawful, regular government, wherever within the broad limits of this land a government of the people exists, there is peace and order; and liberty and property and life are safe; that all are safe in Maryland; that all are safe in Virginia; that all are safe in Georgia. Wherever the people are left to the unobstructed enjoyment of regulating their own domestic concerns, there you will find peace. The people have learned this—true, from a sad experience—and they judge from it much better than they could from what the honorable Senator would inspire them to believe of the tales of horror and of crime which he can so eloquently and passionately depict.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question right there?

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator is not directing his remarks to me, but at the same time I would like to ask him a question. He speaks of the intelligence, the cultivation—and he does not use the word "chivalry," but I will for him, for that is what he meant—of the white people of Louisiana, the people of property, as he mentioned——

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Not people of property. No one has property there.

Mr. LOGAN. I will take that part of it out then. The Senator has told us of their universal patriotism, their good demeanor and deportment, and their law-abiding inclinations. Now, I ask him as a Senator, does he indorse the action of Penn and his ten thousand men as patriots who overturned the State Government on the 14th of September?

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I will answer that question. I will answer it, however, in my own way. I will ask the honorable Senator a question. I would ask my honorable friend whether he believes that Mr. McEnery and Mr. Penn were elected governor and lieutenant-governor of that State in 1872?

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator evades my question.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. No, sir. I just want to ask the Senator that.

Mr. LOGAN. He evades it by playing the Yankee, and answering my question by asking another.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. No; I beg your pardon.

Mr. LOGAN. Whenever the Senator answers my question I will then answer his, inasmuch as mine was propounded first.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I will answer the Senator. We have different stand-points. Upon the affairs of the State of Louisiana that honorable Senator reported to this body, or rather united in a report, two years ago, when Kellogg had assumed authority as governor and by the aid of United States troops, that there was no State government in Louisiana. Did not the honorable Senator so report?

Mr. LOGAN. I reported that the frauds were of such a character, on both sides and that you could not determine whether either one was elected, and that I did not believe there was any election on account of the frauds. I reported that; but that is not the question.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Yes, sir, it is the question; it is the very point.

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir; my question is this: After Mr. Kellogg had been installed as governor, recognized by the President, recognized by Congress, recognized by the supreme court of the State, I ask the Senator, does he indorse Penn's revolution in overthrowing the State government, call it revolutionary or not?

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. There was no State government to overturn; so the honorable Senator has reported. [Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER rapped with his gavel.

Mr. SARGENT. I give notice that in case there is further applause or disapprobation in the galleries, no matter who may receive it, I shall move that the galleries be cleared.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) The Chair has already observed to the citizens occupying the galleries that it is against the rules of the Senate to express themselves either for or against sentiments uttered in the Senate, and I hope citizens will aid the Chair in maintaining order.

Mr. LOGAN. So far as this matter of cheering in the galleries is concerned, I have nothing to say about it. I will only remark that the cheering of sentiments sustaining a rebellion is nothing more than that which I heard some years ago in the same galleries, and in the same category. Now I ask the Senator my question which I hope he will answer, because if he asks me a question I will answer it fairly.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I must be allowed to answer in my own way. I will answer.

Mr. LOGAN. Of course, you have a right to answer it in your own way; but when we are talking about revolutions, and when we are talking about justice and about patriotism, we ought at least to deal fairly with one another. The Senator spoke of the patriotism of the people of Louisiana as evidenced, he did not say but I might say, by their murders and their revolutions. Now I ask him the question again, whether he indorses the Penn revolution? I say to him that I indorse what the President did in putting it down. Will he be as frank with me and say whether he indorses the revolution?

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I will answer that question. I am very glad that the honorable Senator from California called attention to this improper practice of disturbing the deliberations of this body by applause in the galleries, either for one side or the other. It is right that it should be stopped. Our deliberations here should be carried on among ourselves without interruption of any kind by spectators.

But, Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Illinois again most significantly referred to the late rebellion. I must protest that I think it is out of place in this Chamber, where we are gathered together from all parts of the country to deliberate upon all, to pass upon all, to legislate for all, whatever may have been the opinions and actions of gentlemen now Senators upon this floor upon that question. It was a civil war, and such a civil war the world never witnessed. It settled questions that were agitated politically for a half century, that divided our people everywhere, and settled them forever. The initiative questions of that civil war are settled, I trust, forever; and as they are settled, will our honorable friends on the other side of this Chamber, as we now all meet together for a common interest and for a common good, allow that war to be settled also? I do not think that it ought to be referred to in any such spirit. Let it be buried out of sight as that which gave it bitterness and strength is buried out of sight, and let us attend to our duties which concern us all and are of the present and future and not of the past. But my honorable friend seems to have a prodigious horror of rebellion. One hundred years ago, I take it from his American instincts, from his nature, from his common humanity, from his patriotism, he would not have uttered that word in the tone and spirit that he does to-day. Whatever may be said as to the late war, let me tell that honorable Senator that American freedom was born in revolution and rebellion, as all freedom has been, and it is one of the very elements of free thought and of a noble nature to justify the rising of an oppressed people against their oppressors. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. SARGENT. With the consent of the Senator from Maryland, I move that the galleries be cleared.

The PRESIDING OFFICER put the question on the motion and declared that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. DAVIS. I call for a division.

Mr. CONKLING. I appeal to the Senator from California, if he will give me his attention, to so vary his motion as to aim it at that portion of the galleries in which repeated disrespect and defiance to the admonition of the Chair has been shown. I think it would be very unjust to clear the galleries, so far as they are occupied by persons who are willing to observe the decencies of life and the privileges of the Senate; but so far as those persons are concerned whom I heard in 1860 and 1861 by their predecessors, and afterward, before the commencement of the war and somewhat later, practicing this same invasion upon the dignity and the rights of the Senate, I have no objection to interpose to the motion; but I suggest to my friend that it ought to be adapted to the evil that exists.

Mr. TIPTON. I simply rise to finish the speech of the honorable Senator from New York. When he predicts that all this applause in the galleries of the Senate was from persons who sympathized specially with the remarks of the Senator from Maryland, I wish him to recollect that yesterday there was as much applause on his side of the question as there is to-day on the side of the Senator from Maryland. That finishes the speech which the Senator from New York neglected to conclude.

Mr. CONKLING. In reply to the very calm and appropriate suggestion made by the Senator from Nebraska, I beg to remind him and the Senate that yesterday time after time when applause occurred, regardless of the side on which it was, the Chair admonished and requested the galleries to desist. I wish also to remind the Senator that a moment ago when my friend from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] made some observation in reply to the Senator from Maryland, there was applause in the galleries. Then it was, and not when the Senator from Maryland had been applauded, that the present occupant of the chair first repeated this admonition. Applause had been bestowed upon the Senator from Maryland, the Chair on that occasion observing silence. The next time applause occurred, it was when the Senator from Illinois was upon his feet. Then the admonition of the Chair fell upon the ears of the galleries, and persisting notwithstanding, this manifestation is made. It does not concern me; I have not been happy enough to enjoy the applause of the galleries; it does not personally incommode me to hear it bestowed upon others; but I submit to all members of this body that it does concern the character of the Senate, it does concern decent and orderly proceeding, that the spectators of the doings of a court, of a senate, of a legislative body, should not conduct as if they were in a theater, in a playhouse, or in a circus.

Mr. HOWE. I rise to make a suggestion to the Senator from California. It is that instead of pressing the motion he has already submitted, or even the modified motion suggested by the Senator from New York, he submit a motion which will increase the police force in the galleries with instructions that whoever is found applauding hereafter shall be removed from the galleries.

Mr. THURMAN and Mr. SPRAGUE. That is right.

Mr. HOWE. I make this suggestion because I am extremely unwilling personally that any step shall be taken which shall prevent the public from hearing this debate to the end.

Mr. SCOTT. Especially the well-behaved public.

Mr. HOWE. Yes. The rule of course must stand upon the book and must be enforced, but we have a choice of ways in enforcing it. I make the suggestion.

Mr. CONKLING. I think that is a good suggestion.

Mr. SARGENT. I suppose it will be impossible for the officers of the Senate in a crowded gallery to observe and pick out those who applaud and those who do not. The only method by which we can effectually preserve the dignity of the Senate and its right to free debate, its right not to be interrupted in its deliberations by expressions from outside either of applause or disapprobation, is by clearing that portion of the galleries at least from which such interruptions come.

Some short time since—and I forget whether it was when my friend from Maryland was speaking or my friend from Illinois—I rose and deliberately gave notice that if such demonstrations were repeated, I should move to clear the galleries. I have made that motion, but I will modify it so far as to move that the galleries of the men on the west side be cleared; and I think that one example of the intention of the Senate to preserve its dignity will save us during the remainder of this session, and perhaps thereafter, from such encroachments on the dignity of the body.

Mr. TIPTON. I move, as an amendment, that only persons violating the rules of the Senate shall be removed from the galleries.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. STEVENSON. I hope the Senator from California will accept the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin. I do not think innocent men ought to be punished because there are some persons in the galleries who have violated the rules. This is an interesting debate; it has its advocates on both sides. There have been violations on both sides of the house.

To err is human; to forgive, divine.

Let us excuse it now, and confine our order to those who shall violate the rules, and do not let the American Senate drive from its presence ladies and gentlemen who have a right to be here, and who have a natural interest in what is now going on. I hope the Senator from California will modify his motion as suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. THURMAN. I rise to second the suggestion of my friend from Kentucky and of the Senator from Wisconsin. Here are hundreds of American citizens in the galleries of the Senate conducting themselves with the utmost decorum and propriety, and there is no justice nor any excuse in anything that has occurred for turning those well-behaved citizens out of their seats. If there are persons in the galleries who are violating the privileges that are accorded them, who are manifesting applause in a way that is forbidden by the rules of the Senate, let them be dealt with. But while I am upon this subject I wish to say that I do not think it wise in Senators to heap upon these people, erring though they are, epithets full of, I was going to say rancor, but I will not say that—epithets that are extremely severe in what they express and still more in what they imply. It will not tend or conduce to quiet, orderly proceedings in this body to charge any portion of the people who are listening to these debates with being traitors or sympathizing with treason. This is not the way in which order can best be preserved. Those persons who have interrupted the debates of the Senate by their applause have done very wrong indeed, and no one will censure them more than I. There have been these interruptions on both sides; and this is not by any means the first time in the history of this country when there have been such interruptions. My memory goes back a long way to the time when in the old Senate Chamber from day to day during that remarkable session of Congress of 1833–'34 the galleries seemed to be packed with men sent there to cheer the speakers on one side of the question and to hiss down the speakers on the other. And, sir, I can recollect since I have held a seat in this body, when a certain Ku-Klux bill was before the Senate, that more than one Senator who was advocating that bill had the cheers of not a small portion of the gallery but of a large portion of it, and a portion of it that seemed to have come there to cheer all those who advocated that measure and to frown upon all who opposed it.

Sir, all these things are wrong; no one condemns them more than I do, and I will vote with any Senator here to expel from the gallery any man who violates the rule of the Senate. The spectators are here not simply by our permission, but, I may say, as matter of right when we hold an open session, at least in accordance with the spirit of our institutions; but they are here to be listeners, not to be applauders; they are here to behave with decorum and not to behave in a manner calculated to interfere with the orderly discussion before the body.

It seems to me that the solution of this trouble is precisely what the Senator from Wisconsin has suggested. Let the Sergeant-at-Arms station enough men in the gallery to see who the offenders are. That course has been pursued before, and it has seldom failed of having its proper effect. If that shall fail, then I shall vote for clearing any portion of the gallery that shall thus violate the privileges of the Senate.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, the examples which the Senator from Ohio has given, of disorders in the gallery of the Senate heretofore, certainly should be a warning to the Senate to take efficient measures to prevent their recurrence rather than a precedent for our neglecting them and thereby encouraging them. Why, sir, when it shall happen in the Senate of the United States that we are in the condition of the old French Convention, when the populace of the city of Paris invaded the chamber and holding forth their hands with threats compelled legislation by their intervening in that manner, by showing popular passions and overawing the judgment and better disposition of the French legislators, then indeed all except the mere form of free government is gone. If we cannot here without intervention by those in the galleries pursue our own course of deliberation, pass our measures without being overawed or being encouraged by these methods, then we had better adjourn the session and resolve these questions not by a Senate of the United States but by a popular assembly.

Now, sir, I believe that it is better to make an example in this matter, better to show that the Senate is determined from this time out to the end of this session that it will not have these scenes of indecorum in the galleries around us. If this is done once, I believe it will be effectual for all time. If there was any possibility of singling out those persons who have been warned over and over again to-day, who have been distinctly notified both from the Chair and from the floor of the Senate that such conduct would result in clearing the galleries and was in violation of the rules, and who were thus warned yesterday when these scenes of disorder commenced, then I should be perfectly willing that the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska should be adopted. I certainly do not desire to drive the public from the opportunity to hear our deliberations. I am perfectly willing that the galleries shall be filled and to any number, and that any one shall come who will behave with decorum and listen to our debates; but when our debates are interrupted and we are forced into the very discussion of measures by which we can protect ourselves from such unseemly proceedings, it seems to me things have come to such a pass that the Senate ought to take effectual action to vindicate its dignity.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, the Senate of the United States is a deliberative body, at least in theory, and it certainly should be so in its invariable practice. We here, the representatives of sovereign States, should meet for the purpose of deliberating upon the general good. It is perfectly plain in the first place that we are the controllers of our own mode of deliberation, and that if the method of speech and public address in this Chamber is suited to the grave duties which we have to perform there will be but little found to awaken mere popular applause or popular condemnation—I mean the manifestations by cheers or by noise of any kind of approval or disapproval by the American public of what we may say. But our responsibilities for what we say or how we may say it are to the country, and we are not to be interfered with in this our Chamber of deliberation. I will go as far as any man within the body in insisting upon the rules of order that shall apply to the galleries as well as to the floor of the Senate, and that nothing shall be allowed either on the floor or in the galleries that shall interfere with proper deliberation upon public subjects.

But, Mr. President, there have been interruptions that are not to be justified; and whether the applause or the disapproval were for or against my own views or wishes or sympathies at what was being said, I should not hesitate in any case promptly to arrest it. The remarks of the Chair were moderate and just and proper, and would have found immediate obedience in any person who was not disposed to abuse the privileges of an American citizen present on the occasion of public debate. Sir, I do not consider that the innocent should suffer for the guilty. A few men can have produced this disturbance. The great majority had nothing whatever to do with it.

The Senator from California has done, I think, wisely to accept the modification of some gentleman on the other side, and confine his order for removal to a portion of the Senate galleries. I hope he will still, upon reflection, deem it wiser to restrict his order for removal to those who have actually occasioned the noise and the interference with that quiet dignity of debate which ought to mark the proceedings of this body. I trust the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska may be accepted, and that the Sergeant-at-Arms may station in the galleries persons, employés of the Senate, who will quickly oust from the Hall those who abuse the privilege of an American citizen to be present at the public debates of Congress.

In the early history of this body, the sessions of the Senate, I believe, were in secret. That has been long since discontinued, with the exception of the consideration of executive appointments and the sessions devoted to the consideration of treaty stipulations. Otherwise our debates are in public; and I esteem it of essence to the liberties of this country that our deliberations should be as public as possible. But to make them deliberations, they must be peaceful and undisturbed; and the individual who abuses the privilege of the American citizen to be present at the public debates upon the legislation to affect his country has no right to complain if he is expelled from the Chamber where these debates are held.

I ask for information whether the amendment is in form before us, providing that the order asked for by the Senator from California be so modified as to place in the galleries a proper number of employés of the Senate who shall see that any one who interferes with the order of debate, either by approval or disapproval of whatever may be said or done upon this floor, shall be instantly expelled? I cannot believe that any American citizen who is not totally lost to his own self-respect and a sense of what is due to the dignity of citizenship will expose himself to such public ignominy as that would involve.

Furthermore, let me ask, is there precedent for the actual carrying into effect of an order of this kind? Have we thus far in the history of our country found it necessary actually to empty the galleries of the Senate because of similar indiscretions and improprieties? There are gentlemen here of long service—none longer than the Vice-President who ordinarily occupies the chair. Unless I am misinformed, (and of course I do not speak from my short experience,) an order of the kind indicated has never actually been carried into effect. If I am right as to that, I had rather postpone the day when the Senate shall exercise that power which I think it is perfectly competent for it to exercise to preserve peace and order in the deliberations of this body, whether the disturbance come from the galleries or from the floor or from any other quarter. I would ask whether there is any precedent for the carrying into effect of an order such as is proposed?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the gallery has been cleared heretofore by the order of the Senate.

Mr. BAYARD. I was not aware of it, Mr. President. I need not say further that I heartily concur, and I trust that my mode of speech here and my action will show how far I heartily contribute to preserve the decorum and the dignity of this body on the floor, and how much I shall seek to impose upon the public the same law that I impose upon myself.

Mr. THURMAN. I have drawn up according to my recollection, and I think in very nearly the words that were used on a very memorable occasion, an order which I suggest to the Senator from California that he shall accept instead of his motion. There was an occasion when there was much greater disturbance of the proceedings of the Senate from applause in the galleries than has occurred to-day, when after discussion by the Senate an order was made precisely in substance like that which I have drawn up, and under it certain offenders were arrested and brought to the bar of the Senate. I send up this order to be read, and ask the Senator from California to accept it. If he does not accept it, I move it as a substitute for his resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposition will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to place in the galleries a sufficient police force to arrest any person or persons who may disturb the proceedings of the Senate by marks of approbation or disapprobation, and report such arrests to the Senate.

Mr. THURMAN. That is the order that was made on the very memorable occasion to which I have alluded; it sufficed then, and I think it will suffice now.

Mr. CONKLING. What was the occasion?

Mr. THURMAN. The occasion was the debate on the removal of the deposits.

Mr. SARGENT. I have a very strong hope that after the marked disapprobation by both sides of the Chamber of the undignified conduct which has been committed by some persons in the galleries during this morning's session and on yesterday, this will be sufficient to prevent its recurrence. So hoping, I am willing that the resolution just offered shall be adopted; but I now give notice that in case this resolution does not prove effectual and we are interrupted by these unseemly proceedings from any part of the galleries hereafter, I shall renew the original motion which I made that the galleries be cleared.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I hardly think it is necessary to pass this resolution. The resolution must necessarily lead to providing an additional force, which I should hope at this day was not necessary to the Senate of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will say to the Senator that the Sergeant-at-Arms states that there is sufficient force now employed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Then I certainly think there is no necessity for the resolution, because it is the duty of the Sergeant-at-Arms to do this very thing without a resolution. Is the idea that we are legislating here to keep the galleries quiet? If gentlemen going into the galleries cannot observe the decorum and propriety of this place, they should not be allowed to enter the galleries at all. Nobody knows better than the Sergeant-at-Arms that this is his duty, and nobody is more faithful in the performance of it; but the idea that we are to be interrupted in our debates and spread upon the record an admonition by resolution to gentlemen and ladies who come here as to the proprieties and decorum of the galleries, seems to me quite absurd. I hope the resolution will not pass.

Mr. TIPTON. I heartily concur in the order offered by the Senator from Ohio, and rejoice at its acceptance on the part of the Senator from California, and I have no hesitancy in saying that if the Sergeant-at-Arms is not able to keep order in this Chamber, we have the Army of the United States very near. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) The question is on the substitute proposed by the Senator from Ohio, which the Chair understands is accepted by the Senator from California. Before the question is put, however, the Chair will state, in justice to the uniform fairness of the occupants of the Chair, that he can confirm the recollection expressed by the Senator from New York, that the present occupant of the Chair withheld correction of disorder in the Senate at the applause expressed upon remarks made by the Senator from Maryland, and it was not until the Senator from Illinois expressed his views, and applause followed, that the Chair interposed admonition to the occupants of the galleries, deeming it perhaps wise lest the Chair should be criticised in his intended impartiality. The question is upon the order proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. BAYARD. May I be permitted to say that had the Chair arrested the applause in the galleries that followed the remarks of the Senator from Maryland, he would have been sustained by every gentleman on this side of the Chamber, and by nobody more promptly than by the gentleman whose remarks were improperly applauded. No one on this side of the Chamber would have suspected you, sir, of anything like unfairness in the place that you occupy, for all our experience of you has been that you have always been fair and just. You need not, sir, have waited until applause should follow on the other side, I may say the other political side of this Chamber, because we consider that when you do your duty, although it may be to rebuke some democratic partisan, the whole democratic party of the country will stand by you in it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the resolution proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

The resolution was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant-at-Arms will enforce the order of the Senate. The Senator from Maryland will proceed with his remarks.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Mr. President, when interrupted by the question of order, I was about to reply to the question propounded to me by the honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.] In reply to that question, I would briefly state in a very few words the condition surrounding the people of Louisiana and the position taken by the honorable Senator from Illinois in relation to that condition. He united in a report made in January, 1873, that there was no State government existing in the State of Louisiana. If there was no State government existing in the State of Louisiana, then there was opportunity for violence, for disorder, for every species of crime. Those people were then, according to the opinion of that honorable Senator, without any State government, in fact in a condition of anarchy. Allow me for one moment to remark here that people being in that condition without a State government, we must behold with admiration and applause their conduct in maintaining among themselves the peace and order that they did.

But he said there was no State government. What was there then if there was no State government? We on this side of the Chamber said that there was a State government elected by the people, but prevented from exercising the authority belonging to it by the military interference of this Government; that Mr. Kellogg usurped the office of governor, exercised its power, and was held in that position against the popular will and without the forms of law by the Government of the United States, by the armed soldiery of the United States. While the honorable Senator admits that he did unite in the report that there was no State government in Louisiana, he asserts and bases his action to-day upon the fact that Kellogg was recognized by the President as the executive of that State and also by the supreme court of that State. About all that I care nothing. I did not believe in the force of any such recognition. We believed then, as we believe now, that Kellogg is there acting as governor without a tittle of authority, usurping the rights of the legally-elected governor of that State; that he is there without the forms of law and in defiance of all law; that he was put there under the order of a Federal judge denounced by the honorable Senator from Illinois and by the honorable Senator from Indiana as illegal, unconstitutional, and as a gross usurpation of authority. Being under such an order put there by force, and, too, by the military power of this Government, I hold that he has no more right in the executive chair of Louisiana than I have to-day.

Unless a wrong done and repeated in every stage of its progress toward the consummation of its objects will in the end constitute a right, an indefeasible and perfect right, then the honorable Senator may be correct in the position he has taken; but with a full knowledge of the facts of the whole question as we possess them, and with a knowledge, too, that at no time did Kellogg's government receive the acquiescence of the people of Louisiana, but from the day of its inauguration there has been one continued protest against it up to the present time, any fair-minded man must be impressed with its utter hollowness, its utter want of authority, and of its disgraceful imbecility.

Mr. President, I come to the particular question: In that condition of things what were those people to do? They believed that they had fairly secured political power in that State. We had the official returns, made regularly, of that election before a committee of this body. They showed the election of McEnery and Penn and of a Legislature in sympathy with them. They believed that mere usurpers were ruling them and legislating for them against the expressed will of the people. Believing that, they rose against that government, or rather against the intruders in their own government. I ask the honorable Senator whether they raised their hand against the United States? They defied no Federal authority, they violated no Federal law; but, on the contrary, when called upon, though improperly called upon as I hold, upon the part of the President, they obeyed every requisition, peaceably yielded their own rightful authority so suddenly acquired, and quietly dispersed. I believe they were only asserting those rights of self-government in attaining that power in the State to which an election had entitled them, and from the just exercise of which they have been so fraudulently and forcibly deprived; and if I know my honorable friend rightly, [Mr. LOGAN,] his martial courage, that he belonged to the old democratic party in its best days—that party that never failed to condemn usurpation and wrong and dared to advocate always the duty of a free people to assert their rights—I feel justified in saying that he ought not to denounce that demonstration of the people of Louisiana as revolutionary. Believing that they were to be deprived of their sacred right to local self-government by intruders, not coming in conflict with Federal authority, obedient to all Federal laws, it being exclusively a matter concerning their own local government and their own domestic affairs, it was a question with that people solely and purely, and it is not for us to condemn, or, if you please, to approve. It was their own domestic broil. They asserted their right in maintaining what they were entitled to have at the hands of the people—the control of their own domestic government. They violated no Federal law in undertaking to assert that right. That government—the Kellogg government—disappeared as the morning mist before the effulgence of a rising sun. It showed a pitiable weakness. It disclosed to the people of this country what a sham and fraud it was, and the people of this country responded; and I would here state to the honorable Senator that there was no question before the American people that gave so much direction and momentum to the popular thought and action last fall as that simple demonstration of the people of New Orleans and the dispersion and annihilation of that farce of a government. Having done it, the highest legal minds in the country—Mr. O'Conor, for illustration—said it was wrong for the President to reopen the question and reinstate Kellogg; that there was a government established upon that occasion by the people and through the people, and with which we had nothing whatever to do—not, at all events, until it should come in conflict with Federal authority. That is the only time when we are permitted to speak to it in this Hall. But with the domestic broils, political troubles and changes, and the making of constitutions in States, we have no more to do than the Emperor of Russia until it comes in its relations within the prescribed terms of the Constitution, where we can exercise Federal authority.

Mr. LOGAN. Now, if the Senator will allow me, I presume he has no disposition to evade the question, nor has he a disposition to place any other Senator in a false position. He has answered my question. It has taken him a good while to do it; but yet his meaning is very easily understood. The position he attempts to place me in is this: That inasmuch as the committee of the Senate reported that the frauds were so glaring in Louisiana that we could not recognize the election of either party, therefore, on account of my being on that committee, I must admit that no government was established in Louisiana, the overthrowing of which would be revolution. He is too good a lawyer (and he is on that committee himself) to make such a statement as this as a legal proposition. The question does not go to the election of Kellogg or McEnery; it goes merely to the fact whether the ten thousand armed men under the lead of Penn were engaged in a revolutionary movement. That is the only question.

I will put a case. He knows as a lawyer that, (whether there was any election in the State or not,) Kellogg occupying the seat as governor, recognized by the President, recognized by the supreme court of his own State, and by the authorities of the National Government, if not governor de jure was governor de facto. He knows that as a legal proposition. That, then, being the basis of my question, without reference to whether he was elected or not, he being governor there de facto whether de jure or not, could a revolution take place against that authority? As a lawyer he understood my question, and as a lawyer he has very sagaciously evaded it. If he had not been a lawyer he would not have known so well how to get around the question. It was a question clearly put by one lawyer to another, a simple plain proposition, whether or not the movement of ten thousand armed men to overthrow the government of Louisiana (whether a government de jure or de facto is immaterial) was revolution. The Senator knows it. My question was, did he indorse that revolution.

Now, in order to show him the position he puts himself in, I will put another case. It seems strange that if in the course of argument any Senator shall allude to the past history of this country he is censured for it. If an allusion is made here to our recent unpleasantness, as some writers call it, we are told that that ought to cease in this Chamber. I hope I may be pardoned, however, for making this reference. I recollect some time ago that there was a person named Jefferson Davis, claiming to be president of a number of States confederated together against the Government of the United States. They were so confederated without authority of law; and yet, I will not say the Senator now but other Senators believing as he does, recognized him as president de facto of a government. Governments even recognized him as president de facto of a government. We exchanged prisoners with him, and thereby recognized his as a government de facto. The Senator cannot escape a proposition that was so well understood by lawyers and statesmen by dodging it, and saying that if the liberties of the people are invaded they are justified when they assert them. He cannot evade the proposition by saying that no election had taken place there, and that therefore there was no government to be overturned.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. The honorable Senator must excuse me, but I have the floor. I always listen to him with great pleasure, but I would prefer to go on myself.

Mr. LOGAN. We are both a good deal alike; we are like steam-engines, that when started do not like to stop. [Laughter.] I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I see that the State of Louisiana has given trouble to the honorable Senator from Illinois; and as the transaction to which he refers occurred prior to the Illinois election, I have no doubt that the honorable Senator had a fair opportunity of discussing all these grave questions before the people of his State in relation to governments de jure and de facto. With that we have nothing to do on this occasion.

One thing we do know, that when this Government interposed, whether rightfully or wrongfully is another matter, the people quietly submitted to whatever was demanded. They were peaceable, quiet, obedient citizens, and not one single act was committed inconsistent with that submission to Federal authority from that time to this moment. They are to be commended for their prudent course. This was the conduct of a people who could in the demonstration of a single hour dissipate a whole government! the chief of it fleeing to the custom-house, and amid acclamations of the people install in power the one of their choice. I say to the honorable Senator from Illinois that I shall not dignify this movement with the name of revolution, nor should he. Revolutions lie deeper and broader than this. It was simply an uprising of the people against wrong and crime, and the guilty fled!

Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate for a few moments in calling the attention of this body to the condition of things in Louisiana at the present time, and seeing in what, where, and how this Administration can be justified in organizing the Legislature. One fact we do know, and that is that Kellogg's fate depended upon the organization of this Legislature. If organized as they were elected by the people, we know, and you know, and he knew that he would not have remained in his position as governor of the State of Louisiana a single hour. He was too wise not to know it; his friends in office were too wise not to know it; those men who are living upon the substance of that people without their consent were too wise not to know it; and therefore all the appliances of party machinery, of political power, of every means they possessed, were brought to bear to carry the election. It was in their interest to do it. It was their only hope. Everything depended upon the Legislature. And then see the interest that must necessarily inspire Kellogg and his dependents to secure results. Do you not believe he did it? Do you not believe he put all the appliances he could to work to do it? The colored people in one parish were told of murders and outrages in another parish, and were in every way alarmed. United States officers, Merrill included, were traversing the State making affidavits and arresting citizens. On the eve of the election hundreds of the best citizens of Louisiana were arrested and taken from their homes. All kinds of intimidation were practiced, not by the people, but by officers and soldiers of the United States.

Kellogg knew the stake for which he was playing. He had the appointment of the registrars and of the supervisors of election in every parish, and the returning board was, with I believe one exception, in sympathy with him, if not his mere creatures. I am not advised, but if the board was organized under the law of 1870 he was a member of it, together with the secretary of state, the lieutenant governor, and two others. If organized under the act approved by Warmoth on the 20th of November, 1872, then the senate, a body of his own friends, selected the returning board.

Mr. President, the conspiracy was complete to retain Kellogg in power, just as complete as when Attorney-General Williams telegraphed to the general commanding in New Orleans to carry out any mandate that might be made by the courts there in order to put Kellogg in power. The conspiracy was complete to secure the Legislature. He knew that without it he could not live. When I say live, I mean politically; nobody has hurt him. Whatever he may have done to others there, he is undisturbed, unmolested physically, and can live there for all time, I do not doubt, in his proper position—that of a citizen obedient to the law. Then that returning board, so constituted, and in fact having control of all elections in that State, sat for sixty days upon the returns; and of course, as it was ordered and expected, returned a majority of republicans, rejecting or amending returns of parish upon parish to do so. So palpable, however, were the cases of five parishes, where while they would not give certificates to the men elected, they did not give certificates to their political friends who were not elected, but referred their cases to the Legislature, but were certain enough to give certificates to a sufficient number for the organization of the house in the interests of Kellogg. The board, having secured a majority in the house, was then willing to throw some responsibility upon it in deciding upon the membership from these five parishes, whose members that board thought at least were practically excluded from the body.

You can see precisely the condition of things. Was there hope for any patriot; was there hope for any lover of law and order; was there hope of escape from such a government? None upon earth. It was to be perpetuated; and therefore, when the 4th day of January came, the day of the meeting of the Legislature, necessarily, naturally there must have been a feeling of the deepest intensity pervading all classes of that people; for it came directly home to them whether they were perpetually to be under this domination, never to be rid of it. With such a returning board, both houses in the condition we find them on that day, with Kellogg and his creatures in power, the question was whether, ever, and if so how were they to be relieved from this usurpation, from this misgovernment. The question with Kellogg, on the other hand, was whether he was to be any longer governor if the organization of that Legislature was democratic, and how such a thing could be avoided.

You may well imagine the feelings, the hopes, and fears of all. Arrangements were made for the return of a majority of republican members. Arrangements were made as early as December 26 to provide that soldiers of the United States be on hand; arrangements were made as early as December 26 to have General Sheridan there in order that responsibility might be taken in what was required to be done to keep in power the usurpers who were still determined to control the destinies of the people of that State. There was as deep-seated a conspiracy then as there was when Durell was to pass the order and the Federal troops were to be at the State-house to enforce it before it was passed. Sheridan was to do the work. Kellogg was to call on him to do it. When the conspirators found that there were weak republicans in that body, when by tact or energy or courage Wiltz was made speaker of and organized the house; when they found that this organization would stand and that soon their own fate might be determined, they were ready for the emergency, the Army was ready at hand to do their bidding, the Army did it, and we behold the consequences—a Legislature of a sovereign State disorganized, disbanded as to all useful purposes, and the conspirators masters of the situation.

Why, sir, can it be possible that we are to look upon this thing with any degree of patience? What do we behold to-day with all this before our eyes? I see before me the honorable Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] who read with unction the other day a telegraphic communication from General Sheridan to the Secretary of War, and I desire for one minute to call the attention of the honorable Senator to that communication and to a subsequent one which I would desire that honorable Senator to read. He called attention to this communication for the purpose of impressing the mind of the Senate with the views entertained by Sheridan, an officer in whose truth and in whose capacity to attain a knowledge of things in that State he had entire confidence, and he put it before the Senate for that purpose.

I know that honorable Senator. I know that he has a mind broad enough to comprehend the relations of a people to him as a Senator. He knows what it is to get information upon the relations of the people of Louisiana to the subjects now agitating the public mind, and yet he would seem to rely upon that given by one who just got there three days before this information was communicated. That honorable Senator, feeling the sensibility that must necessarily attach to an administration standing upon ground so unstable as the present, felt the importance of depending upon some one that had a name and that had a fame in order to strengthen still further wrong impressions as against those unhappy people. He did it, but I appeal to the honorable Senator whether that statement of Sheridan's can possibly and naturally be true. Take the time he was there, with the number of facts connected with the whole matter, with his general want of knowledge of political complications and particularly of the relations of that people to this Government and of their own rights, besides the fact that not a single act of violence or defiance had been committed while he has been there! He must have come to his knowledge by intuition. With charges more comprehensive than Burke's against Hastings, he maligns a whole people with crime.

I give the communication of Sheridan made to the Secretary of War, which was read by the honorable Senator, at length:

HEADQUARTERS MILITARY DIVISION OF THE MISSOURI,
New Orleans, Louisiana, January 4, 1875.

Hon. W. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War, Washington, District of Columbia:

It is with deep regret that I have to announce to you the existence in this State of a spirit of defiance to all lawful authority and an insecurity of life which is hardly realized by the General Government or the country at large. The lives of citizens have become so jeopardized that unless something is done to give protection to the people all security usually afforded by law will be overridden. Defiance to the laws, and the murder of individuals, seem to be looked upon by the community here from a stand-point which gives impunity to all who choose to indulge in either, and the civil government appears powerless to punish or even arrest.

I have to-night assumed control over the Department of the Gulf.

P. H. SHERIDAN,
Lieutenant-General.

He regrets to state that there is a spirit of defiance to all lawful authority, and insecurity of life, which is hardly realized by the General Government or the country at large!

How did he ascertain that fact? What does the honorable Senator consider "lawful authority" in the city of New Orleans? The Legislature in session! Kellogg installed by Federal bayonets. "Lawful authority" in the city of New Orleans! I assert here to-day, I assert it as a fact which the honorable Senator from Louisiana [Mr. WEST] will not deny, that peace and order prevailed that day, the 4th of January, in the city of New Orleans, that there was no man slain, that there was no man molested or disturbed in any way by the people—if so, name him; that there was no man murdered—if so, name him—on that day, or days preceding or days subsequent.

Mr. WEST. O, yes.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. There may have been one; who was he?

Mr. WEST. There was an officer of the United States Government, an assistant appraiser in the custom-house at New Orleans, walking peaceably along the street, who was mistaken, it is supposed, for a member of the Legislature and was shot down; and nobody discovered who did it, and nobody was arrested for the crime.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. There was one man shot. Any other? Let us understand it.

Mr. WEST. I do not know that that particular bullet hit anybody else; but I will tell him that the most prominent judge of a criminal court in the city of New Orleans has been missing for five days, and that nobody has been able to discover his whereabouts. He is a republican also.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I will tell you one man that is not missing, and has not been missed since the first day of trouble in Louisiana, that is Kellogg. Durell is not missing—not in that sense. Packard is not missing. It is an important matter that Kellogg should be there; and he is there, and nobody disturbs him. Where are the assassins in New Orleans? Why do they not strike at Cæsar, instead of an humble colored man or individuals so humble whose names cannot be given? Your legislators are there; are any of them slain or in anywise disturbed? You, sir, live there, are with these people, denounce them on this floor, and you appear here session after session. You are not disturbed nor do you fear that you will be. I know of no man prominent in the politics of that State who has been molested in any way. If there has been one, name him. Dibble is there, Durell is there, Kellogg is there, Pinchback is there, Packard is there, Casey is there; yes, amid all the blood and murder in the State of Louisiana and in the city of New Orleans, these men, these Cæsars in political power stand out in prominent view before the public unharmed and untouched; but the honorable Senator will get up here and, for the purpose of sustaining the "outrage business," tell us of one man slain, of another shot at by mistake, and of some judge of some criminal court missing, not heard from for five days, and a republican—not an unusual thing these days for men to be missing and republicans too; and yet no one believes they have been murdered.

Mr. WEST. Will the Senator from Maryland pardon me if I will furnish him another instance? Does he desire me to do it? I do not want to interrupt him.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I have no objection. It is not very hard, I suppose, for the honorable Senator to find another instance. They are so plenty down there, there are so many assassins and murderers there, that there ought not to be much trouble in finding any number; but let us hear it.

Mr. WEST. I think the Senator has called upon me to cite some instances. I will cite him another. An ex-governor of that State, because he was striving to defend the rights of the colored men in the city of New Orleans, was brutally stricken down by the editor of a democratic paper and had to protect his own life by taking that of his assailant.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I think the Senator is referring to his friend Warmoth. [Laughter.] But I do wonder that the honorable Senator gets up to defend Warmoth at this day. I remember well the time when we heard eulogies from that honorable Senator upon Warmoth. But I was under the impression that all that belonged to the past, and was not prepared to hear the Senator defend him to-day. It shows what we are able to do when we are willing. The Senator is now speaking about a street fight between Warmoth and some editor. Remarkable instance, indeed, to which I am referred for murder and assassination! This is an occurrence not confined alone to New Orleans, I would say to the Senator; not at all! Even editors at times fight one another.

But let us see what the Senator did say of Warmoth at one time:

By his statesmanship he has evolved order out of chaos; by his determination he has subdued the spirit of misrule; by his conciliation and magnanimity he has disarmed political enmity of much of its rancor; and by his fidelity to the high duties of his office he has set a noble example to the chief magistrates of other States which it would be well for the peace and welfare of our country should be followed. He is himself the impersonation of the success of the reconstruction measures of Congress and republican principles when faithfully and ably administered.

That is Governor Warmoth as drawn by the honorable Senator from Louisiana three years ago. Drawn, too, with all the emphasis I judge the Senator could command.

Mr. WEST. O, yes, three years ago.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. You have not changed your opinion about him, have you?

Mr. WEST. Not about his actions at that time.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. But since?

Mr. WEST. Since then, most assuredly.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Just see the evasions, the subterfuges of honorable Senators on the other side when they undertake to put assassination and murder upon the good people of New Orleans; and, when called upon to be specific, the Senator from Louisiana, himself living in New Orleans, did mention but one instance, and did not give the name of the murdered man at that! True, he gave us a man shot at and missed, another missing, and a street fight between an editor and a politician. I refer the Senator to New York and all other cities in the country for a far better exhibit in the murder and assassination business than New Orleans can furnish. But one is named, and that an unsatisfactory one; to name but one amid all this bloody work! I would call the attention of my honorable friend from Indiana to that impressive fact.

Mr. MORTON. Of what is the Senator speaking?

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I am speaking of the condition of things since the Penn troubles in the city of New Orleans. I am referring to the times when you undertake to say there was tumult and disorder, murder and assassination and violence, in the city of New Orleans.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator state how many were murdered on the 14th of September?

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. O, we understand that. The 14th of September was an open conflict between citizens and citizens—a movement of masses of people.

I am talking about murders and assassinations. I am talking about that which is held up with so much passion to the indignation of the American people to move the honest hearts of that people against their brethren of the South. We know what murder—what assassination is. We must not mix them up with a conflict of masses of people. Greater motives impel them, greater reasons are behind them than can inspire the hand of the assassin and of the murderer. I am speaking as to that which honorable Senators on this floor have charged upon the people of New Orleans and Louisiana, and not as to the struggles of an oppressed people to rid themselves of their oppressors.

But I have been led away from the course of my remarks by interruptions, but to which I do not object. Now allow me to call the attention of my honorable friend from Vermont to another fact in regard to General Sheridan. He read, as I have already said, from General Sheridan to show you the condition of the people of Louisiana, their spirit and conduct. Having relied upon Sheridan for a statement of facts, I would ask my honorable friend whether he relies equally upon him for his law? I am sorry that that honorable Senator is not now present, but if he relies upon Sheridan, who, by his intuitive sagacity, can apprehend facts unknown to others, and by his all-wise comprehension and broad intellect solve their relations at once, can in four days measure the conduct and motives and spirit of the people of New Orleans and of Louisiana, I would like to know whether he would be disposed to attach that same sagacity and comprehension to his knowledge of the law. Here is Sheridan on law. Let me give it at length, and then a few comments:

HEADQUARTERS MILITARY DIVISION OF THE MISSOURI,
New Orleans, Louisiana, January 5, 1875.

Hon. W. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.:

I think the terrorism now existing in Louisiana, Mississippi, and Arkansas could be entirely removed and confidence and fair-dealing established by the arrest and trial of the ringleaders of the armed white-leaguers. If Congress would pass a bill declaring them banditti, they could be tried by a military commission. This banditti who murdered men here on the 14th of last September, also more recently at Vicksburgh, Mississippi, should, in justice to law and order and the peace and prosperity of this southern part of the country, be punished. It is possible that if the President would issue a proclamation declaring them banditti that no further action need be taken except that which would devolve upon me.

P. H. SHERIDAN,
Lieutenant-General United States Army.

Says Sheridan:

I think the terrorism now existing in Louisiana, Mississippi, and Arkansas—

He has not been in either Mississippi or Arkansas—could be entirely removed and confidence and fair-dealing established—

Fair-dealing between such men as Kellogg and those under and around him in the State of Louisiana!—

established by the arrest and trial of the ringleaders of the armed white-leagures.

"By the arrest and trial of the ringleaders of the armed white-leaguers!" Who are they?

If Congress would pass a bill declaring them banditti, they could be tried by military commission.

A military commission, Mr. President, do I read? Let me pause. A military commission was one of the appliances, the horrid appliances—I will not speak of the civil war; it is gone, it is to be hoped, forever. Its use will forever remain a blot upon the fair fame of American liberty. It will not out. Our birthright, coming to us from our English ancestors, an institution wrought out by wisdom and experience and maintained by their valor—the trial by jury; and as history is written, and as it goes down the tide of time, every lover of liberty in all time to come will be referred by it to the black night that closed over for the time American liberty, free institutions, and constitutional forms of government. A military commission! My honorable friend upon the other side has great confidence in Sheridan's intuitive knowledge of what occurred in the State of Louisiana in four days. He is a lawyer, and a profound lawyer, and particularly apt in drawing statutes; will he draw for his friend Sheridan a statute that shall comprehend these banditti, and put them in the safe-keeping and tender mercies of a military commission? But, not that alone. This general who has been sent down by the President, in view of the organization of this Legislature, to deal with the rights and liberties of a free people, does not stop there. He goes a little further. If my honorable friend should fail, with all his conceded ability in framing statutes, to meet Sheridan's views, and Congress should do nothing of the kind, then says the soldier and lawyer:

It is possible that if the President would issue a proclamation declaring them banditti, that no further action need be taken except that which would devolve upon me.

Republican Senators may smile themselves at this. All that is wanted now under our form of government is for the President to declare them banditti! Here is an officer high in military fame, high in the ranks of the Army, sent upon a special mission. Suppose the President should be capable of declaring these people banditti, and let the balance devolve upon him; think of it. Has it come to this? I suppose he would have those people left to him as were the defenseless Piegans. Has it come to this, that the President of the United States is thought able to declare citizens of the United States banditti and that a military officer of the United States has then the power to do the balance of the work? It is shocking to the sense of a common humanity; it is shocking to the sense of every American citizen, and every lover of liberty throughout the world; and shall nothing be done? Shall we, the guardians of constitutional government, sit supinely by? Shall there be no movement on our part, on the part of the American people, to arrest the progress of military arrogance and of military despotism and of military power? Are we to sit here and see a military officer high in the Army in flaunting words advise the President to declare a class of men banditti, and to leave to him the execution of the balance?

Mr. President, I do not mistake the condition of things which surround us with such a feeling and such a sentiment. With that same sentiment to-day, do you believe it, the President at the other end of the avenue could order that same general into your Chamber and disperse this Senate? Do you believe it? He would do it, if ordered to do it. That general is capable of doing it to-day, and I say now, notwithstanding the States, their governors, and their people and their power of resistance, to-day the President of the United States, defenseless as we are here in this Capitol, could have Sheridan march a file of soldiers into this body and into the House of Representatives and disperse them at the point of the bayonet. I am talking not about what is to be done—I am talking about what could be done to-day with this body and with the House in view of the powers claimed by soldiers of the country. President Grant may not be a Cæsar, he may not be a Cromwell, he may not be a Napoleon; but he possesses to-day the power of all three. He possesses the regular Army of the United States, taught, educated as part of their discipline, to obey him. He can direct that Army against any man or class of men or against anybody in this country, and he will be obeyed. I tell you that an officer of the Army of the United States who under the order of the President would enter into the legislative halls of a sovereign State and arrest or disperse its members is equally capable of entering into these halls and driving the Senate and House from this Capitol. I tell you that this body is not higher in responsibility, is not greater in degree, than the Legislature of a sovereign State, and the regular soldier that enters there under the order of the President of the United States either to organize or disperse that legislature is competent to march into either body here, and the day may come, unless the pure spirit of American liberty still survives, when amid troubles and disorder and violence some aspiring Cæsar, Cromwell, or Napoleon at the other end of the avenue may require the arrest of some or the dispersion of all the members in both Houses of Congress, and the regular Army, taught as it is now, will do it if ordered.

Here lies our great trouble and our greatest danger. I am not opposed to the regular soldier as a soldier in the discharge of his duties. But we know that he is in sympathy entirely with the Federal Government and entirely obedient to Executive authority. At West Point, in this respect, they are taught simply obedience to the President as their Commander-in-Chief; never taught reverence for the Constitution and the laws as supreme over all. They obey, they will execute any order coming from superior officers. Were the President but to declare these people banditti, with Sheridan willing to execute in the spirit he wrote, his orders would be obeyed whatever they might be, however barbarous, however repugnant to liberty and law they might be, rather than as honorable men first and soldiers afterward lay down their swords. Notwithstanding the education of the day and the training at West Point, I hold it to be the first duty of a true American soldier, whether he be of the regular Army or of the militia, when his commanding officer would undertake to command him to strike down American liberty, the Constitution and laws of the land, that he should rather suffer degradation than obey it. He is to be the judge, true. And he does it upon the grave responsibility whether he be right or wrong; but no one that is fit to be an American soldier can fail to know that to refuse to obey an order to disperse the Congress or any one of the Legislatures of the States is to discharge the highest duty he owes to his country.

I depend upon the militia of the States and the people of the States, who are in sympathy with our forms of government and are willing to discharge all the rightful duties required upon the part of the Executive, in the execution of the laws.

Now, Mr. President, a little longer, and then I am done. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to another dispatch from General Sheridan, and which does not appear to have attracted the notice of Senators upon the other side of the Chamber. You may think I am alarmed about soldiers. I do not care for them generally. I prefer people in the other pursuits of life. Physical courage is a very common thing; everybody has it in a greater or less degree. You may say that man is a brave man; you may say that of many—of millions in the United States. All men will fight; there are very few that will not. There is hardly any man anywhere who will not fight on a proper occasion or when pressed to it. History, from its earliest dawn to the present, is but little more than an uninterrupted fight among men of all nations, tongues, and color upon the face of the earth; its pages from remotest antiquity are but repetitions of battles, sieges, victories, slaughter, carnage, pillage, suffering. So that men who are brave, and who are not afraid, have been found everywhere, are found to-day, and will be found in all time to come.

Mr. President, I suppose there is no doubt about the authenticity of these dispatches. They appear to come through the Secretary of War. The truth is, when I first read these dispatches of General Sheridan I could hardly believe them to be genuine. I thought they were manufactured—got up for the occasion. I could not believe them to be true, and was disposed not to give credence to them; but then I did not know Sheridan. It appears our friends did on the other side believe them to be genuine, and used one—only one—to help them. I read it as it is:

NEW ORLEANS, January 6, 1875.

Hon. W. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.:

The city is very quiet to-day. Some of the banditti made idle threats last night that they would assassinate me because I dared to tell the truth. I am not afraid, and will not be stopped from informing the Government that there are localities in this department where the very air has been impregnated with assassination for some years.

P. H. SHERIDAN,
Lieutenant-General, Commanding.

A fit dispatch, indeed, to follow the others! Yes, sir.

The city is very quiet to-day.

When was it otherwise? The 14th of September, says my friend from Indiana—

Some of the banditti made idle threats last night that they would assassinate me because I dared to tell the truth.

Because I dared!

I am not afraid—

Who ever said he was? Nobody ever supposed, nobody ever charged, that General Sheridan was "afraid;" afraid, too, at that, "of idle threats." He felt it to be his duty to announce to the Secretary of War that there were "idle threats" made "by some" whom he describes "banditti." He does not name them. Did he hear these "some" himself, or does he get this information as he got that contained in his first dispatch read by the Senator from Vermont? They made "idle threats" to assassinate him. If he knows them to be "idle," where is the trouble? But, forsooth, "I am not afraid!" Further the general says:

Will not be stopped from informing the Government that there are localities in this department where the very air has been impregnated with assassination for some years.

Indeed! The very "air has been impregnated with assassination for some years!" How does General Sheridan know that the air is impregnated with assassination, and for so long a time? He is not "afraid" of anything on earth, especially "idle threats." He then takes wings for the air, and finds there what is far worse than "idle threats;" that it is impregnated "with assassination," and has been for some two years. Think of it, that he should be the commander of that important department of the country to take care of the interests of the people! Unfit as a military man, unfit as a man simply to take care of any people, much less a people situated as they are. Afraid! I would ask my honorable friend from Louisiana [Mr. WEST] why afraid? Though my honorable friend does denounce those people, he does it in a political sense and for political purposes, and I know and he knows that he is not "afraid" to be among them any more than Sheridan. There is no one there to assassinate the honorable Senator from Louisiana, who, when he returns from his home in New Orleans to this Chamber, is always looking better than when he left at the close of the session for his home in New Orleans, where all this blood and murder and assassination is going on. If this were all true as depicted in this Chamber, I would look for some of its effects upon the nervous sensibilities of the Senator. I see none; but cool and calm, his own looks tell us that he is not afraid. Kellogg is not afraid, Dibble is not afraid, Packard is not afraid, Casey is not afraid, and why should Sheridan be afraid? All these people live there, nobody is assassinated, and nobody is disturbed, nobody is molested in their lawful pursuits.

Can it be conceived that we are living in such times that we have generals at the head of our armies announcing such sentiments of ill-will and of hatred against those people? I know that republican Senators on the other side of the Chamber are not any more in favor of military rule or of mere soldiers being at the head of the Government than I am; but when the time comes, with the weakness of human nature they think that they are able to use a soldier for the accomplishment of a political object, and there end it. The prize is the control of over $400,000,000 a year, besides the countless offices, and having place and position here for themselves is something; and if they can secure the aid of a military chieftain who may possess personal popularity in obtaining all this for them, while he has for his share the other end of the avenue, it is something for all; but the republican masses do not want the rule of men like Sheridan over them any more than do the people of Louisiana, and our republican friends upon the other side of the Chamber will soon discover that.

If Senators were in the situation of those poor people and saw a government put over them against their will and put under the absolute control of the colored element, under the lead of carpet-baggers and other bad men, their property squandered, their little ones suffering, their estates gone, without law, without order, and without judgment in the land, I am sure my honorable friend from Indiana would himself be among the first to complain too, and he would resist. I know his spirit too well. He would not tamely submit to the usurpations, wrongs, and crimes that prevail now in the State of Louisiana. No; his heart would beat as the heart of a free man, his nerves would be strong against oppressions of that kind, and he would use all the means in his power to get rid of such a condition of things. My honorable friend from Louisiana has agreed, it is admitted on all hands, that there is poverty and wretchedness among all classes in the State of Louisiana; that the people are poor; that their estates are gone and business is gone; that now the city of New Orleans is almost a waste; no business, no energy, no enterprise.

What shall be done to lift up this poor people? They are proud, patriotic, and good men. They fought you on a principle, but since they have laid down their arms they have been obedient to all law, State and Federal. They may have troubles among themselves, and quarrels, and disturbances forced upon them—with that we have nothing whatever to do—but in their relations to the Federal Government they have been true and faithful to every obligation they took when they laid down their arms. They fought you gallantly in the field, and they now desire to be friends in peace; and will you not give them peace? Lift up their prostrate hands. Allow them to control their own domestic affairs. Let them rid themselves of the men who now thrust themselves upon them, and with our aid, and once more there will be peace throughout the land, not only in the State of Louisiana, but peace within our whole borders; and leaving localities and States to attend to their domestic and internal concerns and thus having our noble democratic institutions in full working order, we can meet here as brethren of one nation, to attend to the common interests of a common and a glorious country; and why should we not do it without oppressing a portion? The oppression of one is the oppression of all, and the disorders to-day in Louisiana, Mississippi, and South Carolina are felt throughout the entire land. Our whole people suffer when they suffer; and why should not we as a homogeneous people, as a people consecrating our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor to the maintenance of free institutions and of our Constitution and form of government, be just to all classes of our people and to all portions of our country, and leave them free in their various localities to pursue the paths of life as to them it shall be deemed best and most judicious? I feel that with such a policy the heritage of our fathers will be transmitted to our children, a blessing to generation upon generation of a free, powerful, and happy people.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I desire to submit some remarks to the Senate on the pending resolution, but understanding that there is a desire for a short executive session, I will yield the floor to that motion.

Mr. PATTERSON. I was going to make a motion that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. BAYARD. If that is the desire of the Senate, I will submit a motion to adjourn, leaving this the unfinished business, so that I shall have the floor to-morrow. Therefore I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator withdraw the motion for a few moments, that the Chair may lay before the Senate certain House bills for reference?

Mr. BAYARD. Certainly.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

The bill (H. R. No. 103) granting the Memphis and Vicksburgh Railroad Company the right of way along the river bank at the national cemetery at Vicksburgh, Mississippi;

The bill (H. R. No. 1678) to provide for post-quartermaster-sergeants;

The bill (H. R. No. 2724) for the relief of certain States and Territories, on account of ordnance stores issued to them during the late civil war;

The bill (H. R. No. 4187) to donate certain artillery equipments, &c., to the trustees of the Soldiers' Orphans' Home of the State of Illinois;

The bill (H. R. No. 4188) to release the Fort Butler military reservation;

The bill (H. R. No. 4185) for the relief of Brevet Brigadier-General B. S. Roberts; and

The bill (H. R. No. 4190) for the relief of William H. Carmen.

The bill (H. R. No. 3823) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876; was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLINTON LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. No. 1044) to provide for the resumption of specie payments; and it was thereupon signed by the Vice-President.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator from Delaware gives way in order that we may have a short executive session. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BAYARD. I withdraw the motion to adjourn that the Senator from California may make that motion.

Mr. SARGENT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eighteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and twenty-two minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 7, 1875.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

KLAMATH INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. NESMITH, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4193) to adjust the claim of the owners of lands within the limits of the Klamath Indian reservation, in the State of Oregon; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

TROUBLES IN LOUISIANA.

Mr. WHITE. I ask unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, It is the sense of this House that the President is entitled to the grateful confidence and cordial support of the country for the prompt and efficient measures for the prevention of violence and wrong and the maintenance of law and order in the State of Louisiana, and we pledge him our hearty co-operation in sustaining his efforts in that behalf.

Mr. BROMBERG. I object.

Mr. BECK. Let us have the yeas and nays on it.

Mr. BROMBERG. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. CALDWELL. I object.

Mr. BROMBERG. I feel it to be my duty also to insist on my objection to the resolution.

LAWRENCE WILLIAMS.

Mr. SMART, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No 4194) to restore Lawrence Williams to the rolls of the Army; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CAPTAIN WILLIAM MAYNADIER, UNITED STATES ARMY.

Mr. VANCE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4195) to authorize the President to appoint Captain William Maynadier to his former rank in the Army; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

DAVID M'CLELLAND AND OTHERS.

Mr. DUELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4196) for the relief of David McClelland and others; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

NEW HAVEN HARBOR.

Mr. KELLOGG, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to make report to this House of surveys already made in regard to the expediency of widening and deepening the main channel of New Haven Harbor, Connecticut, to a depth not exceeding twenty feet; and also the expediency and estimate of the expense of a breakwater between the eastern shore of the entrance of said harbor and the Southwest Ledge, so called, or such part of said distance as may be found most convenient or necessary for the protection of said harbor.

Mr. HOLMAN. I must object unless the resolution is referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. KELLOGG. I agree to its reference, although it only refers to surveys already made.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

CURRENCY.

Mr. BECK, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4197) to provide a uniform currency, for the retiring of national-bank notes, for the resumption of specie payment, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

RECUSANT WITNESS—RICHARD B. IRWIN.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has received from the hands of an attorney the petition of Richard B. Irwin, now in confinement by order of the House. He has glanced over it, and seeing nothing disrespectful in it, lays it before the House for consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 7, 1875.

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

The undersigned, your petitioner, begs leave respectfully to represent that his confinement in the common jail of the District of Columbia, as ordered by the resolution of the House yesterday, will operate with peculiar severity and hardship on his physical health, already so greatly enfeebled as to render punishment of that kind closely akin to torture.

He understands from the debate that accompanied the resolution, that the imprisonment is not intended by the House of Representatives to be punitive, but merely as a safeguard for reappearance when wanted before the Committee of Ways and Means or by the United States district attorney, to whom his case is to be duly certified according to law.

Whether intended or not as a punishment, it will be readily seen that confinement of this character necessarily operates as a punishment in advance of the judicial trial which is to determine whether your petitioner has committed any offense against the law

Your enlightened body would never conceive of applying the rack, the thumbscrew, the boot, or red-hot pincers as a means of extorting an answer to questions, and yet it will readily occur to you that a witness in the physically prostrated condition of the undersigned, must find in a damp, cold, ill-ventilated prison, and in the unnecessary indignity connected therewith, a torture differing only in degree from the cruel modes referred to.

It has been said that this punishment cannot be cruel, because the witness can terminate it at will. That is equally true of the thumb screw and the rack.

The undersigned begs leave further to represent as informed, by counsel and as he fully believes himself, that the course adopted in this case is unusual and exceptional.

No witness in contempt of either branch of Congress since the passage of the act of 1857 has been thus treated.

The cases are quite numerous where the alleged contempt has certainly been of as grave a character as that with which your petitioner is charged. And yet in no other case has the common jail been specified as the place of confinement, but in every instance the witness has been left simply to the responsible custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

It was stated yesterday in debate that Simonton was sent to jail. Your petitioner is informed that not only is this statement not exact, but that in fact the House refused to name the jail as the place of custody. In Stewart's case, in the last Congress, the motion to send him to jail was voted down by a very large majority; yet these were witnesses in the flower of health, whose testimony on the questions they refused to answer was so essential to the prosecution of the inquiry, that the proceedings were virtually arrested by such refusal; whereas your petitioner is in feeble health, and his answers to the inquiries at issue are no longer necessary to the prosecution of the investigation, which has not been arrested for a single day by his refusal, and all of the evidence is being elicited from other sources.

Wherefore your petitioner most respectfully and earnestly asks that the order for his confinement may be changed so far as to conform to the uniform usage in like cases, and so as not to inflict a severe and possibly dangerous, and certainly unnecessary, punishment in advance of his being found guilty of any offense under the law.

And, as in duty bound, your petitioner will ever pray.

RICHARD B. IRWIN.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the petition will be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, is the matter debatable?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Massachusetts proposes any action it will be debatable.

Mr. DAWES. For the purpose of saying a few words I will move that the petition be printed. I shall withdraw that motion when I have finished my remarks.

I desire to say, as representing the Committee on Ways and Means, that they have no desire to renew the discussion of yesterday before the House. The witness has appealed from that committee to the House, and after having taken the judgment of the House yesterday has come in here this morning and criticises the action of the House. The committee do not believe that they have any further responsibility in the matter. If the House desires to sit patiently and have its judgment criticised in the manner in which it is criticised in that paper, and desires to reverse it under those circumstances, the Committee on Ways and Means have no occasion to complain. They have brought all their action from time to time before the House, and have in every step of it received the support of the House. They yesterday submitted this whole matter to the House, and by a very decided vote the House took the action which this witness sees fit this morning to criticise in the terms that he has used. If the House deem it proper to now reverse that action, I do not feel called upon, as representing the Committee on Ways and Means, to say one word further. The committee will take it as instructions on the part of the House to the committee to abandon any further investigation. I withdraw the motion to print.

Mr. MAYNARD. Before the gentleman withdraws his motion will he yield a moment to me?

Mr. DAWES. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MAYNARD. Gentlemen will recollect that yesterday I sought to amend the resolution which was introduced by changing the place of confinement from the jail of the District of Columbia to the usual receptable for such persons in the crypt in this wing of the Capitol. I was clearly of opinion that every necessary purpose would be accomplished by making that change. I made the best presentation of the matter that I was capable of doing, and submitted to the House a precedent that occurred in the last Congress. The reasons that I urged were not deemed by the House to be sufficient. On what we must assume to be full consideration, certainly after considerable discussion, the House decided upon the action which was finally adopted. That presents the question, Mr. Speaker, in an entirely different aspect; whether, having deliberately come to the judgment, we shall adhere to it, or shall present the appearance of fluctuation, inconstancy, want of knowledge of the effects of our own action, and generally whether we are sincere and earnest, and really mean the action we take. In that view of the case, Mr. Speaker, I should be wholly unwilling to seek any modification of the action of yesterday.

Mr. TREMAIN. This witness holds the key to the door of the jail in his own pocket, and I move to lay the communication on the table.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that this question is not precisely as the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means has endeavored to represent it to the House. I do not look upon the petition of the prisoner as a criticism upon the action of the House. It is the mere exercise of the American right of petition.

It may have been known to the House that this man was in feeble health. I am not aware, however, that that fact was communicated to it in connection with the consideration of this subject so that we were officially informed of it. And this is the burden of his petition, representing the condition of his health, and showing, I think, in proper words that imprisonment may endanger not his health alone but his life. Is that right to be denied to a man situated as he is, and must it be looked upon as an imputation on the judgment of the House that he comes here and in respectful terms presents his case to the House and asks its consideration? And shall we from some unnecessary sensitiveness, as I think, undertake to make it appear that that is a criticism of the judgment of the House? Is there anything in the language of that petition that is not entirely respectful and proper? I was unable to observe a word in it that was not in proper terms, that was not respectful to the House, that was not a proper presentation of his case, asking the House to consider it. And shall we turn him away with contempt because perchance in presenting his case, there may be some terms that would seem to be criticisms of the action of the House? I trust not. Let us, at all events, give him a fair and candid hearing, and see whether we shall apply imprisonment in the county jail, or, as he suggests, any other unusual punishment to him, when, if he has committed a crime against the laws of his country, the time will come when upon the judgment of the proper court, having been tried by his peers and according to law, he may receive proper punishment.

Mr. DAWES. I did not mean in using the word "criticism" to say that he had used any words disrespectful to the House of Representatives, for I do not think he has done so.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, in laying the petition before the House stated that as in all such cases he had looked over it to see if it contained any language disrespectful to the House; and had there been in the petition any language in his judgment disrespectful to the House, he would not have submitted it.

Mr. DAWES. I did not intend in the slightest degree to intimate that the witness had used any language disrespectful to the House. I meant by the word "criticism" to mean simply that he argued against the decision of the House and criticised the justice of its decision. I am willing to admit and am glad to admit that he has done it in respectful language; but still it is a criticism on the judgment of the House. In speaking for the Committee on Ways and Means, I desire simply to have the judgment of the House; and if the gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] renews his motion, I will be obliged to the House if they will have a yea and nay vote on it, so that we may understand if the House desires to discharge this witness. If so, we have not the slightest desire to interfere. I yield for a moment to my colleague on the committee from New York, [Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS.]

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, if the witness had submitted in his petition any reason why the House should retrace its steps of yesterday, I for one would be glad to consider the reasons which he submits. He pleads that his health is poor, and for that reason confinement in the common jail would be in the nature of torture; but that common jail, Mr. Speaker, is the place where persons are confined who are not charged so seriously as this witness is charged before this House. There is no close confinement required by the resolution of the House. He is simply to be placed in the common jail, and already the papers are eloquent on the provisions that are to be made for his comfort at that place. I am not here to ask that he shall be denied the comforts which his health may require in the common jail, but I for one feel that there is in his petition no reason why the House should retrace its steps, and I for one desire that the House shall take the responsibility of saying whether or not a witness testifying what he has done shall be permitted to stop just there and then to dictate to the House what course the House shall take with reference to him.

Mr. DAWES. I yield for a moment to my colleague from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I was unfortunately absent last night, or fortunately perhaps for myself, when this debate took place and when the action of the House was had. I have read that debate in the RECORD of this morning, and I now find that a new reason has been put forward by the witness which I think appeals to the justice and humanity of the House. He says that he is conscientiously in the belief that this House has not jurisdiction over him under the laws of his country, and that the House has appealed to those laws to try him for his offense, and he says that he, following what he believes to be his right, thinks that we ought not to treat him any worse than a murderer would be treated before a court of justice. If a man accused by a grand jury of his country or by a coroner's jury of murder comes before any court in the United States and shows that his health will be prejudiced and injured by close confinement, there is not a State in this Union where the highest court will not allow him to be bailed.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman is mistaken, I think. It cannot be done in the State of Massachusetts.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Pardon me; my colleague says that it cannot be done in the State of Massachusetts. Let me tell him that the supreme court of Massachusetts, in the case of William Gray in the year 1832, he being a man of full habit and being accustomed to out-door exercise, and making affidavit, supported by his physician, that he would be injured in health by close confinement, admitted him to bail. He was on trial for abortion, which, at that time was a capital offense. And the same thing has been done to my certain knowledge in two other cases. It was done in the case of Simons, where the party had been twice tried and the jury had failed to agree. He was discharged on his own recognizance. That I say is the rule, and the rule in every State in the Union and in the courts of the United States.

This man comes here and says, "Owing to an unfortunate fall, being thrown from my carriage in California, I have been in a condition so that my health is easily impaired either by excitement or other physical causes." That fact he made known to the House before. There is no accusation against him, and to this I challenge reply, and let us here it if there is any, that he ever intended to avoid process or has avoided process. No process was ever issued until the 10th of December, so far as I can learn, against him, and upon that he was immediately found sick at his home, and he came at such time as he could to attend the sessions of the Committee on Ways and Means. That committee reported to the House of Representatives that they were satisfied he acted in good faith. He came here, and there is no man yet who has undertaken to show, so far as I know, that so far as he has answered he has not answered the precise truth; on the contrary, I think that it will be agreed that he has answered the precise truth. Now then he says, "I do not believe I am called upon to answer further; that is a right I want to contest."

What is the answer of the House of Representatives? "Sir, if you attempt to contest that right in court, you shall do it at the peril of your health by being confined in the common jail." That is the answer. "You shall be put where your health will be in peril." Now, is that an answer fitting the House of Representatives of the United States? Pause and reflect.

Mr. Irwin to me is nothing more than the x, y, and z of an algebraic equation, to be wrought out fully and properly in the problem. I have neither fear of his disclosures, nor love for him. He was an officer in the Army, not serving under me. He is now doing what he claims he has a right to do. The courts will punish him under the law of the land for what he has done, if he has done anything wrong. Under these circumstances he comes and in respectful language, as you yourself say, Mr. Speaker, and as it is admitted here, and says to the House of Representatives, "I am in such a condition of health"—and that is a fact that can be ascertained—"that imprisonment is torture." Yet the proposition is here made to torture him. To that I for one cannot agree; to that I for one will not consent.

I know that at times where there is great occasion all bad precedents have been set. I look upon this as a bad precedent, that without examination, without calling a physician, without ascertaining whether we shall have murder added to our other good qualities in this House, if the man dies in jail—without any examination, we are told that we cannot even for a moment re-examine this question of personal liberty. The whole world was convulsed by the order of Bismarck subjecting Van Arnim to imprisonment. We were told, "Look at the operation of German institutions with her emperor." Yet here in America, in the United States, in this Capitol, under the statue of Liberty, we propose to put a sick man to torture in order to force testimony from him. The Inquisition, the Neroes of the Old World, never have done anything worse. A republican majority in the House of Representatives are setting an example to those who will occupy these seats hereafter in the majority, in which I trust in God there will be too much of the democratic love of liberty which I inherit for them to follow. I hope they never will follow it, although we give them great provocation.

Let me suggest this: This man is now in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms. Instead of laying this respectful petition on the table—and we all remember when under the lead of John Quincy Adams this House spent three mortal weeks in discussion as to whether the petition of a slave should be laid upon the table without debate, and it was decided in the negative—I say that instead of so treating the petition of this man we should refer it to a committee, and that committee should ascertain through a proper physician whether his health will be harmed by this confinement. And if his health will be harmed I cannot doubt that there is no committee of this House that will refuse to then say that he shall not be imprisoned where his life may be sacrificed. But if that committee shall find that this is a delusion and a cheat on the part of this man, and that he is trying to play the sick man, then send him to the common jail or elsewhere. And although I doubt the power, yet for one I will not interpose.

Therefore, if I am permitted by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TREMAIN,] who has indicated his purpose to move to lay this petition on the table, I will move to refer it to the Committee on Ways and Means, with instructions to ascertain if the health of this man will be injured by this confinement, whether it will be substantially and materially injured, and to report to this House what action should be taken thereon.

One single other word. I was sorry to hear my friend and colleague, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, [Mr. DAWES,] say, in the nature of a threat, what was much worse than anything I have seen from this witness in the nature of a criticism; that unless we put this sick man in jail, the Committee on Ways and Means would take it as instructions to them to stop this investigation. Why can we not legislate without being threatened? I cannot conceive what the chairman meant by that.

Mr. DAWES. Will my colleague allow me to state——

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. DAWES. I will tell my colleague, who was unfortunately absent yesterday, what I meant. I argued to the House on yesterday that it would tie our hands, so that we could not get on with the investigation; that is what I meant.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Pardon me; let us examine that for a moment. That is, if Irwin is in jail they can investigate; if he is anywhere else they cannot investigate. Now, the logic of that is a little mysterious. It is a sort of magnetic connection they desire to establish with him. If they cannot have a man in jail, they cannot investigate!

I find in reading the debate of yesterday that the chairman of the committee said that a number of witnesses had refused to answer. Of course, as I am not admitted to the committee-room, I do not know how that may be; but if there has been such refusal of a large number of witnesses I would like to know it. I have heard outside of one Mr. Abert, who, in refusing to answer, is acting under the advice of Reverdy Johnson. How that may be I cannot say. But is this sick man to be sent to jail as a matter of threat to the next witness who may believe he has rights here? Have we come to that? I would rather have all the men in Louisiana under the hand of a military officer to administer the law—an officer who can be held personally responsible—than have men subjected to the mere will of a body like the House of Representatives, where you cannot hold anybody responsible, where there is an utter want of responsibility. Any one man who commits a wrong in a matter of this kind can be held responsible in the courts. If De Trobriand, for instance, in Louisiana has committed any wrong under the law in doing what he did, then whoever he laid his hand upon has, thank God, a remedy through the courts of justice of the United States. But when we lay hands upon this man and thrust him into jail, doing this to save our reputation, we are not responsible; what we do cannot be questioned in any other place.

I pray the House of Representatives therefore to pause and consider, that in wielding this great power, exercised without any responsibility elsewhere, we should be extremely careful lest we interfere with the rights of the citizen where there is no redress. It is easy for us to say, "Turn the key on this man;" but there is not one of you who dares say that outside, because the moment you do so you are responsible in the courts of justice for all your acts. For anything done inside these halls you are not responsible in that way. Therefore I pray you to pause.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. My colleague [Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts] tells this House that this man brought to our bar does not believe that we have authority to restrain him in such custody and in such place as we think a fitting custody and place, and that he wants to have a trial upon it. He has had his trial, Mr. Speaker. This House, representing the entire American people, has, in the exercise of its constitutional functions, passed upon his case; and it is a question adjudged—lawfully, constitutionally adjudged. So far, therefore, as this House and its action are concerned, this man is undertaking to set up his opinion and his will against that of the American people, speaking through their constituted representatives. He wants an imprisonment that shall not be inconvenient; and he wants to be distinguished from other violators of the law, when we have left a door wide open through which, by submitting himself to the law, he can at any time be free and discharged. There is always a great deal of this delicacy, it seems to me, when there is a great deal of money at issue. When it is charged that an attempt has been made to corrupt members of the House of Representatives, that legislation has been procured by bribery, it cannot, in my view, be seriously questioned that it is proper for this House to investigate the matter, and to take the proper means, by sending for persons and papers, to compel testimony, using an authority which every court of justice, which every tribunal within the sphere of its appropriate action, always uses.

My colleague wants this House, after voting as it did yesterday, to suspend this proceeding and treat it as not a question settled until some inferior court, some justice of the peace or some tribunal of this District, has passed upon it. I heard once, a great many years ago, a story of a judge in Alabama who was told by a man in open court that he was a fool, with an accompanying epithet which I will not repeat. The judge undertook to sentence him to imprisonment for contempt; but a counselor interposed, and calling his attention to the constitution of the State, said that it could not be done without a trial by jury. The judge thereupon proceeded to impanel a jury, who returned a verdict that he was a fool! The judge thereupon discharged the man, saying that he might go for this time, but that on reflection he thought he would not submit that question again to a jury. I do not suppose this House proposes that its careful judgment on a matter of its constitutional authority, or the proceedings taking place under it, shall be reviewed in the manner proposed; that when an imprisonment ordered by this House shall reach the point that it is shown to be inconvenient or painful, any desired relaxation of such imprisonment will be granted.

I desire to say, in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that I fully agree with my colleague that a better disposition of this petition would be to refer it to the Committee on Ways and Means, because it certainly presents a subject on which this man has a right to petition this House.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, one word, if you please. My colleague, [Mr. E. R. HOAR,] who has just addressed the House, has entirely ignored the only point that I made. My proposition was not now to raise the question whether this House, after having passed a law to punish this offense, can punish it again. I accepted the judgment of the House on that. I have too much respect for the House to ask that it be revised; but the point I made, and which even the witty anecdote of my colleague does not meet, is that here is a sick man coming to us and saying, "Your judgment, if you execute it, will be the means of my death, or may be;" and representing that to the House, I am simply asking the Committee on Ways and Means should consider the case, and, if they find it to be so, to report it before we execute the sentence. I am certain if I went to my colleague, sitting on any bench I ever saw him upon, and made the representation to him that that would be the effect of an immediate imprisonment of a witness, I should get the adjudication from him to have that fact ascertained. I do not propose to murder the witness, but simply to hold, to punish, to imprison him, because punishment has passed out of our hands by law; and the whole debate of yesterday was on the ground, not that we could punish him, but we could hold him for the purpose of having him testify. Now, it does not become the House of Representatives to do that indirectly which they cannot do directly, and, under the pretense of holding a witness, hold a sick man in jail. The jail will do for a well man; but any man who goes to jail for opinion's sake, rightful or wrongful, is entitled to respect, as it shows the earnestness of his conviction. But for a sick man the jail is no place. Upon that I ground myself. I appeal again to the judgment and fair sense of the House whether they will not refer this petition to the Committee on Ways and Means, with instructions to ascertain the truth of the allegation as to the danger to his health. I hope, therefore, the motion to lay on the table will be voted down, because that is an entire denial of the right of petition.

Mr. TREMAIN rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts will state to whom he yields.

Mr. DAWES. I will yield to my colleague on the committee for a few moments and then to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KELLEY. I wish to call the attention of the House to the distinction between the case now under consideration and those brought to its attention by the gentleman from Massachusetts. [Mr. BUTLER.] The recusant witness whose case we are considering holds the key to whatever place of confinement he may be confided. All he has to do is to comply with the law, tell what he knows, and he may walk forth as free as any of us. The cases referred to by the gentleman from Massachusetts depended on trial by and the finding of a jury, and therefore it required the intervention of a court to save a life. Here the utterance of a word by the imprisoned will save him.

I desire also to invite attention to the coincidence between the action of the House and the law as maintained by the courts of the United States and the supreme court of my own State. I invite the attention of the House to a case which probably no gentleman on this floor has forgotten, that of Passmore Williamson. When the United States court committed him for contempt, appeals were made because of his health, and for what proved to be the failing health, rapidly failing unto death, of members of his family. The court said, Let him unlock the doors of his own cell by purging himself of contempt. The question was carried by habeas corpus before the supreme court of Pennsylvania, and he was remanded——

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. He had to be.

Mr. KELLEY. Ay, had to be, because the law required it; and so to-day the law of the land and the honor of this House require us to maintain the order we have made, until the prisoner who is under contempt shall turn the key of his own cell-door.

Mr. TREMAIN. Mr. Speaker, the motion I made was prompted by a sincere and conscientious belief that it was demanded by a proper regard for the honor, the dignity, and the authority of this House. Nothing has transpired in the course of this debate to shake in the slightest degree my firm and unalterable conviction. There seems to be an entire misapprehension prevailing in regard to the nature and character of the proceeding to punish a recusant witness for contempt. I differ entirely with the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, when he says no authority in any State can be found to justify the proceedings which have been taken here. Sir, in the State of New York we have a statute which in terms confers upon a court the power to punish by fine and imprisonment for a refusal to answer proper questions, and it also declares in terms that such punishment shall be no bar to indictment for the same offense. And, sir, when I left the capital city of New York there was a man then in prison under an order pronounced by the supreme court. During the last autumn, where a witness had been confined and imprisoned for a period of ninety days for a contempt of the court, that same prisoner, before he had escaped from the jail or his time of imprisonment had expired, was indicted by the grand jury for the same offense.

My distinguished colleague from New York of the Ways and Means Committee [Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS] cited yesterday the letter of an Attorney-General of the United States by the name of B. F. Butler—not that man, but that other man—not the Butler of Massachusetts, but the Butler of New York who was Attorney-General. He, in very plain and clear and concise language, while maintaining the authority of this House to punish for contempt, clearly proved that it was an entirely distinct and independent offense from that for which the recusant witness was called upon to answer when he stood indicted by a grand jury of his country. One is an offense against the dignity and the authority of this House; one is an attempt by the witness to balk and thwart a necessary investigation; the other is an offense against the people at large.

What is this case? Why, sir, to discharge this man now, or to enter upon these ameliorating proceedings upon the mere statement contained in the petition which I hold in my hand, I submit to this House, would be to leave this House with a taint resting upon it. Public virtue, sir, stands at the foundation of our republican institutions, and he who assails the integrity of this House strikes a blow at the very foundation of public liberty. This man admits that he came here with three-quarters of a million dollars, the property of a corporation asking for favors at the hands of Congress. He admitted yesterday in the hearing of this House that he handed over in one sum $275,000 of that amount, and then he refuses to go a step further; he refuses to tell us to whom this money had been distributed by him. He comes here for the purpose of corrupting this House by procuring a subsidy, with three-quarters of a million in his hands to distribute at his pleasure, and after having gone just as far as it suits him to go, he puts down his foot and says I will give you no further information.

And we are to be told that he is to be dealt with tenderly! That this House must be careful, and see to it that, when he is imprisoned, he is imprisoned in such manner as not to render it inconvenient for him! If this question is to be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, you ought to have an amendment to it, that they be authorized to furnish him during the balance of his term of imprisonment with quail on toast and the other luxuries that may be procured by the money which was intrusted to him by this corporation.

Sir, this House is entirely dwarfed and paralyzed in the exercise of its necessary constitutional powers if a witness may thus set its authority at defiance. It is the same as if you were investigating a murder and a man who is supposed to have something to do with it says that he took money for the purpose of hiring that murder to be committed and gave it out for that purpose, but refuses to tell to whom he gave it. He has of course put it beyond his power in this case to claim that he is privileged because his answer will tend to criminate himself, for he states that the money went to no member of Congress. Yet he proposes to deny to this House the power of tracing out the men to whom he did pay the money, and, if necessary, of vindicating the character and integrity of the members of this House. We have the power to expel any member of this House for any act of bribery or corruption; and yet, if this doctrine is to prevail, there is no power by which you can ascertain who has received the money and what use has been made of that money thus unlawfully and improperly employed.

But what does this man say? Does he bring us any certificates of physicians showing that his health will be impaired or his life endangered by this imprisonment? Not at all. His language conveys no new fact to this House. It was stated yesterday by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means that he understood this man to be in delicate health. This House acted therefore with the full knowledge of that fact before it. And now what does he say in this petition. He says:

> The undersigned, your petitioner, begs leave respectfully to represent that his confinement in the county jail in the District of Columbia, as ordered by the resolution of the House yesterday, will operate with peculiar severity and hardship on his physical health, already so enfeebled as to render punishment of that kind closely akin to torture.

Any man could say that. There is nothing in it that is new. It is "too thin;" "it will not wash," to use common language more expressive perhaps than polite. No physician testifies here over his official signature or otherwise that this man's life is to be jeopardized by his being kept in that jail. But a morbid sympathy is to be created for a man who comes here with three-quarters of a million of dollars, and that at a time when public suspicion is aroused by rumors of corruption and bribery in Congress, and you are to be asked next morning, with no new fact before you, to reconsider your solemn and deliberate judgment and say whether it is not something akin to torture to keep this man in jail. If the House chooses to do that, I for one wash my hands of it; and I renew my motion to lay the petition on the table. It will not interfere with any subsequent action if the House should be advised that the health of the witness is such as to require further interference.

Now, sir, it seems to me frivolous and in continuation of that contumacy which has led this House to treat him as in the exercise of our power and dignity we ought to treat him. I move to lay the petition on the table.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Which motion comes first? I have made a motion that the petition be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. DAWES. I believe that none of these motions are in order, as I have the floor.

Mr. TREMAIN. I made my motion to lay on the table some time ago.

Mr. MAYNARD. I shall have to call for the regular order, if this matter is to take up any more time.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to say that I do not wish to interpose any objection to the reference. It is fair, however, that I should say to the House that the Committee on Ways and Means had already considered this matter before they reported their resolution, and they were unanimous in the conclusion to which they came. It is fair that that fact should be stated to the House. I have already stated that I do not desire to indicate any action to the House, but to take its action as instruction to the committee. If the House desires to refer this matter to the committee, they will do so with the full understanding that the committee have already considered the subject. I now withdraw my motion to print the petition, and any gentleman may make such motion as he pleases.

Mr. TREMAIN. I have already moved to lay the petition on the table.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. And I move that it be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] takes precedence. If the House should negative the motion to lay the petition on the table, the motion to refer it would then come up.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. TREMAIN; and on a division there were—ayes 91, noes 54; no quorum voting.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. As I observe that a great many members have not voted, I call for tellers on the motion.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. TREMAIN, and Mr. BUTLER of Massachusetts, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 101, noes 61.

So the petition was laid on the table.

Mr. TREMAIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the petition was laid on the table; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RIGHTS OF AMERICAN CITIZENS.

Mr. E. R. HOAR, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4198) (as a substitute for the bill H. R. No. 2199) to carry into execution the provisions of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution concerning citizenship and to define certain rights of citizens of the United States in foreign countries and certain duties of diplomatic and consular officers, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, recommitted to the committee, and ordered to be printed, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

SEATTLE AND WALLA-WALLA RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. McFADDEN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4199) granting the right of way to the Seattle and Walla-Walla Railroad and Transportation Company; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

PUYALLUP VALLEY COAL COMPANY.

Mr. McFADDEN also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4200) granting the right of way for a railroad and telegraph line to the Puyallup Valley Coal Company, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

F. M. FLETCHER.

Mr. HUNTON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4201) for the relief of F. M. Fletcher, late gauger of the seventh district of Virginia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

RESUMPTION OF SPECIE PAYMENTS.

Mr. MAYNARD. I now call up the special order.

The House proceeded, as the special order, to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1044) to provide for the resumption of specie payments; which was read a first and second time.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and required, as rapidly as practicable, to cause to be coined, at the mints of the United States, silver coins of the denominations of ten, twenty-five, and fifty cents, of standard value, and to issue them in redemption of an equal number and amount of fractional currency of similar denominations, or, at his discretion, he may issue such silver coins through the mints, the sub-treasuries, public depositaries, and post-offices of the United States; and, upon such issue, he is hereby authorized and required to redeem an equal amount of such fractional currency, until the whole amount of such fractional currency outstanding shall be redeemed.

SEC. 2. That so much of section 3524 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as provides for a charge of one-fifth of 1 per centum for converting standard gold bullion into coin is hereby repealed; and hereafter no charge shall be made for that service.

SEC. 3. That section 5177 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, limiting the aggregate amount of circulating notes of national banking associations, be, and is hereby, repealed; and each existing banking association may increase its circulating notes in accordance with existing law without respect to said aggregate limit; and new banking associations may be organized in accordance with existing law without respect to said aggregate limit; and the provisions of law for the withdrawal and redistribution of national-bank currency among the several States and Territories are hereby repealed. And whenever, and so often, as circulating notes shall be issued to any such banking association, so increasing its capital or circulating notes, or so newly organized as aforesaid, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to redeem the legal-tender United States notes in excess only of $300,000,000, to the amount of 80 per cent. of the sum of national-bank notes so issued to any such banking association as aforesaid, and to continue such redemption as such circulating notes are issued until there shall be outstanding the sum of $300,000,000 of such legal-tender United States notes, and no more. And on and after the 1st day of January, A. D. 1879, the Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem, in coin, the United States legal-tender notes then outstanding on their presentation for redemption, at the office of the assistant treasurer of the United States in the city of New York, in sums of not less than fifty dollars. And to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to prepare and provide for the redemption in this act authorized or required, he is authorized to use any surplus revenues, from time to time, in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and to issue, sell, and dispose of, at not less than par, in coin, either of the descriptions of bonds of the United States described in the act of Congress approved July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," with like qualities, privileges, and exemptions, to the extent necessary to carry this act into full effect, and to use the proceeds thereof for the purposes aforesaid. And all provisions of law inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Speaker, it will be recollected that on the last day of the session previous to the recess, on the 23d of December, an effort was made in the House to go to the Speaker's table with a view of taking up and acting on Senate bill No. 1044, to provide for the resumption of specie payments; such is the title of the bill. Objections were interposed of a character that we all recollect and which it is not necessary to recapitulate. It was however, by unanimous consent, agreed that the bill should be the special order for to-day at one o'clock, to the exclusion of all other orders. It was also ordered that the bill should be printed in the RECORD of the proceedings of that day, and also printed in the usual form for the information of members and of the country. The bill has thus been printed and has been before us. It is very brief in its text. Its propositions are not numerous—free banking, free coinage, silver change for fractional currency, the resumption of specie payments in 1879, coupled with free banking, and the additional provision that upon the issue of one hundred dollars to national banks eighty dollars of legal-tender notes shall be retired from circulation until the amount shall be reduced to $300,000,000. These are the provisions that are submitted to us from the Senate, at the close of a Congress which has witnessed one of the most protracted, one of the most animated, one of the most instructive and exhaustive debates on the subject of the currency and the financial questions incidentally connected with it, which I venture to say the Congress of the United States has ever produced from the beginning of the Government. These questions are now submitted to a fully instructed and a thoroughly informed House of Representatives.

I am urged by a large number of gentlemen to submit the proposition directly to the House, for its consideration and determination, whether it will accept this Senate bill as it stands. Several gentlemen have expressed a desire to offer amendments of different kinds; others, a desire to address the House upon the subject. I have agreed, and in compliance with that agreement I ask, that should the House sustain the previous question and order the main question, every gentleman who has an amendment to suggest or remarks to submit may be allowed to present them and have them printed in the RECORD of to-day's proceedings. Upon that statement I now call the previous question upon the third reading and passage of the bill.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to make an inquiry of my friend. I understand him to suggest to the House that if the House will sustain the previous question, he will permit any amendments to be printed in the RECORD that anybody desires to offer. Is that the proposition?

Mr. MAYNARD. That is the proposition.

Mr. DAWES. Well, I hope the House will understand it. I understand my friend, the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, [Mr. MAYNARD,] to say that if the House will sustain the call for the previous question, so that no amendments can be made to the bill, any gentleman may have the privilege of having his proposed amendment printed in the RECORD.

Mr. RANDALL. That is a very empty privilege.

Mr. DAWES. I hope no gentleman will be misled by that remark. I hope members will understand the opportunity which will be afforded them to go down to posterity without having accomplished anything.

Mr. MAYNARD. The gentleman need not indulge in any remarks of that character.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to say——

Mr. MAYNARD. I do not yield to anybody now.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I do not ask the gentleman to yield.

Mr. MAYNARD. What I say is this: If the House will sustain the demand for the previous question, I hope gentlemen will be allowed to put their peculiar views upon record in that form and in that way.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Allow me to make a suggestion as to the order of business. I ask the gentleman to set a time when the previous question may be considered as ordered and the vote shall be taken, say at four o'clock to-day, so that we can finish the bill to-day; otherwise we may get to filibustering, I am afraid.

Mr. KELLEY. Say at four o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Very well; four o'clock to-day or to-morrow.

Mr. KELLOGG. Does the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] propose that no one shall have an opportunity to vote upon any amendment?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. If we choose, thirty of us can keep the House here until to-morrow morning.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to say to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] that his proposition is not in accordance with the understanding of the Committee on Banking and Currency. That committee by a large majority—I think there was but one dissentient—decided that an opportunity should be given to vote upon two amendments; that is, to vote upon the proposition to strike out the first and second sections of this bill, and also to insert the word "canceled" in the proper place, in reference to the withdrawal of greenbacks from circulation. Now, I ask the chairman of the committee, its proper exponent, to adhere to that understanding in this case.

Mr. KELLOGG. I suggest to my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] that the words to be inserted were "canceled and destroyed."

Mr. MAYNARD. I have as great respect for the Committee on Banking and Currency as any gentleman can have; perhaps I ought to have a little more. This bill has not been before that committee. Any opinions they may entertain upon it are but the opinions of so many respectable gentlemen, with whom my personal relations are exceedingly kind, and for whom I would do more than for any others. But the question now is whether the House will accept the proposition as it now stands.

Mr. RANDALL. Whether we are more than individual citizens or not, simply members of this House or not, I submit that the chairman of that committee himself submitted that question to the committee.

Mr. MAYNARD. The gentleman is perfectly aware that this bill has not been before our committee.

Mr. RANDALL. And you are perfectly aware that you put the motion to the Committee on Banking and Currency whether those two amendments should be allowed to be voted on or not. Do I mistake the fact?

Mr. MAYNARD. I do not state any fact.

Mr. RANDALL. O, that is a miserable escape.

Mr. G. F. HOAR, I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. It is that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] is out of order in addressing his remarks to another member of the House instead of to the Chair, and also in stating what transpired in the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is out of order in both respects.

Mr. MAYNARD. I now call for a vote in seconding the previous question.

The SPEAKER. As there seems to be a division of sentiment, the Chair will appoint tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. RANDALL and Mr. MAYNARD were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 100, noes 91.

So the previous question was seconded.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the yeas and nays on ordering the main question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon ordering the main question, which is, Shall the bill be read a third time?

Mr. MAYNARD. As this is necessarily a test question on the bill, I hope gentlemen will vote with that understanding.

The SPEAKER. Before the Clerk proceeds to call the roll, the Chair gives notice that if some gentlemen find themselves wrongly recorded to-morrow morning it will not be the fault of the Clerk, but of the noise and confusion on the floor.

Mr. MAYNARD. Before the call of the yeas and nays begins, I wish to say a single word in regard to the proposition I made as to submitting amendments and remarks to be printed in the RECORD. I wish to say that——

Mr. DAWES. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. RANDALL and others objected to debate

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, debate is not in order. Nothing is in order but the call of the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 125, nays 106, not voting 57; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Barry, Bass, Begole, Biery, Bradley, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Carpenter, Cason, Cessna, Clayton, Clements, Stephen A. Cobb, Corwin, Cotton, Crooke, Crounse, Curtis, Danford, Donnan, Duell, Farwell, Fort, Freeman, Frye, Garfield, Gunckel, Eugene Hale, Harmer, Harrison, Hathorn, John B. Hawley, Hays, Gerry W. Platt, jr., Potter, Rainey, Ransier, Rapier, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Ross, John G. Schumaker, Sheldon, Sloan, George L. Smith, Speer, Standiford, Stowell, Strait, Waddell, Walls, Charles G. Williams, and Jeremiah M. Wilson—57.

So the main question was ordered.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. HAGANS. My colleague, Mr. DAVIS, is absent on account of illness.

Mr. DURHAM. My colleague on the Committee on Banking and Currency, Mr. HUBBELL, was unexpectedly called home, and I agreed to pair with him. If he were here he would vote "ay," and I should vote "no."

Mr. SCOFIELD. My colleague, Mr. ROSS, who has been detained by a railroad accident, is paired with the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. BUTLER. My colleague is in favor of this bill, and if here would vote "ay," while the gentleman from Massachusetts would vote "no."

Mr. HAZELTON, of New Jersey. My colleague, Mr. CLARK, is unavoidably detained by indisposition. If here, he would vote "ay."

Mr. THOMAS, of North Carolina. My colleague, Mr. COBB, requested me to state that he is detained from the House in consequence of sickness.

Mr. RANDALL. My colleague, Mr. SPEER, is absent at Vicksburgh under the order of the House.

Mr. ARCHER. My colleague, Mr. O'BRIEN, is absent by order of the House upon committee duty. If here, he would vote "no."

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. My colleague, Mr. WILLIAMS, is absent under the order of the House.

Mr. COX. My friend from California, Mr. LUTTRELL, is absent in Alabama on business of the House.

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. My colleague, Mr. COBURN, is absent under the order of the House.

Mr. FORT. My colleague, Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, is absent serving on a committee.

Mr. BURROWS. My colleague, Mr. CONGER, is absent in the performance of duty upon a select committee.

Mr. BIERY. My colleague, Mr. ALBRIGHT, is absent serving upon a special committee.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. MAYNARD moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 1068) to remove the limitation restricting the circulation of banking associations issuing notes payable in gold.

RESUMPTION OF SPECIE PAYMENTS.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1044) to provide for the resumption of specie payments.

The SPEAKER. The main question having been ordered, the question is now on ordering the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was ordered to a third reading.

The question being on the passage of the bill,

Mr. MERRIAM called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 136, nays 98, not voting 54; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Barry, Bass, Begole, Biery, Bradley, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Carpenter, Cason, Cessna, Chittenden, Clayton, Clements, Stephen A. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—98.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Albright, Barnum, Bland, Buckner, Bundy, Benjamin F. Butler, Cannon, Amos Clark, jr., Clinton L. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Creamer, Darrall, Davis, Dunnell, Durham, Eden, Fort, Foster, Robert S. Hale, Hersey, Hubbell, Hurlbut, Hyde, Kendall, Lewis, Lofland, Luttrell, Mitchell, Morey, Nunn, O'Brien, Phelps, Phillips, James H. Platt, jr., Potter, Rainey, Ransier, Rapier, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Ross, John G. Schumaker, Sheldon, Sloan, George L. Smith, Snyder, Speer, Standiford, Stowell, Strait, Sypher, Walls, and Charles G. Williams—54.

So the bill was passed.

During the roll-call Mr. DURHAM stated that he was paired with Mr. HUBBELL, who was absent from the city, and that he would vote "no," while Mr. HUBBELL would vote "ay."

Mr. HAZELTON, of New Jersey, stated that his colleague, Mr. CLARK, who was unavoidably absent, would, if present, vote in the affirmative.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. MAYNARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move the previous question on the adoption of the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. There being no objection, the title of the bill will stand.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 2032) to amend section 2324 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the development of the mining resources of the United States; and

An act (H. R. No. 3745) to remove the disabilities of James Howard, of Baltimore, Maryland.

RESUMPTION OF SPECIE PAYMENT.

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Speaker, I renew the proposition I made a while ago, that gentlemen may have an opportunity to have printed in the RECORD amendments which they desired to offer to the bill just passed, and also to have printed in the RECORD remarks which they have prepared on the subject.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I object.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not object to gentlemen having their remarks printed in the RECORD, but I do object to the printing of amendments.

Mr. STORM. I object.

Mr. NEGLEY. Then I ask unanimous consent that I myself may have the right to submit some remarks on this question to be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. ROBBINS. I object.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the unanimous consent of the House will be given to gentlemen to have any remarks they may desire to make on the bill printed in the RECORD. That is a request which has never yet been denied so far as my recollection extends.

Mr. NIBLACK. I do not object to gentlemen submitting remarks for publication in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, but I do object to the farce of printing amendments when no opportunity was given to offer them to a vote of the House.

Mr. NEGLEY. I do not ask to submit any amendment, but merely to submit some remarks to be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. MAYNARD. That is one form in which gentlemen have presented their request to me, and I hope there will be no objection to the printing of amendments as well as remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Tennessee cannot escape the responsibility of his position by allowing amendments to be printed in the RECORD when he refused to allow them to be voted on.

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Speaker, I do not mean to escape the responsibility of any position which I may take on this floor. I concede my responsibility here or elsewhere, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania or any other gentleman cannot deter me. I am not to be frightened by any such appeal here or in any other place.

Mr. RANDALL. One word in reply to the gentleman from Tennessee. I do not mean he shall escape the responsibility of having acted in bad faith, in such a way, in my judgment, as not to become a representative of the people.

Mr. MAYNARD. I will not bandy words with the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I trust my position in this House or out of it does not depend on that kind of discussion. I acted upon the high responsibility of a Representative in my place in the House, and I am not to be deterred from what I consider to be a high public duty by any consideration of responsibility, by talk about bad faith, or any of that sort of discussion here or elsewhere. The House, with a full knowledge of the fact, has passed on that question, and I conceive it is not in very good taste to renew it.

Mr. RANDALL. I speak of the gentleman's acts, and as a Representative here I characterize them as unfair. He himself, in the Committee on Banking and Currency, put the question to that committee——

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I rise to the point of order that the rule prohibits any reference in debate on this floor to what has occurred in committee. The enforcement of that rule is necessary to the protection of every member in the transaction of the business of committees.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts renews the point of order and the Chair sustains it. There is no rule which permits gentlemen to refer to what has taken place in committee.

Mr. RANDALL. The conduct of the gentlemen in that committee is known so far as this bill is concerned.

Several members called for the regular order.

Mr. NEGLEY. I have asked the House for the courtesy of unanimous consent to print some remarks on this bill.

Mr. KELLEY. I object to printing any funeral orations on the bill.

Mr. NEGLEY. I do not ask my colleague to pay the funeral expenses; and he has no right to insult me on the floor in this way.

Mr. KELLEY. Debate has been suppressed, and I oppose the printing of any remarks not made on the floor which shall convey to the country the impression that discussion was permitted on this important bill.

Mr. NEGLEY. It is unworthy of the gentleman to make that accusation.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I desire to say that I voted "ay" on the bill under a positive pledge that I should have an opportunity to explain to my constituents why I voted "ay."

Mr. STORM. I am sorry you were so green.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. If I had not had that pledge, I should have voted "no."

IMPEACHMENT OF JUDGE EDWARD H. DURELL.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I rise for the purpose of presenting a privileged report from the Committee on the Judiciary. I send it to the desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was recommitted the following resolutions, to wit—

Resolved, That Edward H. Durell, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Louisiana, be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors in office;

2. Resolved, That a committee of two be appointed to go to the Senate, and at the bar thereof, in the name of the House of Representatives and of all the people of the United States, to impeach Edward H. Durell, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Louisiana, of high crimes and misdemeanors in office, and acquaint the Senate that the House of Representatives will in due time exhibit particular articles of impeachment and make good the same, and that the committee do demand that the Senate take order for the appearance of said Edward H. Durell to answer to said impeachment;

3. Resolved, That a committee of seven be appointed to prepare and report articles of impeachment against Edward H. Durell, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Louisiana, with power to send for persons, papers, and records, and to take testimony under oath—having received official information that the said Edward H. Durell has resigned his office, and that his resignation has been accepted, report the resolutions back to the House, and recommend that they do lie upon the table.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] the chairman of the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire, before the resolution is put, to say a single word upon the matter. This is the usual disposition of cases of impeachment under the circumstances. It is fully justified by the precedents. But before I sit down I desire to say, if the House will permit me, that during this unpleasant investigation almost every member of the Judiciary Committee has been attacked by the newspapers, and especially the one now addressing the Chair, upon the ground that we endeavored to shield Judge Durell. It is due to him to say that the committee did not find any of the charges of corruption proved, but they did find that his order, and the action he took as judge, was wholly unauthorized; that it was beyond his jurisdiction, and clearly beyond it; and that the committee concluded that he did not conduct himself well in his office, so as to be liable to impeachment; but the necessity of trying him upon it has been avoided by his resignation, and the appointment, I believe, of another in his place.

Mr. NIBLACK. I understand it to be a settled rule—the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] however, has investigated that subject more than I have done or have been required to do—that an officer cannot escape impeachment by reason of resignation. I beg therefore to inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts if the committee have considered that question; whether they might not impeach him still, if they think that the circumstances sufficiently justify it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. In answer to the question of the gentleman from Indiana, I will say that as the Constitution imposes the punishment of disability from holding office hereafter, it is entirely competent for the House to go on with the impeachment; and it has been so ruled over and over again. But Judge Durell is an old man, and there will be no practical benefit in going on with the impeachment.

Mr. RANDALL. There might be, as an example.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. And besides that, as the committee did not find actual corruption, except that which is inferential because of his exceeding his jurisdiction, the committee, I believe unanimously, have come to the conclusion that this is the best disposition that can be made of the case in view of the time necessary for the public business and in view of the effect upon the country. It is a warning to the judge to look well hereafter to his jurisdiction before he acts. For within his jurisdiction, unless corruption is proved, he is perfectly safe; and if he acts outside his jurisdiction, then he is amenable in the judgment of the committee, and I have no doubt of the House, to be impeached and deprived of office.

Mr. NIBLACK. My object in making the inquiry was to ascertain whether the committee had considered this question in connection with the case of Judge Durell. If there were real grounds for his impeachment, I am inclined to think his resignation should not allow him to escape. It has happened, I believe, within the last few years in this country, that some of these acts of official gentlemen which were regarded as great outrages by the people generally have been used as a passport to official favor; and if Judge Durell has been guilty of that sort of misconduct which would justify the House of Representatives in presenting articles of impeachment against him, I think he should not be permitted to escape by resignation; and therefore I think we ought not to act hastily on the question, unless the Committee on the Judiciary have fully considered this matter and resolved that the impeachment ought not to be pressed.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. To that I answer that Judge Durell claims, and the whole testimony was, that he acted upon his own motion, without any motion or argument before him, and that is what makes the gravamen of the offense charged against him; for without motion of the counsel for the complainant on this bill of equity, he, upon his own consideration and judgment, acted, and without any moving cause except in his own mind.

Mr. NIBLACK. Is it not true as a matter of history and fact that to Judge Durell, more than to any other man, is due the present revolutionary condition of the State of Louisiana?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That may be true in this: that he made an order which brought collision between the Federal and State authorities, but it was an order proceeding from himself, so far as appears to your committee.

Mr. NIBLACK. Is it not so much the worse for Judge Durell if he made the order without any motion or argument, but at his own instance?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It was on that ground, I can say for one, without speaking of the secrets of the committee, though I suppose I have a right to say how I voted myself—it was on that ground that I voted for his impeachment.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. COX. Was any matter of a political or quasi-political character before the committee with reference to the impeachment of Judge Durell? What were the charges against him? I do not remember.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The first charge was immoral conduct; the second charge improper conduct in relation to bankruptcy proceedings; and the third charge was the issuance of this midnight order, as it is called.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman state whether the committee passed on those charges seriatim, all of them?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. They did, and the only one sustained by a vote of the committee was the charge of improper conduct in regard to the midnight order.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I hope my colleague, the chairman of the committee, will allow me to correct him with regard to a matter of fact. By referring to the report made by the Committee on the Judiciary, the chairman will find that he is mistaken with reference to one of his statements. There were three charges against Judge Durell; one for drunkenness, the second charge was in regard to the management of affairs in bankruptcy in his court, and the third was the celebrated midnight order. Now, with reference to the bankruptcy proceedings, the committee made this report. After referring to the orders made by Durell that were spread upon his record and stating the testimony which had been taken by the subcommittee in New Orleans, the committee say this:

> These facts, so notorious, in regard to the management of so important trusts as those of the bankrupt estates, when taken in connection with the order hereinbefore referred to, lead to the inevitable conclusion by your committee that Judge Durell must have been cognizant of them and therefore a corrupt party thereto, or that he was grossly negligent in the discharge of his official duties, so that, quacumque via data, he comes under a like condemnation.

I think the chairman will find that he was mistaken in his statement.

Mr. ELDREDGE. The gentleman from Indiana will remember, as I do, that the midnight order was not the only ground on which the committee agreed to report in favor of the impeachment of Judge Durell.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. If I were allowed to go into the secrets of our prison-house, I could answer that suggestion.

Mr. COX. Was the midnight order voted on in the committee? Was it a part of the substantive charges on which the report was made?

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. If it is proper for me to state the action of the committee, I am prepared to state it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The report shows that.

Mr. RANDALL. I am quite willing to hear all this, but a moment ago I was stopped from telling what had occurred in a committee, although the public ought to know what I would have liked to have stated.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. If it is proper to state it, I have not the slightest objection to stating what was in the report and the conclusions upon which the committee authorized these resolutions to be reported. The resolutions do not set forth the charges upon which the articles of impeachment were to be preferred, but that was a matter which was passed upon by the committee, and it was perfectly understood as to what the charges would embrace. If it is proper for me to state what they would have embraced, I am prepared to do it, and as silence seems to give consent, I will state that it was voted by the Committee on the Judiciary that he was to be impeached for the management of the affairs of bankruptcy in his court and for the issuance of the midnight order.

Mr. CESSNA. I appeal to my colleague on the committee to state that those resolutions were carried by a bare majority of the committee in reference to either of those propositions.

Mr. COX. Then you impeach the judge for the "midnight order," while the Administration has acted and the State government of Louisiana has been continued upon that impeachable high crime and misdemeanor.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. So far as I am concerned, I was simply discharging what I believed to be my duty, without regard to any political consideration. And the majority of the committee, as is stated by my colleague on the committee from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CESSNA,] voted in that way; the minority of the committee voted the other way. I now yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TREMAIN.]

Mr. TREMAIN. As a member of the Judiciary Committee, I have examined with some care the question which was propounded to the chairman of the committee [Mr. BUTLER of Massachusetts] in regard to the constitutional power of this House now to institute a proceeding in the nature of an impeachment against Judge Durell, and also the power of the Senate to try it. And although the subject was not particularly discussed in the committee, it being assumed that the question ought to be disposed of in accordance with the pending motion made by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. WILSON,] yet upon examination I find the authorities to be such, that in my judgment it is evident that a very serious doubt exists whether the House has any constitutional power whatever to proceed by impeachment after the officer has resigned, his resignation has been accepted, and his successor has been appointed.

The power to impeach rests entirely upon the Constitution of the United States. The whole system of English parliamentary impeachment, with the tremendous powers possessed by Parliament, has been superseded by our Constitution. This whole subject is most thoroughly discussed by that learned and eminent jurist, Judge Story, in his Commentaries. And the extract which I hold in my hand I think is so entirely broad, comprehensive, and satisfactory as to cover the entire gound. I will therefore content myself with simply reading what he says, reminding the House in the first instance that the language of the Constitution is, that upon the trial of an impeachment the officer may be removed, and then he may be disqualified from holding office. Upon that Judge Story says:

As it is declared in one clause of the Constitution that judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than a removal from office, and disqualified to hold any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States, and in another clause that the President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for and conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes or misdemeanors, it would seem to follow that the Senate were bound in all cases to enter a judgment of removal from office, though it has a discretion as to inflicting the punishment of disqualification. If there, then, must be a judgment of removal from office, it would seem to follow that the Constitution contemplated that the party was still in office at the time of impeachment. If he was not, his offense was still liable to be tried and punished in the ordinary tribunals of justice.

And it might be argued with some force that it would be a vain exercise of authority to try a delinquent for an impeachable offense when the most important object for which the remedy was given was no longer necessary or attainable. There is also much force in the remark that an impeachment is a proceeding purely of a political nature. It is not so much designed to punish an offender as to secure the State against gross official misdemeanors. It touches neither his person nor his property, but simply divests him of his political capacity. (Story's Commentaries, 803.)

I therefore submit that if the absence of power to impeach in such a case is not entirely clear, yet at least there is so much doubt about the power to proceed by impeachment under such circumstances, that it seems to me it would be a very improper exercise of our prerogative, as the grand inquest of the nation, for us to go any further with the case under existing circumstances.

As I now have the floor, I desire to say a word or two in regard to the merits of this case, from the fact that I united with four other members of the committee in a report dissenting from the report of the majority, without giving any reason for our action. By way of explanation on that subject, I desire to say that the testimony taken by the committee, a copy of which I hold in my hand, extending over five hundred and fifty-nine pages of printed matter, was brought in at the close of the last session. It was understood that there would be no other action taken than the presentation of the resolutions of the committee. Supposing that I should have a full opportunity during the vacation of examining this subject with the care that its importance demanded, and judging only from the general impression I had derived from the case, desirous of extending that charity and protection which I think a judge should always receive in the exercise of our jurisdiction over him, I united with the minority of the committee.

During the vacation, however, and for the purpose of acting intelligently upon these resolutions whenever they should be called up for consideration, I have studied most carefully this entire mass of testimony, and in justice to myself I feel bound to say, although it may seem to put me in an inconsistent attitude, that upon one point the examination which I have been able to give, and which I was not before able to give, has in some manner changed the impressions under which I acted.

As questions have been asked here, and as the answers to them may perhaps be important in guiding the action of this House as to what were the nature of the charges, I will in a very few moments state all of them and the general conclusions which I have drawn from the evidence in regard to them. There was no specific charge made against Judge Durell. The sub-committee proceeded to New Orleans, and with a great degree of thoroughness has investigated all the matters about which complaints were made to them. These seemed to be some five or six in number, all of which, however, were dismissed by the committee, except the two mentioned in the report of the majority, and which were referred to by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. WILSON.] The charge of intoxication, the charge of rudeness on the bench and want of courtesy and ungentlemanly conduct in his treatment of the members of the bar, were dismissed as untrue. The charge of appointing one Norton an additional assignee in all bankruptcy cases has also not received the sanction of the committee. And I desire to say that I consider his action under the standing order in appointing an additional assignee as irregular; yet he had the power in each case to appoint an additional assignee under section 13 of the bankruptcy law, which is in these words:

All elections or appointments of assignees shall be subject to the approval of the judge; and when in his judgment it is for any cause needful or expedient, he may appoint an additional assignee or order a new election.

Another charge against him was that he had made an order requiring a deposit of fifty dollars wherever the account of the assignee was challenged or investigated, to be returned if the exception was found to be well taken. It seems to me that this was not a high crime or misdemeanor, and that it was only a proper precautionary measure to guard against frivolous proceedings.

Another charge was his complicity in the alleged maladministration of Norton, the assignee in bankruptcy, in the administration of bankrupt estates. I think it appears that large sums were charged in cases of settlement and compromise; but one great difficulty about this is, that, as the law then stood, no publicity was required in such proceedings. Under the law as it now stands, by the amended bankrupt act of last session, the parties interested would have been protected against such charges. It further appears that, so far as Judge Durell is concerned, he has never participated at all in any corrupt fund. All the testimony shows that he was regarded as a gentleman of integrity and learning in his profession. The bankers with whom he had for years kept his accounts testified that he never had more than three or four hundred dollars on deposit at any one time, and the proof showed that he had no means whatever except those derived from his salary; that he had no property except his law library and the furniture of a suite of rooms that he occupied in New Orleans. Therefore it seemed to me that upon all these questions there was nothing that rose to the dignity of a high crime or misdemeanor.

The only remaining charge was that based upon the alleged midnight order, dated December 5, 1872, which will be found on page 559 of this document. Now, the general impressions under which I acted in uniting with the minority in regard to that were these: I considered that there was a state of turbulence, amounting almost to revolution, existing when that order was made; that the judge was acting under a statute of the United States which was new, and he had no old, beaten, tried paths to guide his footsteps; that there was a conspiracy on the part of Warmoth and others, by fraud, force, and violence, to take possession of the political power in the State against the will of the actual majority of the people of that State; and without very carefully examining the question, I was willing in charity to give to Judge Durell the benefit of the doubt that I entertained in regard to it, especially when the order itself recites the fact that Warmoth was one of the defendants in that suit, and had been restrained by an interlocutory or preliminary order that had been issued, and had, as it was claimed, in violation of that order, proceeded to issue a proclamation declaring certain officers elected. This order recited that he had been guilty of disobedience of the previous order of the court.

I differed from the majority of the committee in the report which they presented to the House, and in which they say that Warmoth had not violated any restraining order. It appeared that after the order was issued Warmoth had signed a bill which had been passed by the previous Legislature, and was resting in his safe, authorizing the creation of a new board of canvassers or returning-board, and therefore he claimed that he had a right to proclaim the result of the canvass by the new board without violating the restraining order. But upon looking at the terms of that order, I think the majority of the committee will find that it is so broad and sweeping as to prevent any canvass whatever or any proclamation of the result of any canvass whatever until the determination of that case. Therefore, if the simple question were whether Warmoth had violated that order, I should say that the judge had sufficient ground before him to hold Warmoth guilty of a contempt. But, unfortunately, upon looking at the order of Judge Durell more carefully, it appears to be not such an order as its recitals would seem to indicate. It was intended to be an order based upon a preliminary proceeding for a contempt and taking action accordingly. On the contrary, after reciting the preliminary order and the proclamation of Warmoth which is set out in hæc verba, instead of proceeding to say that Warmoth is cited to come before the judge and show cause why he should not be punished for contempt, or in any other form such as, according to the ordinary course of judicial proceeding, ought to have been instituted, it winds up by saying—

Now therefore, in order to prevent the further obstruction of the proceedings in this cause, and further to prevent a violation of the orders of this court, to the imminent danger of disturbing the public peace, it is hereby ordered that the marshal of the United States for the district of Louisiana shall forthwith take possession of the building known as the Mechanics' Institute and occupy it as a State-house for the assembling of the Legislature therein, in the city of New Orleans, and hold the same subject to the further order of this court, and meanwhile to prevent all unlawful assemblage therein, under the guise or pretext of authority claimed by virtue of pretended canvass and returns made by said pretended returning-officers in contempt and violation of said restraining order; but the marshal is directed to allow the ingress and egress to and from the public offices of said building of persons entitled to the same.

Instead of being a judicial order, it seems to me to be a military order; an order which it seems was afterward upheld and supported by the troops of the United States, and which it may therefore be fairly assumed was contemplated and intended to be so used. I find also that the marshal testifies that the judge gave him discretionary power by an oral direction to determine what persons should be admitted to the State-house and what persons should be excluded; thus deputing, not in writing, this vast discretionary power, and clothing the marshal with it. I cannot believe that such an order as that can be justified by any consideration of charity. While I would extend to Judge Durell every proper protection, yet inasmuch as this relates to a question of jurisdiction between the States and the Federal Government in regard to which the States and the people are justly jealous, and inasmuch as it was followed up by the use of Government troops, as perhaps it was intended it should be, I had concluded that if compelled to vote I should call upon Judge Durell to explain why he issued that order, and that he could not complain if he was compelled to make such explanation by his written answer or by arguments of counsel, which the committee are not permitted to receive.

Considering the general character of this order to be so extraordinary, and fearing that unless condemned it might grow into a dangerous precedent, I freely acknowledge that I had resolved, if compelled to vote upon these resolutions, to vote for them so far as it was proposed to impeach him upon that case, while ignoring the other part of the charge contained in the report of the majority of the committee and every other charge embraced within the range of this investigation.

I deem it a mere matter of justice to myself to explain my position and views upon this case; but, as I said before, for the reason if we should order an impeachment it would only authorize a very expensive and dilatory proceeding which would result in nothing, I agree entirely to the resolution presented by the gentleman from Indiana that the whole subject be laid upon the table.

Mr. POLAND. It has not occurred to me, Mr. Speaker, there is either very great interest or profit in having a long debate on this matter in its present condition, and I would not say a word were it not that I wish to say something in the nature of a personal explanation. My studies for a few weeks have been somewhat in relation to the relative rights, duties, and obligations of the States and General Government with and to each other. In the course of them I had occasion to look at an article in the International Magazine, published in Philadelphia, written by Judge Cooley, of Michigan, a gentleman who I have known by reputation for some years as a judge of the supreme court of that State, but who is more widely known as the author of a very good book on the subject of the Constitution. In that article, written by Judge Cooley, published in that magazine for January, reference is made by him to this action of Judge Durell in the Louisiana case, and to the fact that the Judiciary Committee of the House had reported articles of impeachment against him for his conduct in reference to that matter. In a note to that article, the author says there was one gentleman, a member of the Judiciary Committee, (and he uses some words which made it apparent to me I was the member alluded to, although not called by name,) who dissented from the conclusions of the majority or the other members of the committee, and upon the ground that, in his judgment, Judge Durell was a Christian gentleman. And he went on to give his own views in reference to the wisdom of the gentleman who gave such a reason for his conduct, from which I have no particular inclination to dissent. But I took the liberty, although Judge Cooley is a gentleman with whom I have no acquaintance, to address a note to him, asking if I was the member of the Judiciary Committee referred to, and, if so, where he obtained his information I dissented from the majority on the ground that Judge Durell was a Christian gentleman.

I went on further to say I had no personal acquaintance with Judge Durell; I had never even heard he was a Christian gentleman; and, indeed, from the information I had in reference to him, I thought probably he was not a Christian gentleman. In answer, I received a letter from Judge Cooley, saying I was the gentleman alluded to, but instead of getting his information from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in reference to the matter of my action, he obtained it, he said, from some letter written by some correspondent to some newspaper, and the judge very greatly regretted, as I thought he had a right to, that he had so unjustly put me in a position so ridiculous, and upon information that proved so unreliable, in writing a serious article on the Constitution, to be published in one of the staid monthlies of the country. It would, I thought, have been wiser for him to have looked a little deeper into the subject before he appended that note which so utterly misrepresented me, especially when exact and accurate information was so easily accessible. I trust that not only the learned judge and author but many other people may learn to exercise a little caution on the subject of taking everything as true that is stated by newspaper correspondents.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is true I stood somewhat alone in my views of the case of Judge Durell. I understood the four members of the committee who made the minority report to justify the conduct of Judge Durell in reference to what was termed the "midnight order;" that he acted entirely within his jurisdiction, and acted rightly. I did not agree with them in reference to that. I agree with the majority of the committee that Judge Durell did make an order which was beyond his legal jurisdiction, and therefore I could not justify it upon the ground that it was a legal order. But it often happens, Mr. Speaker, that whether a judge has or has not jurisdiction is one of the most nice and difficult things to determine; and merely because a judge had taken jurisdiction of a case or made an order not within the strict law, or it turns out he has exceeded his jurisdiction, it by no means follows he is amenable to impeachment any more than if he had made an order or gave judgment erroneous in any other particular. Why, I have in mind, Mr. Speaker, a case determined by the unanimous judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States, where they reversed a decision of the late Mr. Justice Nelson, upon the ground the court had no jurisdiction. He had ordered a case removed from the State court of Vermont into the circuit court of the United States, and the Supreme Court determined he had no right to make such order, and the court thereby obtained no jurisdiction. A more upright judge never lived in the land or in the world than Judge Nelson. So I say because this judge made an order he had no legal jurisdiction to make, it by no means follows he is amenable to impeachment, unless it can be established that order was made corruptly or made with a knowledge on his part—with the belief that he was exceeding his legal jurisdiction.

In my judgment the case was entirely bare of evidence to make it appear that Judge Durell, in making that order, was actuated by any corrupt motive, or that he acted in any belief that he was exceeding his legal jurisdiction.

And, Mr. Speaker, as this report which I made, a minority report, signed only by myself, is very short, I would like that it should be read by the Clerk. It states in fewer words than I can state it now precisely my idea in reference to the proper action in this case.

The Clerk read as follows:

The undersigned, member of the Judiciary Committee, for himself desires to say—

First. In relation to the midnight order, although he believes the judge had no proper legal jurisdiction to make it, still, he is not able to find that the judge acted corruptly, or with any belief that he was going beyond his jurisdiction in making it. The law under which he acted was new, and no rules or precedents had been established under it. The whole people were excited, the times were violent and turbulent, and judicial calmness or correctness could hardly be expected.

Secondly. The evidence seems to establish that some of the officers of Judge Durell's court were guilty of very corrupt practices and that he was not watchful to scrutinize their conduct; but there is no claim that he ever shared in any of the proceeds of their gains, and no direct evidence that he knowingly sanctioned or approved their action.

Thirdly. Where the evidence obtained by substantially an ex-parte examination only secures a bare majority of the committee, it does not appear to me that the public interest will be furthered by presenting articles of impeachment to the Senate for trial.

LUKE P. POLAND.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Vermont whether he assents to the proposition of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TREMAIN,] that the power of impeachment does not exist after the officer resigns? I maintain most assuredly that the power still continues. It is not a power derived from the Constitution, but it is a power simply existing as a necessary power in every government, and which is recognized as an existing power by the Constitution.

Mr. POLAND. It would be with a good deal of hesitation that I should express any view in reference to that in opposition to the one expressed by so eminent a lawyer as the gentleman from New York, who says he has examined and considered the question. But I must say, without having examined and considered it, that my impression was very decidedly the other way; that the resignation did not avail as a legal obstacle to our proceeding with this impeachment against the judge, and that whether we would or would not was a matter of discretion, to be determined by the House according to the circumstances of the case.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Before the gentleman from Vermont sits down, I wish to make a suggestion to him, in case the House may be misled by the report which he has caused to be read at the Clerk's desk, and the statement which he has made, that there was nothing to show that Judge Durell acted corruptly in exceeding, as it is conceded he did, the jurisdiction of his court in making that order. The gentleman from Vermont will remember very well, I suppose, when I call his attention to the fact, that the order was a voluntary one; that this suit in which the proceedings purported to have been taken was inter partes, and that Judge Durell on his own motion, without any application of the attorneys—sending for the attorneys, in fact—directed the order to be prepared, and that the attorneys themselves at the time suggested to the judge that possibly he was exceeding his jurisdiction, and asked him if he had considered that fact. Without considering it any further, and without any application on behalf of any one, he directed what my friend from New York terms a military order to issue, and gave verbal instructions at the same time to the marshal, which were carried out, for his employment of the militia or of the soldiery, taking charge of them himself and carrying into effect what he understood to be the order of the judge.

Mr. POLAND. The gentleman from Wisconsin having been one of the sub-committee who took this testimony, of course is very much more familiar with its details than I am. Indeed, I have not looked at it since the last session of Congress at all. But I believe it is substantially shown by the testimony, as he says, that this action of the judge was pretty much upon his own hook, if I may use the expression. It was hardly called for by anybody or party, or by the counsel in that proceeding. And it rather occurred to me, Mr. Speaker, that it was an evidence of the judge's honesty. What a man does himself, uninfluenced and unsought by anybody, is a little more apt, I think, to be honest and conscientious than what he is overpersuaded by some other party and procured to do; so that, instead of drawing the inference from it that it must have been corrupt and that the judge must have acted with the knowledge that he was acting beyond his jurisdiction in making that order, I drew precisely the opposite inference. I came rather to the conclusion that the judge was entirely honest in his action, although I thought he was mistaken.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Then the gentleman from Vermont must ignore the fact that the judge took a very deep interest in the question, as appears from the proof, and that it was a matter in which the party of which the judge was supposed to be one took a very deep interest, and that there is some proof that he was moved to that action by other influences than those which appeared before him at the time when he issued the order.

Mr. POLAND. I think, Mr. Speaker, it was quite apparent that the judge was actuated in what he did simply by his own notions in relation to what he regarded as the public good.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Then I say to the gentleman from Vermont that when the judge acts voluntarily, and in a matter of such importance as this order, I cannot for one agree with the gentleman that that is evidence of good motive.

Mr. STORM. I wish to ask the gentleman from Vermont to state his opinion as a lawyer, whether Judge Durell could not have justified his conduct in the issuance of that order by the enforcement acts of 1870 and 1871?

Mr. POLAND. Several members of the Committee on the Judiciary thought he was legally justified. I thought he was not. But I think these gentlemen on the other side had better hold their colloquy with some of my colleagues on the committee who believed that he was entirely right, rather than with me, who thought he was entirely wrong.

Mr. STORM. But you voted the other way.

Mr. TREMAIN. I wish to ask the gentleman from Vermont a question suggested by the remark of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE.] I understand that gentleman to claim that there is an implied power of impeachment such as existed at common law. Now, we know that in England, under the impeachment power, the Parliament could not only remove men from office, but condemn them to death or to various other punishments or arbitrary fines. If that power does not exist, then the power of impeachment must be under the Constitution.

The question I put to my friend from Vermont is whether he supposes there is any power to impeach at all except in the Constitution of the United States; and, if so, then we can all judge for ourselves whether that does not require that the man impeached shall be in office at the time?

Mr. POLAND. With reference to the inquiry made by the gentleman from New York, I am very much in the same position that I was in relation to that made by the gentleman from Wisconsin. He is combating the theory of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] with me. I should agree with the gentleman from New York that the power of Congress to impeach grows out of the Constitution; but I still think that its legal effect and consequences are to be determined by the general laws applicable to the subject of impeachment which existed when the Constitution was formed.

Mr. TREMAIN. There is nothing in the Constitution prescribing the laws applicable to the subject.

Mr. POLAND. That is what I said before. I have not studied the subject with reference to the question whether a man's going out of office ends impeachment proceedings or not. My impression is with the gentleman from Ohio that it does not.

Mr. TREMAIN. Story evidently thinks the other way, but there is a little doubt.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has ten minutes.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. Then I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WARD.]

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, except for some remarks which have been made by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND,] with whom I differed and yet at the same time agreed, I should not have felt called upon to say a word upon this occasion, and except also for the fact that almost every other member of the committee has asked permission to say a word. Sir, I did not and I do not approve of the order issued by Judge Durell, known as "the midnight order." If I had been Judge Durell, very likely I would not have issued it; but I did not approve of the proceedings instituted here, and I based my action on the grounds substantially stated, very clearly, by the gentleman from Vermont. I have seen, sir, many judgments and orders of courts of which I did not approve; I have known many instances where courts and judges exceeded their authority; but to attempt to reverse and review those proceedings under the process of impeachment seems an unusual and unwarranted proceeding, and I was against it. It was upon that ground that I was one of those who resisted the proceedings to impeach Judge Durell.

With reference to the bankruptcy matters I may be permitted to state, as but adding a word to this little epitaph which is being written, that the men who are most noisy and determined in bringing charges of corruption against Judge Durell—the lawyers who were the most vigorous in their proceedings and in their charges—were those who for all the years of his administration of the court had taken its largest fees and managed most of the cases and had been the loudest in praise of Judge Durell down to the time of the issue of this order. Then, that being a matter which affected them politically, they changed front, and commenced howling down the man against whom up to the issue of that order there had been no breath of suspicion. They accused him of drinking, and failed to prove it; they said he was corrupt in proceedings in bankruptcy, and record proof shows that if he was corrupt the men who charge it on him were the men who received the benefit, which it did not appear was ever brought to the knowledge of Judge Durell.

Mr. Speaker, I have no word to say in defense of Judge Durell, but I do say that he acted there as judge for a long time, and that up to the time of the issuance of this order his character and reputation were never assailed by anybody. There were no charges against him until the issuance of this order of a political character, and in the issuance of that order I deem that there is no proof to show that he acted corruptly. He may have acted mistakenly. The order may have been wrong, and probably was, but there are tribunals and modes of proceeding under the laws of the land by which it could be examined and inquired into. It may be that, in consequence of his action, wrong was done, but that does not matter. I will not here convict any man in the highest court on earth, or on this continent at least, of high crimes and misdemeanors in the way it was proposed to convict this man here, unless I am satisfied that he acted corruptly; and it is not claimed by even his most earnest and ardent prosecutors that he acted corruptly in this order.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I yield now for a few minutes to the chairman of the committee, [Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I only want to state the grounds upon which the majority of the committee acted in reference to the midnight order. I did not think, and I do not think now, that a majority of the committee acted on the question of corruption in the bankruptcy matters, nor does the journal of the committee show it; but, in reference to the other matter, there was under the enforcement acts a bill in equity brought to perpetuate testimony between A and B and C. On that bill to perpetuate testimony, alone, this order was issued to restrain and prevent the whole Legislature, E, F, G, and so on through the whole alphabet, from going on with their legislative business. Now, that seemed to me not within the enforcement act. There was no bill under the enforcement act to put that order in action, but simply a proceeding to perpetuate testimony. It seemed to me so gross an exercise of power that if the judge did not know he was exceeding his powers he ought to have known it. And, in either case, if he did know, of course he was wrong; and if he did not know, he ought to have known, and therefore he did not conduct himself well in office. And upon that ground I voted as I did.

There was no proof that after that order, after that restraining was done, after the whole mischief had been accomplished, there ever has been from that day to this, so far as I can learn, a motion in court by plaintiff or defendant, by judge, juror, or clerk, in reference to that case. And there never has been any return of what was done under that order. All the world knows what was done without a return.

Now, while I will not hold a judge to be impeachable where he simply makes a mistake, yet if a judge, clearly outside of all possible jurisdiction, interferes with the liberty of a single citizen, I will hold him impeachable. How much more so when he sets a great State and a great country by the ears, and produces anarchy and murder and all their attendant results. In my judgment it must be understood in this country that the courts must let politics alone. And I voted to serve a notice on all judges that they must attend to cases between party and party, and let politics alone; not allow the judicial ermine to be dragged in the filth of partisan discussion.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I do not know that the matters that have been talked about here are really before us now for discussion. So far as I am personally concerned, I do not propose to say anything with reference to the propriety or impropriety of the issuing of the so-called "midnight order." I am of the majority in making this report, and that sufficiently indicates my views upon the conduct of Judge Durell in reference to conducting the affairs of his court, and in reference to the issuing of the "midnight order."

My colleague on the committee from New York, Mr. POTTER, now absent under the direction of this House, desired to say a word in reference to this matter when it came up. It has come up in his absence. I hope that upon his return he may be permitted to say what he desires to say upon this subject. I now move that these resolutions lie upon the table, and upon that motion I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon discharging the Committee on the Judiciary from the further consideration of the case of Judge Durell, and laying their report upon the table.

Mr. HOLMAN. What will be the effect of a negative vote upon that proposition?

The SPEAKER. It will leave the question pending before the House.

Mr. RANDALL. Is the question divisible, so as to have a vote upon discharging the committee and yet not lay the resolution on the table?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. The Chair stated the question in that form for this reason: If the motion was simply to lay upon the table, it would not be debatable. But a motion to discharge the committee and lay upon the table is debatable. Discharging the committee would lay the report upon the table.

Mr. RANDALL. The question is not divisible?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

The question was then taken upon the motion of Mr. WILSON, of Indiana; and upon a division there were ayes 93.

Before the noes were counted,

Mr. COX called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 128, nays 69, not voting 91; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Averill, Barber, Barry, Bass, Begole, Biery, Bradley, Buffinton, Burchard, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Carpenter, Cason, Cessna, Chittenden, Clayton, Clements, Stephen A. Ward, Whiteley, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, and Ephraim K. Wilson—91.

So the motion of Mr. WILSON, of Indiana, was agreed to.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. PERRY said: Upon this question I am paired with Mr. SMITH, of Virginia; if present he would vote "ay," and I should vote "no."

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. PENDELTON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 1044) to provide for the resumption of specie payments.

IMPEACHMENT OF JUDGE BUSTEED.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following report:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was recommitted the following resolutions, to wit:

Resolved, That the honorable Richard Busteed, judge of the district court of the United States for the southern, middle, and northern districts of Alabama, be impeached for misdemeanors in office;

Resolved, That a committee of two be appointed to go to the Senate and at the bar thereof, in the name of the House of Representatives and of the people of the United States, to impeach Richard Busteed, judge of the district court of the United States for the southern, middle, and northern districts of Alabama, of misdemeanors in office, and acquaint the Senate that the House of Representatives will in due time exhibit particular articles of impeachment against him, and make good the same; and that the committee do demand that the Senate take order for the appearance of said Richard Busteed to answer to said impeachment;

Resolved, That a committee of seven be appointed to prepare and report articles of impeachment against Richard Busteed, judge of the district court of the United States for the southern, middle, and northern districts of Alabama, with power to send for persons, papers, and records, and to take testimony under oath—report the same back to the House; and, inasmuch as the said Richard Busteed has resigned his office and his resignation has been accepted, recommend that said resolutions do lie upon the table, and that the committee be discharged from further consideration of the subject.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] the chairman of our committee.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, it is due to Judge Busteed to state exactly the ground upon which this impeachment stands, so that it may go upon the record. I believe I am correct in saying that the only charge which was sustained against him in the committee arose in this way: By the act of 1818 a district judge is required to reside within his district, and his failure to do so is made a high misdemeanor. The Committee on the Judiciary believed the true construction of that statute to be that the district judge should be always within reasonable limits within his district, so as to be at all times accessible to the call of suitors in his court. It appeared before the committee that Judge Busteed had been absent for years from his district. The only question of contest was whether he had a legal domicile there, which appeared doubtful. But it was very clear to us that he did not reside in his district within the meaning of that statute; and as the statute made non-residence a high misdemeanor, we reported the resolution, upon which further action becomes unnecessary because of his resignation.

I desire to add but a word. I cannot permit to pass unchallenged what seems to me so grave a legal heresy, if my friend from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] will pardon the expression, as the idea that the House of Representatives cannot impeach an officer who has resigned; that an officer of the United States always has it within his power to stop an impeachment by simply resigning his office. The fourth section of the first article of the Constitution provides—

Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States; but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment according to law.

Now, it is well known that at the time of the formation of our Constitution the English Parliament, by impeachment, could not only remove a person from office, but might inflict fines and punishments even unto death. Our Constitution treats the power of impeachment as one that ought to be exercised for the safety of the Government; but in order to prevent the wrong and outrage which, as we know so well, parliamentary bodies may commit when they get excited over their reputations or something else, our Constitution put a wise limit upon the power of parliamentary impeachment in this country.

Mr. LAWRENCE. A limitation upon the power of punishment; that is all.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. A limitation upon the power of punishment in cases of impeachment. Our Constitution has provided that the punishment in such cases shall not extend further than to removal from office and disqualification for holding office. Now, though a man may escape the judgment of removal from office by removing himself, he cannot escape the punishment of disqualification to hold office. It is entirely within the power of the House and the Senate to go on and inflict that disqualification.

The dictum of Judge Story upon this question was, I am afraid, like some other dicta in his voluminous works, written by some law-school student; but whether that be so or not, the opinion is prefaced by an "it would seem;" the idea being that if we cannot enter a judgment of removal from office, we cannot enter the other judgment. I entirely dissent from that doctrine. The contrary was held by the Senate of the United States in the case of Judge Pickering, (although it did not necessarily arise there,) and also in the case of Judge Humphries, of East Tennessee, who at the beginning of the rebellion went over to the other side; who removed himself from office as fully as any man ever could; who took the oath of allegiance to the Confederate States, and went into their service. Yet the House of Representatives impeached that judge; he was tried before the Senate, and convicted.

Mr. LAWRENCE. That settled the rule against the theory of Judge Story.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I was about to say that that settled the rule against Judge Story's dictum, and shows how much weight was attached to that authority.

Mr. TREMAIN. Did Judge Humphreys resign his office?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. He vacated it; he ran away. He swore allegiance to the confederacy; he became a confederate judge. If ever a man got out of office he did; yet he was impeached and convicted. Without arguing the question further at this time of day, I only call attention to the point, because the great weight of the authority of my friend from New York may hereafter bring the matter in question when it will be vital. Think a moment. A President of the United States may have committed the highest possible crime; we are about impeaching him; and, as in both these cases, just after we get the resolution for impeachment through the House, and are about to begin proceedings in the Senate for his trial, he resigns. Why, is it possible he can do that and escape the consequences of his acts? Or suppose, while the Senate are calling the roll on the question of guilty or not guilty, he finds more than two-thirds are against him and he sends in his resignation—resigns his office and escapes. I do not think that can be done, and therefore it is my desire as far as I may to put myself upon the record against it.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I do not assent to the doctrine announced here to-day that by resignation a party can escape impeachment or trial for impeachment. One of the penalties imposed by impeachment is disqualification to hold office. I am not willing to have it understood, so far as I am concerned, that by my silence I agree to the doctrine a party can retain for himself the power afterward to hold office by simply running away from impeachment by resignation. But I do not care to discuss that now.

There is one matter in this case in reference to which I desire to express my dissent from what has been said by the chairman of the committee. If I understand him, he stated the ground and the sole ground upon which the committee proposed to impeach Judge Busteed was, that he did not reside in the district for which he was appointed. I do not understand that to be the fact in the case. That was one of the grounds upon which the committee proposed to impeach him, but there was another proposition involved in this case. The auditor of that State had been brought before that court for an alleged contempt of the court, and he was fined a thousand dollars and sent to jail for five days. On account of the opinion given by Judge Busteed in that case, and which he afterward gave to a newspaper in the State of Alabama, that auditor brought an action against Judge Busteed for libel. Judge Busteed took a change of venue from the county in which the case was originally brought, and it was sent to another county for trial. After the lapse of some months the case was settled between Judge Busteed and his counsel and the counsel for the plaintiff in that action, and the agreement upon which it was settled was, that this party was to give up his action of libel against Judge Busteed, and Judge Busteed was to have the money which had been paid by this party on account of the fine assessed against him returned to that party.

Mr. ELDREDGE. In settlement of the libel suit?

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. In settlement of this civil action for libel brought by this party against Judge Busteed. That money, pursuant to that arrangement, was taken out of the Treasury of the United States, for it was virtually in the Treasury of the United States, and used by Judge Busteed for the purpose of settling his private litigation or his litigation with this party on this libel suit. That was one of the grounds before the committee on which the committee resolved it would impeach him; and with that statement of the case I leave it to the House.

Mr. TREMAIN. Mr. Speaker, allusion having been made to the remarks submitted in relation to the power of Congress over this subject, I desire simply to say that the proposition which I intended to advance was, that there were, to say the least of it, very grave constitutional doubts existing as to the power to impeach and try before the Senate an officer who was not holding office at the time the impeachment was instituted. I had the authority of Judge Story on that subject, which was based on the language of the Constitution to this effect:

> Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States; but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment according to law.

And also upon section 4 of article 2—

> The President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

Now, I freely concede there is great room for argument on this question on both sides of it. There are authorities, not judicial, I think, which look to a contrary conclusion. A very able opinion has been prepared by one of our colleagues in this House, Judge LAWRENCE, in which he assumes that the power does not flow from the constitutional power to impeach so far as punishment is concerned. I do not venture to give an absolute and positive opinion on that disputed point. It was sufficient for the purpose of my argument that there were grave doubts upon it as well as high authorities against proceeding after an officer had resigned. There seems to be no great danger that any evil is likely to flow from that interpretation, for if an impeachable offense has been committed, the party is liable to be proceeded against by indictment. It did not seem to me to be wise to incur the large expense of impeachment so long as this question was pending, and especially as there was no immediate necessity or pressing emergency for bringing the question to final determination.

Nor do I think that the case of Judge Humphreys is at all important as bearing upon this question. He had not resigned his office. There was no way to get rid of him except by impeachment. True, he had gone into the confederate army; but we had no statute in the United States, as in some of the States, declaring that such a removal from his jurisdiction vacated his office. He was still in office, and thus the Senate had undoubtedly the right to proceed, as they did, to try him by impeachment, and remove him from office.

In the case of Judge Busteed I have examined the testimony. I had very grave doubts, and still have, whether any impeachable offense was made out against him. So far as relates to his non-residence, I think there is a very serious question whether that has been or can be considered a high crime and misdemeanor within the meaning of the Constitution. Judge Story, whose authority has been somewhat underrated here to-day, says that the Constitution means such offenses as are high crimes and misdemeanors as they existed at common law when this Constitution was adopted. By a subsequent statute it was declared that a judge should reside within his district, and that his non-residence should be a high crime and misdemeanor. It is a matter of very grave doubt in my mind whether refusal to reside would be considered a high crime and misdemeanor, because it was not such at the time the Constitution was adopted.

Mr. PELHAM. I would ask the gentleman whether by one of the statutes of the United States it is not made a high crime.

Mr. TREMAIN. Undoubtedly it is. And that presents the question whether that statute is or is not unconstitutional. If it required for impeachment a high crime and misdemeanor as the law then stood, of course it would not be competent for Congress to say that a man should be held guilty of a high crime or misdemeanor because he was not a democrat or because he was not a republican or because he did not wear his coat after a particular fashion.

But I do not propose to discuss that question, because I do not think that this case calls for it. I think there is some room for doubt about it. I am entirely satisfied with the disposition proposed to be made of this case by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. WILSON.]

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I wish to ask the gentleman from New York whether he thinks the issuing of the midnight order by Judge Durell was a high crime and misdemeanor at common law.

Mr. TREMAIN. Corruption and a willful and intentional abuse of official power are offenses indictable at common law. And there are undoubtedly grave official delinquencies of a moral character which are not attributable to mere non-residence, which I believe may be impeachable, or were so in England; although it may be very questionable whether it should not be an indictable offense, to be an impeachable offense under the Constitution. But on that question my friend from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] has prepared an elaborate argument to show that it is not necessary to an impeachment that the offense should be an indictable offense at common law. But I do not deem it necessary to take up more time at present on that question, because there is great room for doubt upon the evidence in this case as to the question of fact where Judge Busteed did reside; and if he had any residence anywhere whatever, whether it was not in Alabama. He had taken a lease in Alabama for three years, and left because the house was not in a tenantable condition, and he had acquired no residence elsewhere. He had been shot at, and carries one or two bullets in his body to-day. I do not suppose any one would say that he should have stayed there during the hot weather of summer in order to be a resident. If he had not a residence there, I do not think he had a residence anywhere. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania on the sub-committee [Mr. CESSNA] has examined and is familiar with the evidence bearing upon that subject fully, and is better prepared than I am to speak upon it.

As to the other question of his using the fund realized by the imposition of a fine, everybody agrees that he had the right to remit the fine during the same term of court. He had prepared an order during the term of court to remit it, but was then sued for the libel, and was advised then that it would be unwise, and therefore he did not make that order. Subsequently, on application being made to remit the fine, he undertook to remit it; but I doubt very much whether he had the power strictly to do it, the term of court having expired.

Mr. WHITE. I wish to ask the gentleman from New York whether, in connection with the remission of that fine, the testimony does not show the fact that it was done in order to compromise an action for damages against Judge Busteed.

Mr. TREMAIN. An action of damages growing out of an expression in an official opinion that he had pronounced in court while deciding that question of the fine, and which a reporter took and published in a newspaper; and he was sued for libel by the very party who had been fined. Afterward, on application to purge from contempt, he undertook to remit the fine; but I do not know that he had any right to do so.

Mr. CESSNA. I wish to ask the gentleman from New York if he has not official knowledge of the fact that it appeared in the evidence beyond all contradiction that, on the very morning after that fine was imposed, Judge Busteed had written an opinion remitting the fine, and was on his way to deliver that opinion when the writ was served upon him in the suit which has been referred to. I would also ask him if it is not true that this same question was before the House on two former occasions, was referred to the Judiciary Committee, considered by that committee, and unanimously reported against as insufficient ground for impeachment.

Mr. TREMAIN. I have already referred to the fact——

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. What is the question before the House?

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I yield to my colleague on the committee from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDREDGE.]

Mr. ELDREDGE. I do not want to occupy the time of the House more than a moment.

Mr. TREMAIN. Allow me a word. I have already answered the first part of the interrogatory of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. In regard to the latter point, I do not know anything about it, and of course if he does he can state it to the House.

Mr. PELHAM. Let me ask one question. Was there any evidence before the committee that Judge Busteed intended to remit that fine the next day after?

Mr. TREMAIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. PELHAM. Whose testimony?

Mr. TREMAIN. I am not familiar with the names of the witnesses, but doubtless the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CESSNA,] who was a member of the sub-committee, can inform the gentleman.

Mr. PELHAM. Was it not the testimony of his son-in-law?

Mr. CESSNA. There was evidence that he had prepared to do it on the day following.

Mr. PELHAM. Well, I have read the evidence very carefully, and I cannot find anything of the kind.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. What is the question before the House, and who is entitled to the floor?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WILSON] to yield to his colleague, [Mr. ELDREDGE.]

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I have yielded to him for five minutes.

Mr. PELHAM. The gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] allows me to ask him a single question. The gentleman states that this fine was attempted to be remitted in the settlement of a suit that was brought against Judge Busteed for an alleged libel, and which was groundless. Now, I want to ask the gentleman if it is not a greater outrage to take $1,000 of the Government money after it has been paid into a depository to compromise a suit which has no foundation than to compromise one that had foundation? The point is made that there was no foundation for the suit. I ask if it was not a greater crime to take $1,000 of the public money to compromise such a suit than it would have been to take it to compromise a suit which had some foundation?

Mr. TREMAIN. The question is whether Judge Busteed was corrupt in using the money. Now, if he had exercised this power during the term of the court, he would have had an unquestionable right to do so.

Mr. PELHAM. The case was compromised after the court adjourned.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. What is the question before the House?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's colleague [Mr. ELDREDGE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I do not desire to occupy the attention of the House for but a few moments. I entirely agree with the gentleman who makes this report to the House in regard to the grounds upon which the committee reported in favor of the impeachment of Judge Busteed. There were two grounds, as stated by the gentleman from Indiana. I can understand very well how the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] fell into the error into which he seems to have fallen, and it was in consequence probably of his own vote; and I state by his permission that he did vote for the proposition to impeach Judge Busteed for his non-residence in the district, but not upon the other ground which the committee reported in favor of impeachment on.

Now, sir, one word in regard to the power of impeachment in cases of resignation. That question did not arise in the committee and was not considered at all, because it was deemed most expedient to let the matter drop, since we had got rid of the judge. I did not suppose that the question would be raised, or that it could be supposed by any one that a party could resign after having committed high crimes, and escape trial and punishment for those crimes. I cannot, sir, myself, give my assent to any such doctrine. I do not believe that that is the proper legal construction of the Constitution, nor do I believe it would be policy to allow it to be done. There may be many cases where it would be the duty of Congress to proceed to put the party on trial and have the penalty administered of disqualification to hold any office thereafter. I think that is as much one of the objects of impeachment as to remove an improper person from the office itself. I do not wish to be committed to the contrary doctrine; and since gentlemen have seen fit to state their positions, lest they might be supposed to have given their assent to the doctrine that resignation would relieve the party from trial and condemnation, I wish to enter my dissent from that doctrine.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I now yield for a few moments to the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. PELHAM.]

Mr. PELHAM. Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to have said anything about this case. I intended to have allowed the resolution of the Committee on the Judiciary to be adopted without any comment from me whatever. But when the attempt is made here by the members of that committee to make it appear that there was really no crime or misdemeanor committed by Judge Busteed in Alabama, it is necessary for me to state briefly my reasons for not insisting upon his impeachment now.

It is well known that the late President Lincoln indulged frequently in practical jokes. The appointment of Judge Busteed, in the first instance, was a cruel practical joke on the people of Alabama, the cruelest one Mr. Lincoln ever indulged in or that ever was indulged in upon any people. Articles of impeachment were prepared against Judge Busteed, and he has resigned his office. The time of this House and the time of the Senate can be more profitably employed than in considering articles of impeachment preferred by this House. For that reason, and inasmuch as he never lived in Alabama, does not live there now, and in all probability we never will see him any more, I do not care to do anything further except to give this reason why I vote for the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. WILSON.] It is simply because he has resigned, and we will have no more trouble with him in Alabama, in all probability, that I agree to this resolution.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Does the gentleman have any apprehension that there is any possibility of Judge Busteed being appointed to some other office hereafter; that some practical joke will be practiced upon some other State?

Mr. PELHAM. Well, if the next elections go the way the last did, I do not know but what he will. At any rate there will be a good chance for it, for he has joined your party.

Mr. ELDREDGE. He will have to reform, then.

Mr. PELHAM. He has gone back on us.

The motion of Mr. WILSON was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana, moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BANKS ISSUING GOLD NOTES.

Mr. HOUGHTON. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table, and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, Senate bill No. 1068, to remove the limitations restricting the circulation of banking institutions issuing notes payable in gold.

Mr. HOLMAN. Not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider?

Mr. HOUGHTON. Certainly.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

CLAIMS OF CONSTRUCTORS OF IRON-CLADS.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I submit the following resolution for reference to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That two hundred and fifty copies of House report No. 269 be printed for the use of the House.

Mr. DAWES. What is that report?

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. It is in relation to claims of constructors of iron-clads.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can ask for a reprint of the report; that will give the usual number of fifteen hundred copies.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Will that include the views of the minority?

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. Of course.

Mr. RANDALL. I think we have spent money enough in that way.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. RANDALL. I do.

POWELL'S EXPEDITION.

Mr. DONNAN, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That the Congressional Printer be, and he is hereby, authorized to print the report of Major Powell's expedition in quarto form.

E. W. BLAIR.

Mr. LAWRENCE, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back the petition of E. W. Blair, of Nicholas County, Kentucky, and moved that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

CHRISTIANA L. WILLIAMS.

Mr. ST. JOHN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4202) to enable Mrs. Christiana L. Williams, administratrix of the estate of C. W. Williams, deceased, to make application to the Commissioner of Patents for an extension of letters-patent for improvement in canal locks and gates; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

CIVIL-RIGHTS BILL.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I desire to give notice that on Monday next, or as soon thereafter as possible, I propose to offer a resolution, to provide that in the consideration of the bill and amendments thereto relating known as the "civil-rights bill" no dilatory motions shall be entertained save motions to adjourn.

Mr. RANDALL. That does not amount to the time it takes to state it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That is very good; I am glad of it.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. HUBBELL was granted leave of absence for two weeks.

Mr. PURMAN was granted leave of absence for twenty days.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Also, the petition of Moody Johnson, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. ——: The petition of Victor Jourdan, of Hancock County, Mississippi, for relief, to the Committee on War Claims.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, January 8, 1875.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of War, submitting an estimate of funds required for the military prison at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, for the year ending June 30, 1876; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a letter of the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in obedience to law, reports of the surveyor-general of New Mexico on private land claims in that Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. ALLISON presented the petition of J. L. Jones, asking compensation for the use by the Government of his patented compound defensive armor during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. DAVIS presented the petition of George R. Murphy, of Piedmont, West Virginia, grandson of Isaac Murphy, deceased, praying indemnification for spoliations committed by the French prior to the year 1801; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. FENTON presented the petition of Thomas McGeehan, of the Soldiers' Home, Hampton, Virginia, asking for an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, presented the petition of A. T. McReynolds, of Muskegon, Michigan, a pensioner of the Mexican war, praying the passage of an act which will enable him to draw pension for three years and two months, being the time he served in the late rebellion, and during which time his pension was stopped; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland, presented the petition of Edmund Slifer, of Maryland, praying that a pension be allowed to the children of Joseph Butts, deceased, for services rendered by him while in the Army of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CONKLING presented a petition of a large number of soldiers of the late war, residing at College Point, Long Island, praying for an amendment to the homestead bill for the benefit of those who served in the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a petition of citizens of the city of Elmira, Chemung County, New York, praying an amendment of the fourteenth section of the act of September 24, 1789, to establish the judicial courts of the United States, so as to authorize the levying of a tax to pay judgments rendered by courts of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LEWIS presented a memorial of the members of the fire department of the District of Columbia, protesting against a decrease of their present salaries, as proposed by Senate bill No. 963, and praying that they may be increased; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. MORTON presented the petition of Rees B. Edmondson, praying the passage of the bill (S. No. 1002) declaring the effect of permits to purchase products of the insurrectionary States in certain cases granted by the President during the war of the rebellion; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Dakota, in favor of the opening up of the Black Hills country to actual settlers on the extinguishment of the Indian title thereto; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Dakota, in favor of a grant of land to aid in the construction of a railroad in Yankton, in that Territory, to the Great National Park, by the way of the Black Hills; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Dakota, in favor of an appropriation in aid of the construction of a wagon-road from some point on the table-lands, in Union County, in Dakota, across the marsh lands to Ponca landing on the Missouri River; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ROBERT TANSILL.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I believe there is on the table House bill No. 3780, removing the political disabilities of a gentleman in Virginia, which has been read and passed to a second reading. I move that the bill be taken up, so that it may be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary to be considered and reported.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 3780) to relieve the political disabilities of Robert Tansill, of Prince William County, Virginia, was read the second time and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PRATT, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 870) to place the name of Mrs. Mary E. Murphy on the pension-roll, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1183) granting a pension to Mrs. Martha R. Robinson, of Portsmouth, Ohio, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 366) granting a pension to Hugh Wallace, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3700) granting a pension to Teter Wolfyoung, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. KELLY. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4162) granting the right of way and depot grounds to the Oregon Central Pacific Railway Company through the public lands of the United States, from Winnemucca, in the State of Nevada, to the Columbia River, via Portland, in the State of Oregon, to report it without amendment; and as it is a bill in the common form, only granting the right of way, I ask that it be put upon its passage now.

Mr. WRIGHT. I trust the Senator from Oregon will not press that bill at this time. I want the morning business to get through, so that I can get up the bill abolishing the western judicial district of Arkansas, which is the order this morning in the morning hour; and so soon as that is disposed of after the morning business, the Senator can call up his bill, or he may withdraw his report now and then present it.

Mr. KELLY. I shall endeavor to call up the bill some time this morning.

Mr. WRIGHT. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion for present action on the bill is withdrawn.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2677) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary G. Harris, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3031) granting a pension to Catharine A. Winslow, widow of the late Rear-Admiral John A. Winslow, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1943) granting a pension to Helen M. Stansbury, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 836) granting a pension to William Ira Mayfield, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Mary Randolph, of Iowa, praying for the enactment of a law extending the time for applying for pensions, reported adversely thereon, and asked to he discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. I am also directed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 749) to repeal a part of the act therein named in relation to the compensation of pension agents, to submit an adverse report, which I ask shall be printed. I call the attention of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WRIGHT] who introduced this bill to the fact, because he may desire it to go on the Calendar.

Mr. WRIGHT. Let it be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. INGALLS. The bill will go on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That course will be taken, and the report will be printed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred a memorial of the Legislature of Oregon asking a donation of the unfinished mint building at Dalles City, reported a bill (S. No. 1097) to donate to the State of Oregon a public building, lot, and material, situated at the Dalles, Oregon; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. LEWIS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1098) to aid the Washington and Ohio Railroad Company in the construction of their road to the Ohio River; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SARGENT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 3819, being the regular appropriation bill for the naval service for the next fiscal year.

Mr. WRIGHT. The Senator from California will remember that the bill to abolish the western judicial district of Arkansas was laid over until to-day in the morning hour. I trust he will allow that bill to be taken up. It will take but a moment, and I think there will be no discussion on it. I understand the Senator from Ohio who desired to look into it [Mr. THURMAN] is satisfied.

Mr. SARGENT. If the Senator's bill will take but a moment and will not provoke discussion, I will give way for that. Otherwise, I must insist on my motion.

Mr. CLAYTON. I desire to say to the Senator from Iowa that I should be glad if he would allow that bill to go over until to-morrow morning. I desire to offer an amendment to it, which is in relation to the territorial boundaries of the two districts. I desire to restore the territory of the western district of Arkansas as it existed before the act of 1871 was passed. I think probably the Senator will unite with me in that.

Mr. WRIGHT. I trust my friend will allow this bill to be put on its passage now and disposed of, and the matter of which he speaks he can regulate otherwise than in this bill. I want to have this bill out of the way.

Mr. CLAYTON. I think it had better be made perfect before it is passed, and I am sure I shall be able to convince the Senator from Iowa that the territorial boundaries of the district are very imperfect as provided for in his bill.

Mr. SARGENT. As I see there is a difference among the Senators as to the provisions of the bill, and it evidently cannot be passed soon, I insist on my motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from California.

Mr. WRIGHT. I trust that the Senator will not insist upon that. This bill was passed over yesterday until to-day with the understanding that it should be the order during the morning hour to-day.

Mr. SARGENT. It is obvious from the statement made by the Senator from Arkansas that the bill will lead to considerable discussion now. By postponing it a single morning no harm can be done. As the Senator from Arkansas is confident he can convince the Senator from Iowa of the reasonableness of his amendment, that can be done off the floor and save the time of the Senate. There are now only eight weeks left of the session, and there are fourteen appropriation bills to be passed. I should like to inquire of the Senate when the Committee on Appropriations can get these bills passed unless we take opportunities like this? It would do no particular harm to postpone the bill the Senator refers to for a single day, to harmonize a difference that may take up the whole morning hour to discuss and then not come to a conclusion. I should think differently; and it seems to me, as it is now plain that we can probably pass in the three-quarters of an hour we have before one o'clock the naval appropriation bill, or at any rate make large progress with it, the Senate should allow the Committee on Appropriations to go on, and to-morrow the Senator from Iowa can take up his bill according to the suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on taking up the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to say to the Senator from California that this bill was reported at the last session of Congress, and if the appropriation bills are to come in and displace it, there is so much the greater necessity for disposing of it this morning. In the western district of Arkansas they are without a judge; and the question is to be settled, and we must settle it, whether the western district shall or shall not be abolished; and I am sure this can be done in five minutes, if the Senate will allow the bill to be taken up.

Mr. CLAYTON. I had sat down to draught the amendment which I desire to offer just before the Senator from Iowa called up the bill. I am satisfied that I cannot draught that amendment during the short time that is left to me if the bill is taken up now. I have no disposition whatever to delay the bill one day except to perfect it. The amendment reported by the committee——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on taking up another bill, not on the Arkansas bill.

Mr. CLAYTON. Let me say one more word. The amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary has been laid on our tables this morning. It is the first time I have had an opportunity to examine the printed amendment. I merely want to offer an amendment to it. If it has not merit, let it fall to the ground. There will be no necessity for discussing it long, I apprehend; but I want time to prepare an amendment.

Mr. WRIGHT. I shall not insist on considering this bill now; but I notify Senators that to-morrow morning I shall insist upon taking it up, and I trust there will then be no objection to taking it up; and I am not certain but that I shall then insist on the original bill without the amendment.

Mr. CLAYTON. We shall see about that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from California to take up the naval appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Accordingly the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 3819) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill. The first amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations was in line 15, at the end of the clause providing for the pay of commissioned and warrant officers, &c., to add the following proviso:

Provided, That no allowance shall be made in the settlement of any account for traveling expenses unless the same be incurred on the order of the Secretary of the Navy, or the allowance be approved by him.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 93.

Mr. SARGENT. The Committee on Appropriations instructed me to move an amendment to strike out "$18,000" and insert "$20,000" in line 93, which is necessary for the service. That will make the clause read:

For pay of computers and clerk for compiling and preparing for publication the American Ephemeris and Nautical Almanac, $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. The committee instruct me also to move on line 95 to strike out "two" and insert "three," so as to make the appropriation $3,000 for the continuance of work on new planets discovered by American astronomers.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Chief Clerk continued the reading of the bill. The next amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations was in line 197 to increase the appropriation from $5,000 to $20,000 for necessary repairs of naval laboratory, hospitals, and appendages, including roads, wharves, out-houses, steam-heating apparatus, sidewalks, fences, gardens, and farms, under the head of "Bureau of Medicine and Surgery."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to the next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations, which was on line 209, to reduce the appropriation "for provisions for officers, seamen, and marines" from $1,300,000 to $1,244,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in lines 241 and 242, to strike out the following proviso to the appropriations for the Bureau of Steam-engineering:

Provided, That the work be done in the shops of the navy-yard when practicable.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to offer the following amendment:

Strike out in line 244, after the word "others," down to and including the word "four," on line 246, and insert:

For two professors, (heads of departments,) namely, one of drawing, and one of English studies, history, and law, $2,500 each; three.

So as to make the clause read:

For pay of professors and others: For two professors, (heads of departments,) namely, one of drawing, and one of English studies, history, and law, $2,500 each; three professors namely, one of mathematics, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. I am also instructed by the committee to move to strike out on line 247 all after the word "Chemistry," down to and including the word "law," in line 248. The words stricken out are "one of English studies, history, and law."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 321.

Mr. SARGENT. I am instructed by the committee to move to strike out in line 321 "$10,000" and insert "$15,000," $10,000 being entirely inadequate for the purpose. The clause will then read:

For fuel and for heating and lighting the academy and school-ships, $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations was in lines 322 and 323, to increase the appropriation for the contingent expenses of the Naval Academy from $36,600 to $41,600.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. I move to strike out the words "contingent expenses," in line 322, and insert "general maintenance."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued. The next amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations was in line 341, under the heading "Marine Corps," after the word "troops," to insert "and for expenses of recruiting;" so as to make the item read:

For transportation of troops and for expenses of recruiting, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line 342 the following clause:

For transportation of officers traveling without troops, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 346, to increase from $5,000 to $10,000 the appropriation "for repairs of barracks and rent of offices where there are no public buildings."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 347, after the word "for," to insert "public horses and;" and in line 348 to strike out "three" and insert "five;" so as to make the clause read:

For forage for public horses and horses belonging to field and staff officers, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line 348 the following clause:

For payment of discharged soldiers for clothing not drawn, $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 351, to strike out the word "offices" and insert "officers."

Mr. SARGENT. That is merely a verbal amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. I am instructed by the committee to move to strike out "ten" and insert "sixteen" in line 352, so as to make the clause read—

For hire of quarters for officers where there are no public quarters, $16,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations was in line 367, to increase the appropriation for contingencies of the Marine Corps from $15,000 to $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BOUTWELL. May I ask the Senator from California what amount is appropriated by this bill?

Mr. SARGENT. A little over sixteen millions—about the same sum that was appropriated last year. The principal item of increase is for coal for ships' use, which was cut down to too small a sum last year, and is restored to nearly the amount appropriated the year before. That makes the principal item of increase. We have increased over the House bill in one or two of the smaller items in reference to the Marine Corps, which were cut down too close last year; and some items which are part of the pay of officers were cut down. These are on the last page, which we have just passed upon. For instance, there is one item of undrawn clothing which was omitted last year under some misapprehension. The undrawn clothing is that which is saved by economical marines from their allowance of clothing, which is tolerably liberal, by the Government, and, when their term of service expires, is reckoned up and is paid to them by money, by a species of commutation; that is put in this bill, amounting to twenty thousand dollars. But, by nearly all the amendments which we have made in the Senate, we have reduced the items of the House bill except in two or three cases, which I have moved this morning, on further information, amounting to fifteen or twenty thousand dollars. The rest of the amendments have been reductions on the bill, so that it goes back to the other House substantially as it came from it.

The bill was reported to the Senate, as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

BILL RECOMMITTED.

Mr. HARVEY. I move that the bill (H. R. No. 2997) for the relief of George A. Schreiner, reported June 1, 1874, adversely from the Committee on Claims, and placed upon the Calendar, notwithstanding the adverse report, be now recommitted to the Committee on Claims, for the reason that new evidence is to be presented by the claimant.

The motion was agreed to.

USE OF THE ARMY IN LOUISIANA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no further morning business, the Chair will call up the resolution introduced by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] the question being on the amendment of the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I call for the reading of the resolution now before the Senate, and of the amendment of the Senator from New York.

The CHIEF CLERK. The resolution is as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States is hereby requested to inform the Senate whether any portion of the Army of the United States, or any officer or officers, soldier or soldiers of such Army, did in any manner interfere or intermeddle with, control or seek to control, the organization of the General Assembly of the State of Louisiana, or either branch thereof, on the 4th instant; and especially whether any person or persons claiming seats in either branch of said Legislature have been deprived thereof, or prevented from taking the same, by any such military force, officer, or soldier; and if such has been the case, then that the President inform the Senate by what authority such military intervention and interference have taken place.

The amendment is to insert after the word "Senate" the words "if in his judgment not incompatible with the public interests."

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, in my judgment the amendment proposed by the honorable Senator from New York to this resolution is quite out of place and unnecessary. The resolution itself, we all know as a public fact, was a mere formal preliminary to congressional action. It was an orderly and respectful call upon a co-ordinate branch of the Government to account for his apparent exercise of unlawful power. I do not now propose to debate the question raised by the amendment of the Senator from New York, not because it is not important in itself, and touches an interesting, grave, and substantial question, but because it is overshadowed by the main subject upon which it is now sought to be ingrafted. Nor, since I have been personally referred to by that Senator as an authority to sustain the invariability of the amended form which he proposes, shall I do more than say that about two years ago I was endeavoring to save the depleted treasury of the State of South Carolina from further and gross peculation and robbery, and sought by a resolution of inquiry to draw the attention of the country and of the President of the United States and his subordinates to the case so that the scheme of plunder might be arrested, if there was a disposition to do so.

In this attempt, however, I was, as usual in this body, unsuccessful, for the resolution, although it was adopted early in the month of March, 1873, and was sent to the President, was treated by him and his Secretary of War with contemptuous silence, and the wrong-doer was not only permitted to consummate his wrong, but he has been encouraged to repeat it, and to-day we find him sent to "fresh fields and pastures new" in the State of Louisiana, to repeat there the operations that made his name so notorious in the State of South Carolina. I refer to one Major Lewis Merrill, of the United States Cavalry, who has added to his notoriety by his late congenial operations in the State of Louisiana, for which he has been specially detailed by the Secretary of War with a full knowledge of the facts that preceded his conduct in South Carolina.

The amendment to the resolution originated not with me but with the Senator from New York, who now offers it in the same phrase to the present resolution. I was at that time compelled to accept it or virtually lose the possibility of having my resolution adopted. I offered it as soon as the facts were made known to me. There were but two working days left of the session, and the objection which was made upon the first day would have continued it over, and I was glad to have it accepted in any form, even with the entirely superfluous, and, as I thought then, improper addition which was put upon it. I made no objection to it. In that way alone the resolution, as amended by the Senator from New York, came before the Senate.

But, Mr. President, that is a very small matter compared to the gravity of the crisis in which I believe the people of the United States find themselves this day. If I overrate it, it is because the deep solicitude which I feel in everything touching my public duty and the welfare of my countrymen must account for the error in judgment. I do not believe that since the American colonies separated themselves from the rule of Great Britain by revolutionary action the people of this country were ever brought face to face with graver questions, needing braver, calmer, more deliberate consideration, than confront them to-day. It is not simply the question of the existence of that republican form of government which by the Constitution it is made the duty of the United States to guarantee to every State of this Union, and without which Louisiana stands to-day. It is even graver, if it be possible, more important than even that, for there are governments, of laws not republican in form, in which the objects of good government are secured and peace and safety given to the inhabitants. But the issue now to be raised between the people of the United States and those whom they have elected as their rulers is whether this Union of States shall be governed by law or by the mere personal will of the official; whether we shall have a civil government or a military dictatorship; whether we shall have a free government or a despotism. The issue is, if I mistake it not, not less grave than this. In the venerable Commonwealth of Massachusetts I find well stated the object for which, the spirit with which, these limited governments were created, and their charters reduced to writing, so that they should not depend upon the feebleness of men's memories, but should be fixed in written characters for all time. Said the people of Massachusetts in their Declaration of Rights, in the fourth section:

> The people of this Commonwealth shall have the sole and exclusive right of governing themselves as a free, sovereign, and independent State; and they shall forever hereafter exercise and enjoy every power, jurisdiction, and right which is not or may not hereafter be by them expressly delegated to the United States of America in Congress assembled.

And in the closing section of their declaration of rights:

> In the government of this Commonwealth the legislative department shall never exercise the executive and judicial powers, or either of them; the executive shall never exercise the legislative and judicial powers, or either of them; the judicial shall never exercise the legislative and executive powers, or either of them, TO THE END THAT IT MAY BE A GOVERNMENT OF LAWS, AND NOT OF MEN.

There is the soul of the declaration of rights upon which the government of the ancient Commonwealth of Massachusetts stood in 1779, and under and subject to which her people have lived to this day.

Mr. President, absolute, unlimited power is unknown to the American system of government, or to any other system of government pretending to be called free. The people of the States and the States as integral parts of the Federal Union have delegated certain enumerated powers to their rulers, and reserved all others expressly in their written charter to the States and to the people. To omit the execution of just power is clearly a breach of duty of the Executive, and to assume power not delegated is a usurpation quite as dangerous as rebellion and just as promptly to be checked.

Now, sir, in what spirit should an American Senator approach the consideration of a question like this? Should it not be gravely, moderately, restrainedly, and without excitement, discussed? How unlike should it be to the remarks which we have here printed in the records of the proceedings of this body, which fell from the honorable Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] and from his associates from Vermont and from Illinois, [Messrs. EDMUNDS and LOGAN,] in which every line seems to breathe hatred, to blaze with excitement, to be filled with violent epithets, with general arraignment and indictment of the whole white population of a sister State, so that it seems to me their speeches must have been intended to obscure the real point at issue and to envelop the subject in a cloud of excitement, to awaken anew the bitterness of sectional animosity; and, by sounding the trumpet of mere party, to draw their hearers away from that standard of sworn patriotic duty to support and defend the Constitution of their Government. I shall not imitate them. My sense of indignation is strong, but it is to be silenced by my sense of sorrowful apprehension of evil to my country.

Sir, in the course of the late dreadful war between the States of this Union, I heard of a widowed mother, bereft of husband, of child, of property, sitting in the midst of her desolation, with a bleeding heart, who was asked whether she did not hate those who had thus wronged her; and her answer was, "My heart is too full of sorrow, to have any room for anger."

Now, sir, what are the facts of this case? An election on November the 3d was held in Louisiana, as in the other States. It was conducted with earnestness and some excitement, and yet peaceably—certainly orderly. The entire machinery for conducting and supervising that election was in the hands of the acting governor of the State and his political adherents. The forms of election were maintained and they were generally exercised, and the returns were wholly in the hands of "Governor" Kellogg, as he is called, and his adherents. He committed them to a returning board who kept them in the face of the country, under a pretense of tabulation and counting, for nearly two months, lacking I think but two days. Other States nearly five or six times as populous found their returns tabulated and correctly counted within less than a week. In most of the great cities of the country, containing far more population than the whole State of Louisiana, forty-eight hours had not elapsed before there was a tabulation and count of the votes. But this tabulation and counting were retarded and delayed by the returning board, the appointees of Kellogg, for the foul and wicked purpose declared and proven by their opponents, forgery proven, the substitution of false returns for real returns, the arbitrary rejection of clear testimony in regard to the election; even a public holiday, the Thanksgiving Day, violated for the purpose of breaking open the envelopes and replacing the true returns by forged ones. All these things are not only alleged, but proven, and are known to the country. The delay had its object, and the object was fraud, and the fraud was perpetrated, and in every case where fraud was perpetrated it was a fraud against the conservative party of the State and in favor of that party known as the Kellogg party. To that there is no exception; it stands the invariable rule of these fraudulent alterations.

The conservatives were vigilant, they were constant, they were courageous; but their apprehensions were but too sadly to be verified, and the overwhelming majority of the conservatives in the Legislature of the State of Louisiana was nullified, and a small majority—I believe of two votes—given to the Kellogg party in the house of representatives by the garbled, false, partial returns of this board. This was done in the presence of the whole country. Day by day the charge was made and proven. The coun try knew it. No one denied it. The President of the United States was advised of it; he was kept well informed of it, and his semi-official utterances, made known to the people, were that, no matter what frauds should be accomplished by this board, they should be maintained at every cost, or that "somebody should be hurt" in case interference was attempted with their nefarious proceedings; that is to say, if any resistance to a clear, plain wrong was made by an outraged community.

On the 4th of January the Legislature of Louisiana, under the constitution of that State, were to assemble in the State-house in the city of New Orleans; they were to organize their respective bodies. The constitution of the State of Louisiana provides in article 34, entitled "Of the legislative department," first—

> That the number of representatives shall never exceed one hundred and twenty nor be less than ninety.
> ART. 34. That each house of the General Assembly shall judge of the qualifications, election, and returns of its members; but a contested election shall be determined in such manner as may be prescribed by law.
> ART. 35. Each house of the General Assembly may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish a member for disorderly conduct, and, with a concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member; but not a second time for the same offense.
> ART. 37. Each house may punish by imprisonment any person not a member for disrespect and disorderly behavior in its presence, or for obstructing any of its proceedings; such imprisonment shall not exceed ten days for any one offense.

Such is the language of the constitution of Louisiana. Now, let us consider for one instant the value of this right given exclusively to each House to determine the rules for its own proceedings and to pass upon the elections, qualifications, and returns of its own members. Like all things that are of value, it was not reached in a day, but its path was a path of difficulty to those who achieved it. The history of this right, this English-born right of self-government by the representatives of the people, is well related in The Law and Practice of Legislative Assemblies by Cushing, at section 146:

> The present constitution of the House of Commons is, to a considerable extent, the result of a series of struggles between it, on the one hand, and the sovereign, or the lords, or both, on the other. One of the earliest of these conflicts, and one of the most interesting, is that which terminated in the establishment of the right of the Commons to be the exclusive judges of the returns, elections, and qualifications of their own members. This right, after having been claimed and exercised at one time by the king and council, at another by the House of Lords, and, again, by the lord chancellor, was declared by a resolution of the Commons, in 1624, and has ever since been admitted to belong exclusively to the house itself, as "its ancient, natural, and undoubted privilege."

This power is so essential to the free election and independent existence of a legislative assembly that it may be regarded as a necessary incident to every body of that description which emanates directly from the people; it is also, out of abundant caution, conferred upon or guaranteed to most of the legislative assemblies of the United States by express constitutional provisions.

In accordance with this inherent right, incidental to the very nature of the body, was the constitutional guarantee which, as the writer has said, out of plenary caution was introduced into the constitution of the State of Louisiana. There was a voluntary and orderly attendance of 101 or 102 elected and persons claiming to be members-elect of the house of representatives of the Legislature of the State of Louisiana on the 4th day of January instant, more than a quorum under the constitution of the State. But under what circumstances did these representatives of the will of the people of Louisiana assemble? In the State-house, not the custom-house or any other United States building, but in the house of the State of Louisiana. And in whose hands did they find it? On the evening previous it had been garrisoned with what were called the Metropolitan police, the adherents and partisans and sole appointees of Kellogg, the acting governor. Around the house, controlling access to it upon two sides, were armed troops of the United States acting in force under the command of an officer of the United States under delegated authority from the President of the United States. The lawful citizens of the State of Louisiana were forbidden to approach their State-house. They who alone were privileged spectators were forbidden to exercise the high, the inherent, the essential privilege of witnessing the convention of their own State Legislature. There was a member of Congress, well known and esteemed by all—I refer to Mr. POTTER, of New York, at present a member of the investigating committee there—who sought in vain as a private citizen of a sister State to approach and witness the form of inauguration of the assembly, and was forbidden by armed force.

I consider his rejection an outrage, and unlawful; but I consider that the poorest and the meanest citizen of Louisiana had a precedent right even over my respected friend to enter the hall and to witness the inauguration of the Legislature in whose election he had cast his vote and who were to be the makers of laws under which he should live. But until the House committee appointed to make this investigation shall return, I will not attempt to recite any disputed or disputable fact. I shall take facts which are admitted and established, and refer to them alone.

There was an organization of that house. There was a speaker elected and placed in his chair. There was a clerk also chosen, and this was done in the presence of a quorum of the house of representatives constitutionally convened, and by the votes of a constitutional majority of those present, quietly, regularly, and peacefully cast. I will not now argue the regularity or the irregularity of the initiation of this organization. The Kellogg party may have been deceived as to their numbers, and outwitted by the defection in their own ranks, or by the superior parliamentary skill and knowledge of their opponents; the organization may have been perfectly regular, or it may have been in some degree irregular and open to criticism; but it is certain that it was quiet, that it was peaceful, and unaccompanied by any threat or act of violence on the part of any conservative member. When I say that I mean that it was unaccompanied by any show of that "domestic violence" which is spoken of in the Constitution, which gives the President of the United States the right to interfere, and there was no pretext for the existence of anything capable of being termed "violence" on the part of the one hundred and one members of the Legislature so convened. On the contrary, Mr. President, there was a dignity far removed from violence; there was a courage far different from bluster, which would have become a Roman senate even in the presence of some barbarian horde. It is said that even a rude Goth at the head of his forces was impelled to yield involuntary respect to the aged and unarmed men of the Roman senate who witnessed in their placid dignity the invasion of their council chamber; but it seems that an officer of the Army of the United States is untouched by any such restraining influences, and knows no law of restraint but the will of his superior officer, no matter what may be the outrage upon the rights of his fellow-citizens, or the laws and the Constitution of his country, which he may have been ruthlessly ordered to commit.

The house of representatives of Louisiana was on the 4th of this present month purged of five members who were in their official seats, quietly and peaceably filling their places in that body, having been admitted and sworn into office by the only competent body to admit them or pass upon their qualifications. They were purged just as in 1648 one Colonel Pride, with his two regiments, purged the house of Parliament at the order of a Cromwell: seized forty-one members, displaced them by force, excluded one hundred and sixty others, and thus he constituted that fag-end of a government that has come down hissed by posterity as the "rump" of a parliament, and which lived its wretched and disgraceful career five short years, until the hand of the master that had constituted it drove it with shame from the place where his power alone had placed it. Sir, does not history repeat itself, and will men be forever deaf to its lessons until they burn themselves in by painful experience?

Mr. President, I ask the Senate, I ask the American people, had President Grant the legal warrant for interference by troops at that time, in that manner, at that place? Had Governor Kellogg the power himself to do it? Had he the lawful power to call upon the President or any other person to interfere as was done on that day? Where is the law, where is the constitutional provision from which such right can be implied, however remotely or indirectly? There has been none yet cited, and I make bold here to-day to say that this debate will begin and it will close, and there will be no lawyer, as I believe, of this body who will be able to produce the statute or even attempt to twist or force the construction of words that will give any warrant for this act.

There stands the constitution of the State of Louisiana, the provisions of which I have read. There stands the Constitution of the United States, containing its enumerated and delegated powers to the President as to all other departments of this Government. Where do we see them now? Overthrown and cast down by the furious lawlessness, by the unlawful ambition, of these two officials whom I have named, the creature and the creator. Look at it, Senators! Look at it, people of the United States! Contemplate the picture of that dispersed Assembly; read the protest of the peaceable and orderly men ejected by brute force from their lawful places in that Assembly, and then say whether party passion or sectional prejudice can constrain you to approve it, or prevent you from grave and deliberate condemnation of the act, and of those who have committed it.

But, Mr. President, such conduct is, I am sorry to say, not new in Louisiana. It is but a leaf out of the book of the sad story of that State. Two years ago it was under pretended forms of law, that only made the fact more loathsome, by mingling more fraud with force. The act to-day is more bare-faced, and in that I think there may be some security to my fellow-countrymen.

I will take leave, not in egotism but in justification of what I say to-day, to read some remarks which I made in the Senate on the 27th of February, 1873, at the hour of six o'clock in the morning, when I and others had been kept here in weary and fruitless debate upon some bill relating to the State of Louisiana unauthorized, as I believe utterly unauthorized, by the Federal Constitution. I said then:

I believe it is never wise to blink the truth. I believe it is never wise in governing a people in any way to deceive them, or to rule them by false promises. And here I state to the Senate and the country that I believe these governments "so called" in the Southern States are but thin veils for actual military power in the hands of the Federal Administration. Those governments are permitted to exist so long as they please "the powers that be." So long as they pronounce the shibboleth of your party, so long and no longer those who represent the governments will be protected, but it is intended to overshadow them from time to time by the hand of Federal power, so that they may be taught that unless they do conduct themselves according to the will of their real masters, not even the forms of republican government shall exist. It matters not whether the end is reached by Durell and his pretended "judicial" orders, or Casey with his Gatlin guns or revenue-cutters, or Attorney-General Williams with his "fusion" suggestions, or swarms of United States marshals and their deputies to enforce congressional election laws—all are part and parcel of the scheme and system of that coercive power which is the real government of this country.

Sir, if the President of the United States shall proclaim martial law in Louisiana, if he shall take possession of that State, he will only be doing openly what his party in fact have been doing for the last six or seven years under the thin veil and flimsy disguise of legal forms. There has not been a time when troops have not either actually gone there or have been threatened to be sent there. No one can doubt that Judge Durell would never have dared to issue this order, nor would any one have thought of obeying it, if there had not been an intimation to him that the power of the Federal Army would back him up and would sustain the faction that he was creating under the name of a government. I do not doubt it. I do not think the people of this country can doubt it; at any rate, I say here in my place to them I believe it to be true, and I think the facts warrant the belief.

Therefore, sir, believing at any time that I would rather know my fate, and I trust I will never be afraid to look my fate in the face, I do feel that our Government is passing away from us because we are losing the disposition and the means of enforcing those limitations upon the powers of those who rule us, and they are disregarding them. That which is the law for Louisiana to-day may be made the law for Pennsylvania or New York to-morrow. It has been threatened in New York; it has been carried almost to the same point in New York; her peaceful streets have been filled with Federal troops on the occasion of popular election; her waters and her docks have held armed vessels ready to hail destruction upon her citizens and their property. Those things have been witnessed by the American people, but their meaning seems to have been but faintly understood; and now I would say to the people of every other State, "Read in the fate of Louisiana to-day what well may be your own when the necessities of party shall call upon those in power to make it so."

I know that I say this at the commencement of a new lease of power of the republican party, when we are to have four more years of government probably by the same Executive, possibly by the same Congress as heretofore; and yet, nevertheless, the time must come when the people of this country shall again express their will, and all that I can do is to tell them the truth as I see it, and then if it be my fate to stand in the minority, that will not the least silence my voice; that will not the least change my ardent aspirations to serve my fellow-men, and I shall warn them, as I warn them now, of the dangers I apprehend, and indicate the proper modes of meeting them.

Such, sir, were my views expressed here in open debate, nearly two years ago. Again, when this subject was up on the 20th of April, 1874, I stated the fact that—

Under the thin veil of a pretended republican form of government, the real government of Louisiana to-day is military force. It is a sham to call it anything else. You lift the gown of the judge, and you find the saber of the dragoon; you enter the executive chamber, and the power there is the power of the sword and not of the law. The government of Louisiana to-day is nothing but military power, protecting dishonest men who wear the sham robes of State office.

Mr. President, has this policy on the part of the President been changed? Reading by the events of to-day this ineffectual debate of mine nearly two years old, who shall challenge the truth of those utterances? They were sincerely made; they have been confirmed by time, the irrefutable register of truth. What has been the policy of the President of the United States? Has it been moderated or modified? Nay, sir, it has only been doggedly intensified. There is not in that State one case of abuse of power, of peculation, robbery, and filthy dishonesty, with which the history of its government is filled in the last two years, in which his displeasure has ever been signified by the removal of an improper official, not one word of rebuke. On the contrary, there has been personal and official encouragement of men who stand before the nation branded as dishonest and unworthy, and whom no man would trust with his private affairs or give power to in matters affecting himself in any way.

In the midst of this excitement, in the midst of this blow at the very heart of popular government, who has he selected to preside over the affairs of that State? Lieutenant-General Philip Sheridan, sent by him to New Orleans secretly, not by public order known to the people. He is sent down to dragoon the people of Louisiana into slavish, fearful, cringing, un-American obedience to his will and pleasure. He arrives there only three days before the assembling of the Legislature. He sees none of those who have the welfare of the community at heart. From Kellogg and his adherents, the men who have brought this trouble and sorrow upon the State by their own corrupt and selfish ambition, he takes his account. They inform him, they inspire him, and from the recesses of his pocket he suddenly produces the authority and "assumes the command of that military district," over which there was already a competent commander regularly and publicly assigned. Instantly, without other public order, that commander is superseded, other officers both higher and lower in rank than General Sheridan are passed by, and he is personally selected to undertake the task of unlawful interference with the free government of a sovereign State of this Union.

Now, it is not my purpose in any degree to detract from whatever of renown may have rested upon the brow of this officer. I would be incompetent to criticise his military career, and that is all I believe that he has. It is a career of force, a career of vigor, a career of rough war, of which I know but little, and therefore am incompetent to criticise him as to that respect. But, sir, I also know that he is an officer of the Army of the United States, that he is fed and clothed by the people of the United States, and that he is the servant of those people, and not in any just sense their master; that he received the military education that has enabled him to become so eminent at the national academy and at public cost. The Constitution of the United States is still a text-book of that institution. It was a text-book when this officer received his graduation; and yet it seems to me that while he must have read it, while he must have known that his commission as an Army officer took its roots in the principles of civil liberty which that Constitution was intened to secure, yet he has forgotten almost its first and most necessary instructions. Sir, has he not forgotten that, "a well-regulated militia being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed?" Has he not forgotten that "the right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures shall not be violated?" That "no person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia when in actual service in time of war or public danger?" Nor that any person shall be "deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law?" That "in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation, to be confronted with the witnesses against him, to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense?"

Sir, if these things were read by that officer, surely he must have forgotten them, or else has the more guilty audacity to ride roughshod over them. If he has forgotten, let him now be taught anew. Let us see who is the stronger. The issue cannot come too soon. If this cavalry officer, with whatever renown he may have gained with his bloody sword, shall be stronger than these guarantees of personal liberty which we supposed were secured to us, let us know it now. We cannot have the issue raised too soon or too distinctly decided.

Now, sir, I ask the Senate and the country to listen to the tone of this officer and see, when you have read his dispatches to the Administration here, who shall say he is even fit to breathe the air of a republican government. I believe this officer reached New Orleans about the 1st of January, and on the 4th of January he telegraphed to the Secretary of War, Hon. W. W. Belknap, as follows:

HEADQUARTERS MILITARY DIVISION OF MISSOURI,
New Orleans, January 4.

Hon. W. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

It is with deep regret that I have to announce to you the existence in this State of a spirit of defiance to all lawful authority and an insecurity of life which is hardly realized by the General Government or country at large. The lives of citizens have become so jeopardized that unless something is done to give protection to the people all security usually afforded by law will be overridden. Defiance to laws and murder of individuals seem to be looked upon by the community here from a stand-point which gives impunity to all who choose to indulge in either; and the civil government appears powerless to punish, or even arrest. I have to-night assumed control over the Department of the Gulf.

P. H. SHERIDAN,
Lieutenant-General.

"Assumed control over the Department of the Gulf!" Here is then from the hand of this mere soldier, military in instinct and in education, and ignorant of civil right or law, the cool complacence of ignorance, that he could do that of which even the great mind of the most philosophic statesman and lawyer of modern times declared himself incapable. Burke declared he could not draw an indictment against a whole people; but it seems that—

Fools rush in where angels fear to tread.

Mr. Sheridan can indict an entire community and declare this wholesale destruction of their moral character upon three nights' acquaintance in one city of a large State. Mr. President, there have been replies to this, made upon the instant these telegrams were published.

At a meeting of the Merchants' Exchange, largely attended, the following series of resolutions were unanimously adopted:

Be it resolved, That we condemn as a positive untruth and as a libel upon the community the statement of General Sheridan, contained in the above; that we deny herewith that the spirit of defiance against lawful authority exists and that the lives of citizens have become jeopardized thereby.

Resolved, That we emphatically condemn, as law-abiding citizens, and do most solemnly and earnestly protest against the military interference with and the disorganization of the Legislature of Louisiana, which was duly elected by ourselves and the citizens of the State.

The board of underwriters met and passed similar resolutions, denouncing as utterly untrue and unwarranted these assertions of the Lieutenant-General. The Cotton Exchange, on the same day, had a full meeting, and adopted the following unanimously:

Whereas General P. H. Sheridan, commanding the Military Division of Missouri, has seen fit to address to the honorable Secretary of War a letter, dated January 4, and published in our papers of this date, in which he has given utterance to statements reflecting upon the people of this State, and particularly of such as reside in this city, singularly at variance with the condition of things now and heretofore existing in this city and State, and well calculated not only to detract from our good name as law-loving and law-abiding citizens, but also to seriously injure the commercial interests of our city, the Cotton Exchange, an organization totally disconnected from political affairs, and instituted solely for the promotion of commercial interests, feels called upon to enter a solemn protest against the allegations contained in said letter.

The members of this exchange give solemn assurance to the people of the United States and to the friends of truth and justice wherever found, that the allegations of General Sheridan are not only false in point of fact, but evince the spirit of a mere partisan rather than the nobility of a soul which should characterize the utterances of an officer commanding the army of a great nation. It is painfully evident that, coming among us an almost entire stranger, General Sheridan has limited his inquiries into the condition of affairs here to those whose interests it is not only to falsify facts but to promote that spirit of lawlessness with which we are falsely charged. It would not indeed be a matter of surprise if crimes in our midst were more frequent, when it is borne in mind that the police force, for the maintenance of which we are heavily taxed, is now, and has been, diverted from its legitimate duties to such an extent that large districts of our city are entirely without protection, and many of our citizens are compelled to employ private watchmen for protection against thieves and burglars.

Then came an address from the committee of seventy citizens of New Orleans, gentlemen of standing and character, the meanest man among them the peer in all respects of this officer of the United States Army who has slandered them, in which they protest against his calumnious statements, and call upon the people of their State to exercise more of heroism and patience and forbearance, which will arouse the sympathies of the entire country in their behalf; and God grant it may.

Then comes an appeal of the clergy of New Orleans to the American people.

To the American people:

Whereas General Sheridan, now in command of the Division of the Missouri, under the date of the 4th instant, has addressed a communication to Hon. W. W. Belknap, Secretary of War, in which he represents the people of Louisiana at large as breathing vengeance to all lawful authority and approving of murders and crimes: We, the undersigned, believe it our duty to proclaim to the whole American people that these charges are unmerited, unfounded, and erroneous, and can have no other effect than that of serving the interests of corrupt politicians, who are at this moment making the most extreme efforts to perpetuate their power over the State of Louisiana.

N. J. PERCHE,
Archbishop of New Orleans.
J. P. B. WILMER,
Bishop of Louisiana.
JAMES K. GUTHERIM,
Pastor Temple of Sinai.
J. C. KEENER,
Bishop M. E. Church South.
C. DOLL,
Rector St. Joseph's Church. (And many others.)

Then again in to-day's paper there is a protest from other divines, the Bishop of Little Rock and others. In another dispatch of General Sheridan, which I have not yet read, he goes further and arraigns not only the people of New Orleans, Louisiana, but the entire communities of three States, in none of which does it appear he has been except for the period of three days at the city of New Orleans.

Let me now read further. On the 5th of January he telegraphs the Secretary of War at Washington:

HEADQUARTERS OF THE MILITARY DIVISION OF MISSOURI,
New Orleans, Louisiana, January 5, 1875.

Hon. W. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.:

I think the terrorism now existing in Louisiana, Mississippi, and Arkansas could be entirely removed and confidence and fair dealing established by the arrest and trial of the ringleaders of the armed White Leagues. If Congress would pass a bill declaring them banditti, they could be tried by a military commission. This banditti, who murdered men here on the 14th of last September, also more recently at Vicksburgh, Mississippi, should, in justice to law and order and the peace and prosperity of this southern part of the country, be punished. It is possible that if the President would issue a proclamation declaring them banditti, no further action need be taken except that which would devolve upon me.

P. H. SHERIDAN,
Lieutenant-General United States Army.

Ah, Mr. President, if there was the tone that under other administrations animated the Executive of this country, he would never sign his name again as Lieutenant-General of the United States Army. Is this the language of an American officer toward his fellow-countrymen? Why, sir, if he were in a hostile country among the sick and wretched Piegan Indians, had he been in the service of Mexico, there could not have been a more ruthless, a darker, or more bloody threat than is contained in the closing lines of this dispatch to the Secretary of War. This is language relating to the citizens of three States of this Union. Is it the language that is due from an officer of the Army of the United States, wearing that honorable uniform, the protector, the guard, the glory of his people, without destinction of party; or is it not the language of some captain of a band of janizaries, asking orders from an oriental despot in regard to his ruthless extermination of those whom he may deem the foes of power? This man, educated with one of his text-books the Constitution of his country, asks that Congress shall pass an ex post facto law, making that a crime which was not a crime at the time of the commission of the alleged offense, and creating new punishments to make the penalty still more severe. He asks for military commissions, in these times of peace, to try men neither in the land nor naval service of the United States. He asks for drum-head court-martials to try citizens over whom there is no pretense that the authority of the Army or of the Navy is extended. What is the dark and bloody threat at the close of his dispatch, for Senators? What did he mean when he asked the President to issue a proclamation declaring these citizens banditti, and that then no further action need be taken except that which would devolve upon him?

I confess to you as I read this dispatch my blood curdled in my veins. If it had been sent in the midst of strife by a man heated by the excitement of combat, there might have been palliation for it, because a cooling time would have come when his better reason would operate, when "Philip sober" would have answered this "Philip drunk." But this dispatch was penned in safety; it was penned in quiet; it was penned where there was nothing that threatened him, and without anything to cause him excitement except the apprehended loss of political power to the chief whom he was sent there to represent.

What character does this officer seek to assume? There was Tristan l'Hermite, the provost-marshal of the royal household, whom the genius of Scott has painted until he is familiar in every household. It seems to me that this officer has modeled himself much upon the morals and conduct of this hangman of royalty of days gone by.

Sir, I say that in a proper condition of sentiment with those in power he would not have been suffered to remain for five minutes in command at New Orleans. He has no one quality that fits him properly for the duties of command there now. His first requisite should be good-will and kindness to the people, strict impartiality; no threats of force, careful obedience to civil rule. This was the example he should have set as a high official, honored by his country, and invested with high discretionary powers; and, as this example does not seem to originate with him, I want it now taught him, and taught so that not alone he will not forget, but that every other officer of the Army and Navy of the United States will learn and know that it is in the affections, in the respect of their fellow-countrymen, and not in their fears, that they are to find their place of honor and of safety.

Sir, I said he has cruelly maligned these populations among whom he has gone, and I have allowed them in their own way to answer him, not beginning to recite the numerous protests that have followed his false and calumnious charges against them. Sir, it is perfectly shocking, and I think a civilized world everywhere must be deeply shocked when such dispatches are read. We have talked about the Russian rule in Poland and have held it up as an abhorrent example of cruelty; but what dispatch ever sent to a Russian Czar exceeded in remorseless savagery the closing lines of the dispatch of General Sheridan on the 5th of January to Belknap, Secretary of War? I wish it ended there, I wish it ended with him; but alas! alas! here we find on the 7th of January the Secretary of War answering in the following phrase:

> Your telegrams all received. The President and all of us have full confidence and thoroughly approve your course.

I know not how fitly to designate such a communication, except to say that every expression of disgust, of horror, of antagonism that I have expressed toward the action of General Sheridan in his dispatches is rather increased toward those who could pen or concur in such an answer as that. The American people must answer it. They must answer it from their hearts, and I believe there is after all in the human heart such a response to kindness, such a natural love of justice, that they will repudiate Mr. Belknap "and all of us" to whom he so loosely and generally refers, should they undertake to indorse the action of General Sheridan in New Orleans and his dispatches to the Department of War.

Mr. President, in 1866 the Supreme Court of the United States found it necessary to pass upon the questions now raised by General Sheridan and proposed to be applied, not one year after the close of an excited, a dreadful, and extensive civil war, but ten long years after the war has gone by, and the hearts and hands of the American people have come once more together—are proposed to be applied by him not even as a law, but under the simple, arbitrary fiat of the President of the United States. Said this court in considering the case of Milligan, who had been tried, who had been condemned and all but executed by a military commission in the State of Indiana:

> The controlling question in the case is this: Upon the facts stated in Milligan's petition and the exhibits filed, had the military commission mentioned power in its jurisdiction legally to try and sentence him? Milligan, not a resident of one of the rebellious States or a prisoner of war, but a citizen of Indiana for twenty years past, and never in the military or naval service, is, while at his home, arrested by the military power of the United States, imprisoned, and, on certain criminal charges preferred against him, tried, convicted, and sentenced to be hanged by a military commission organized under the direction of the military commander of the military district of Indiana. Had this tribunal the legal power and authority to try and punish this man?
> No graver question was ever considered by this court, nor one which more nearly concerns the rights of the whole people, for it is the birthright of every American citizen when charged with crime to be tried and punished according to law. The power of punishment is alone through the means which the laws have provided for that purpose; and if they are ineffectual, there is an immunity from punishment, no matter how great an offender the individual may be, or how much his crimes may have shocked the sense of justice of the country or endangered its safety. By the protection of the law human rights are secured; withdraw that protection, and they are at the mercy of wicked rulers or the clamor of an excited people. If there was law to justify this military trial, it is not our province to interfere; if there was not, it is our duty to declare the nullity of the whole proceedings. The decision of this question does not depend on argument or judicial precedents, numerous and highly illustrative as they are. These precedents inform us of the extent of the struggle to preserve liberty and to relieve those in civil life from military trials. The founders of our government were familiar with the history of that struggle, and secured in a written Constitution every right which the people had wrested from power during a contest of ages. By that Constitution and the laws authorized by it this question must be determined. The provisions of that instrument on the administration of criminal justice are too plain and direct to leave room for misconstruction or doubt of their true meaning. Those applicable to this case are found in that clause of the original Constitution which says "that the trial of all crimes, except in case of impeachment, shall be by jury;" and in the fourth, fifth, and sixth articles of the amendments. The fourth proclaims the right to be secure in person and effects against unreasonable search and seizure, and directs that a judicial warrant shall not issue "without proof of probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation." The fifth declares "that no person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime unless on presentment by a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces or in the militia when in actual service in time of war or public danger, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law."

The court proceed to recite the amendments, which I have read in full before, to secure the personal liberty of the citizen:

> These securities for personal liberty thus embodied were such as wisdom and experience have demonstrated to be necessary for the protection of those accused of crime. And so strong was the sense of the country of their importance, and so jealous were the people that these rights, highly prized, might be denied them by implication, that when the original Constitution was proposed for adoption it encountered severe opposition; and but for the belief that it would be so amended as to embrace them, it would never have been ratified.
> Time has proven the discernment of our ancestors; for even these provisions, expressed in such plain English words that it would seem the ingenuity of man could not evade them, are now, after the lapse of more than seventy years, sought to be avoided. Those great and good men foresaw that troublous times would arise, when rulers and people would become restive under restraint, and seek by sharp and decisive measures to accomplish ends deemed just and proper, and that the principles of constitutional liberty would be in peril, unless established by irrepealable law. The history of the world had taught them that what was done in the past might be attempted in the future.
> No doctrine involving more pernicious consequences was ever invented by the wit of man than that any of its provisions can be suspended during any of the great exigencies of government. Such a doctrine leads directly to anarchy or despotism; but the theory of necessity on which it is based is false; for the Government, within the Constitution, has all the powers granted to it which are necessary to preserve its existence, as has been happily proved by the result of the great effort to throw off its just authority.

On the following page—

> It is claimed that martial law covers with its broad mantle the proceedings of this military commission.

That is what this officer desires the President of the United States to proclaim, thinking that a proclamation by the President will be a carte blanche to him to steep his hands in the blood of his fellow-citizens in that city.

> It is claimed that martial law covers with its broad mantle the proceedings of this military commission. The proposition is this: That in a time of war the commander of an armed force, (if in his opinion the exigencies of the country demand it, and of which he is to judge,) has the power, within the lines of his military district, to suspend all civil rights and their remedies, and subject citizens as well as soldiers to the rule of his will; and in the exercise of his lawful authority cannot be restrained, except by his superior officer or the President of the United States.
> If this position is sound to the extent claimed, then, when war exists, foreign or domestic, and the country is subdivided into military departments for mere convenience, the commander of one of them can, if he chooses, within his limits, on the plea of necessity, with the approval of the Executive, substitute military force for and to the exclusion of the laws, and punish all persons as he thinks right and proper, without fixed or certain rules.
> The statement of this proposition shows its importance; for, if true, republican government is a failure, and there is an end of liberty regulated by law. (4 Wallace's Reports.)

I will not apologize for the length of the extract I have read, because these truths are of cardinal importance at this crisis of affairs, and, being gravely enunciated by this high tribunal, should have influence upon every man within this Chamber, as well as every citizen in the United States.

It was my duty three years ago, as a member of a committee of this body, to investigate the condition of affairs in the State of North Carolina, to spend with my associates two or three months in taking testimony, and then we submitted reports upon it. Unable to concur in the report of the majority, the minority, consisting of myself and one of the most gallant soldiers of the late war, (Senator F. P. Blair, of Missouri,) presented their views. At the time this minority report was made we closed it with a quotation from an eminent statesman, to which exception was taken under a misunderstanding by my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOTT,] and I remember his reading it as though under an idea that it was meant to be descriptive of himself in any degree. The proposition was abstract and most true, in regard to the effect upon men's character and nature of continued acts of violence and oppression. I read this extract from our former report, because its truth has been vindicated by what has since occurred, and is vindicated still more to-day by the example which this correspondence of a lieutenant-general of the Army and the War Department has afforded to us and to the American people. We there stated in regard to the case of North Carolina—

This is the truth in a nutshell; that Holden and his official supporters have failed to maintain themselves by any means, foul as well as fair, in their State. They have appealed to popular election, and have been rejected with something near unanimity by every tax-payer in the State; and now Congress is asked to step in and force North Carolina down again under the feet of her radical masters; and we fear that Congress will attempt to do this unwise and wicked thing. Will the people of the North (free as yet) see this thing done and sustain its promoters? We hope not; we pray not. When will the men now in power learn the truth of what the great statesman of the last century said so wisely and well, when similar attempts were made to govern British India?

"It is the nature of tyranny and rapacity never to learn moderation from the ill success of first oppressions. On the contrary, all men thinking highly of the methods dictated by their nature attribute the frustration of their desires to the want of sufficient rigor. Then they redouble the efforts of their impotent cruelty, which producing, as they must produce, new disappointments, they grow irritated against the objects of their rapacity; and their rage, fury, and malice (implacable because unprovoked) recruiting and re-enforcing their avarice, their vices are no longer human. From cruel men they are transformed into savage beasts, with no other vestiges of reason left but what serves to furnish the inventions and refinements of ferocious subtlety for purposes of which beasts are incapable and at which fiends would blush."

Sir, is it not true that the legislation of Congress was cruel and severe; and in what did it result, and what have we to-day in Louisiana? The Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] to-day has rather improved upon his well-known powers of denunciation in regard to those communities. There is even more often repeated the savage and relentless epithets of murder, and of blood, and of assassins with which he has sought to stain the names of those people. He has progressed and intensified it; and no such ruthless instrument has apparently yet responded as he who has responded last. General Sheridan is more cruel than those who have preceded him; he is more ruthless, and he holds out to his fellow-countrymen murderous threats which are disgraceful to the cloth he wears and to the country of which he is a citizen.

Mr. President, I desire to say to the people of this country and to the Senate that the proposition is now here presented for the first time that the President of the United States can, of his own motion and in his own discretion, adjudge the fact that such "domestic violence" at any time exists within a State as to authorize him, either by his powers as President or by power delegated to him by the governor of that State, to interfere in the organization of a State Legislature. This is the proposition. The power is as secure under the constitution of the State to the Legislature to judge of the qualifications, returns, and election of its own members as it is to either House of the Congress of the United States. One is as equally essential to the continuance of our form of government as the other. The Legislature of Louisiana have as much rightful power to pass upon the qualifications of members of this body or of the other House of Congress as have both these Houses of Congress to pass upon the qualifications of members of that Legislature. The same frame of words is used to secure the separate rights and powers of each. If one cannot protect itself by the respect due to established law, neither can the other. If lawless physical force shall be permitted to overthrow the rights of one, it can also overthrow the other. In either case it is a question of degree alone.

I do not embark upon any sea of defense of the southern people against these widespread vague calumnies. I only wish to bring the American people to consider this point: If you admit such a power as this to be exercised in the discretion of the President, then pursue it plainly to its ultimate and logical results. It is Louisiana to-day; it may be New York to-morrow; it may be Massachusetts the day following; it may be in the Congress of the United States on the 4th day of March next. Why did General Grant send his troops and exercise their lawless power within the Legislature of Louisiana by compelling members as old, as grave, as learned, as respectable as him who occupies the chair of the Senate to-day to leave their places? Pretense of "domestic violence" by five elderly and respectable gentlemen, unarmed, in the midst of Kellogg's myrmidons and a brigade of United States troops! It is a farce to say that those five men were creating "domestic violence" which authorized armed intervention by the President. Did the constitution of Louisiana give Kellogg a right to interfere in the organization of the Legislature? Just such as it gave to President Grant, and no more. Either was a lawless intruder, and nothing but the helplessness of the Legislature prevented them from lawfully imprisoning every officer and soldier who interfered with their proceedings. It was not the absence of right, but the sheer want of physical power to enforce it.

Mr. President, if the President can do this with two regiments of troops, then a single brigade will suffice to accomplish the same thing in this Capitol on the 4th of next March. There is no physical power in Congress successfully to resist such physical force. There are some seventy-four members in this body, and less than three hundred members of the other house. The same proportion of troops would be required, and a single brigade can take charge of this Capitol, shut off the entrance of the people, let in those whom they see fit, and give certificates to the Clerk of the present House of Representatives, who shall exclude all others. All that can be done, provided the physical power of the Congress of the United States is all that stands in the way. But, Mr. President, that is not all that stands in the way. The American people stand in the way, and so they should, and so I believe they will overwhelmingly, when they come to comprehend this case of Louisiana, freed from the clamor of partisans, stand in the way of this outrage upon the rights of a single State, in which you have but to change the name and you can apply the doctrine to every one of the remaining thirty-six.

We have had the question here before now as to whether, even when we come to pass upon election returns and qualifications of members of this body, we can undertake to determine the qualifications of the constituent bodies which elected them. It has always been denied; and yet here we have decided, even where the Constitution gives to each House of Congress the right to examine into those returns, that you must pause upon the threshold of a State Legislature and not venture to pursue your inquiry as to the election and qualifications of its members. The violation of principles, in my opinion, will always return to plague those who invented it; and I here to-day in my place most solemnly warn my countrymen against permitting such a precedent as this to escape without instant and most emphatic condemnation of the act, and of all who have been concerned in its perpetration.

The Supreme Court of the United States in 1870 delivered an opinion which led them to consider the relation of the States and the General Government, with a single dissent, and that a partial one, being rather to the application than to the doctrine enunciated. It will not fall with less weight upon the ear of the American people when I say that it was from the lips of the late Judge Nelson, of New York—clarum et venerabile nomen—that these views of the relations of State and Federal Government came.

The court say:

That the sovereign powers vested in the State governments by their respective constitutions remained unaltered and unimpaired, except so far as they were granted to the Government of the United States. That the intention of the framers of the Constitution in this respect might not be misunderstood, this rule of interpretation is expressly declared in the tenth article of the amendments, namely: "The powers not delegated to the United States are reserved to the States respectively or to the people." The Government of the United States, therefore, can claim no powers which are not granted to it by the Constitution, and the powers actually granted must be such as are expressly given or given by necessary implication.

The General Government and the States, although both exist within the same territorial limits, are separate and distinct sovereignties, acting separately and independently of each other within their respective spheres. The former in its appropriate sphere is supreme; but the States, within the limits of their powers not granted, or, in the language of the tenth amendment "reserved," are as independent of the General Government as that Government within its sphere is independent of the States.

* * * * * * *

Such being the separate and independent condition of the States in our complex system, as recognized by the Constitution, and the existence of which is so indispensable, that without them the General Government itself would disappear from the family of nations, it would seem to follow, as a reasonable, if not a necessary consequence, that the means and instrumentalities employed for carrying on the operations of their governments, for preserving their existence, and fulfilling the high and responsible duties assigned to them in the Constitution, should be left free and unimpaired, should not be liable to be crippled, much less defeated by the * * * power of another government, which power acknowledges no limits but the will of the legislative body. * * * * *

Without this power, and the exercise of it, we risk nothing in saying that no one of the States under the form of government guaranteed by the Constitution could long preserve its existence. A despotic government might. (11 Wallace's Report, 124-126.)

So, sir, we have here from the calm, serene height of judicial eminence such a description and history of the true relations of the States to the General Government that we can more clearly appreciate the utter ruin and confusion which would come from admitting the rightful attempt of such power as has been attempted by the President of the United States within the State of Louisiana. This interference at all, under the guise of "recognition," has proceeded to a most dangerous and threatening extent. In 1844, when this doctrine was first broached in the case of the State of Rhode Island, the power was there adjudged to be vested in the political branch of the Government, and not to the judicial, to decide as to the rightfulness of two governments claiming each to represent a State. A message was sent by the then President of the United States which, it strikes me, ought to avail much with those who desire to come at a clear and proper understanding of our present crisis.

I resist—

Said he—

the idea that it falls within the executive competency to decide in controversies of the nature of that which existed in Rhode Island, on which side is the majority of the people, or as to the extent of the rights of a mere numerical majority. For the Executive to assume such a power would be to assume a power of the most dangerous character. Under such assumptions the States of this Union would have no security for peace or tranquillity, but might be converted into the mere instruments of Executive will. Actuated by selfish purposes, he might become the great agitator, fomenting assaults upon the State constitutions, and declaring the majority of to-day to be the minority of to-morrow; and the minority, in its turn, the majority, before whose decrees the established order of things in the State should be subverted. Revolution, civil commotion, and bloodshed would be the inevitable consequences. The provision in the Constitution intended for the security of the States would thus be turned into the instrument of their destruction. The President would become in fact the great constitution maker for the States, and all power would be vested in his hands.—House Journal, First Session Twenty-eighth Congress, pages 765, 766.

This is a fair picture of what would necessarily be the result if such power is admitted to exist lawfully in the hands of the President as he and his subordinates have attempted to exercise in Louisiana.

Sir, it is now presented, feebly I admit, but presented I believe fairly by me to the judgment of this Senate and to the American people. They can answer now whether the qualifications of members who are to be summoned either to a State Legislature or to a Federal Legislature—for both are governed by the same language; the one found in the Federal Constitution, the other found in the constitutions of the States—shall be passed upon by the Executive. The power given in Louisiana to her Legislature to judge each house of the election, return, and qualification of its members is just as sacred, just as clearly given as that which enables the members of this body or the other House of Congress to judge of the qualifications of its membership. If language, if clear constitutional law and provisions cannot have the effect to protect one, then they will not have the effect to protect the other, and it seems to me to be a mere feeling of the popular pulse on this subject to see how far this attempt of power can be extended without resistance. If it shall be accepted, if my fellow-countrymen shall forget what constitutes liberty and the vigilance necessary to protect that which was gained by so much toil and suffering by their ancestors, and if they shall disregard it in respect of a portion of their fellow-countrymen and one of the members of this Union of States, then depend upon it they will shortly be called upon to meet it on a broader scale, protected by no other right than the nominal sacredness of law as superior to official will.

I said, sir, that I was glad that this last act in Louisiana was but a barefaced exercise of brute force, unaccompanied by any veil or cover of false decision by corrupt courts. I believe that, in what I must think the utterly disingenuous statement of the President in 1872 that he meant simply to obey the orders of the courts, there was the suggestion that he was acting in subordination of the military to the civil power, that he was bowing his head, backed by the Army and Navy, before the decree of some feeble but just-minded magistrate; and there was in that something that recommended his action to that portion of the American people who would not or who could not comprehend the real history of his action. But that poor veil is now fortunately thrown aside. All men agree that Durell's action in 1872 was fraudulent and absolutely void. He himself has resigned, hoping to escape trial, thus confessing his guilt in open court; and no man in this body, however heated by partisanship, has ventured to say that there was justification of law for the orders of Judge Durell by which a Legislature in 1873 was dispossessed of its rightful power, a State-house seized and garrisoned with United States troops, a defeated minority placed in legislative power, and the usurper, Kellogg, tossed into the governor's chair and kept there by the armed forces of the United States.

But now there is no Durell, there are no alleged "orders of a court" to be respected, there is no pretense of bowing the power of the military before the civil law; but it is the mailed hand of the soldier that stands to-day the sole emblem of power in the State of Louisiana, plainly, unmistakably. I do not propose to go over the tangled story of falsehood, fraud, and wrong which marked the Louisiana case from 1872 to this day; but to-day my countrymen cannot doubt, for "he that runs may read" the history of what is to-day, and of what I fear, if it is not checked, it will be from this time on.

Sir, this story of Louisiana and her wrongs is as old as the story of the human heart. If men are not comfortable and are not happy, they will be turbulent and they will be discontented. And what people, I ask, ever were happy under the rule of strangers and of aliens? It need not be that the stranger or the alien is necessarily corrupt, wicked, or unjust. Grant even that he were not; he is not their choice; he is not of their kith and their kin; he has not that blood which is thicker than water, and which we all feel binds us to those among whom we were born and have lived; a feeling that causes even the quiet earth itself to seem sweeter if it is our birth-place, and is implanted in our very instincts. And are human laws to be made without reference to human instincts? Are you to eviscerate from the men, women, and children you propose to govern their natures and those habits which have become nature? And if you do, can you expect the natural effects not to follow? You disregard their happiness. Can they consider yours? If you render them unhappy and insecure in regard to themselves and to their affairs, will they care to promote your happiness and your security? But no, sir; the rule is a plain and clear one; and would to God this Congress for an instant would listen to the common dictate of humanity and respond to it. Give these people a government they can love; let men rule over them whom they can respect; but do not give them these shams of free government, and not expect the results of tyranny to flow and form it. It will not work, gentlemen. The machinery of this country's government was not intended for a despotism, and you cannot reach its results without radically changing that machinery, and at last in Louisiana it has been openly sought to be radically changed.

Where the people of the Southern States have been permitted to elect their own rulers and make laws which produce content, peace and quiet have followed, and this you all know, because there is not a man in this body or out of it who cannot with perfect safety and welcome go to any part of the Southern States, if he only goes there as a friend and well-wisher of the people; and if he be not, why should he go there? No, sir; turbulence and unhappiness are inseparable companions in human breasts, and peace and pleasantness are associated and have been for all time. Give these people content, treat them with justice, and you shall have the fruit of such treatment, peace and good order and strength and happiness for our entire country. Disregard these plain results, and the fruits will be borne that have been borne so plentifully, and which now are sought to be stopped only by a perpetuation and intensification of the very methods that have produced them.

Mr. President, I have not forgotten that this is the anniversary of a day of glory to the American arms, and the illustration of that glory and valor was in this same city of New Orleans. We all were proud of it; not in Louisiana more than Delaware—it was generally celebrated in every State; and to-day patriotic associations are meeting to keep alive the memories of the glory of our common country.

Mr. President, shall the glory of 1815 be altogether clouded and dimmed by the shame of 1875? Shall it be that those brave men who, against greatly disproportionate odds, defended the city of New Orleans against superior numbers of a foreign foe—shall those men have fought in vain? Shall the glory of New Orleans and the fact that she was the scene of honor to American arms be now clouded by being the scene of disgrace to the American arms? Sir, I trust not. I hope not. Ambition, misjudgment, and ignorance of civil rule, high partisan feeling, all may have combined to carry the executive branch of this Government and his soldiers thus far; but I believe that when his action is understood the American people will give him a command which he shall hear and obey, and that he shall be forced to recede from the position he has taken, and to take his armed hand from the throat of that prostrate people, and let her people once more know, in the language of the bill of rights of the State of Massachusetts, that they live under "a government of laws and not of men."

Mr. SCHURZ. I desired to take part in this debate to-day, but I am prevented from doing so by a very severe headache which may not only disable me from speaking but oblige me to leave the Hall soon. Of course I do not want to obstruct the passage of this resolution, which I consider a necessary one, but I would ask permission to offer another one, merely to have it laid upon the table and printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution of the Senator from Missouri will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire what legislation by Congress is necessary to secure to the people of the State of Louisiana their rights of self-government under the Constitution, and to report with the least possible delay by bill or otherwise.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Let us pass that at once.

Mr. SCHURZ. I do not want to have it acted on now. I understand there is a disposition to pass the resolution of inquiry to-day and then adjourn over until Monday. While I was anxious to speak in this debate, I will not obstruct that, because I think it very proper that the resolution of inquiry should be passed very soon; but I give notice that on Monday next at the expiration of the morning hour I shall take occasion to call up this resolution of mine for action and ask the kind permission of the Senate to make some remarks upon it.

MASSACRE AT TRENTON, TENNESSEE.

Mr. CLAYTON. I ask the consent of the Senate to introduce a resolution for which I would ask present consideration:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to furnish the Senate with a copy of the report of the United States district attorney for the district of West Tennessee relating to the late massacre at Trenton in the State of Tennessee.

Mr. COOPER. I have no objection to the resolution being offered if it be subject to amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas ask for the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes, sir.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It requires unanimous consent. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the resolution is before the Senate.

Mr. COOPER. I wish to amend the resolution by inserting "together with all information in his department relating to the arrest and trial of the alleged offenders in said transaction by the Federal court in and for West Tennessee, or the State courts of said State; and also all correspondence which may have occurred between the executive department of the State of Tennessee and the General Government, upon the same subject."

Mr. CLAYTON. I accept that amendment.

Mr. COOPER. With that amendment, I have no objection to the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be so modified. The question is on the resolution as modified.

The resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, communicating, in obedience to law, a statement exhibiting the expenditures of the Springfield Armory and its operations during the year ending June 30, 1874; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution authorizing the Congressional Printer to print the report of Major Powell's expedition in quarto form; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

USE OF THE ARMY IN LOUISIANA.

Mr. CLAYTON. I will trespass upon the Senate a moment longer, if I can have permission. I ask unanimous consent to take up for consideration the resolution offered by myself on the 23d of December. I think it will lead to no objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is a question before the Senate on the resolution of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] to which an amendment is pending proposed by the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING.]

Mr. CLAYTON. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate to allow this business to be temporarily laid aside for the purpose of taking up that resolution.

Mr. THURMAN. I object.

Mr. CLAYTON. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution of the Senator from Ohio is before the Senate, and the question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York.

Mr. THURMAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WRIGHT, (when his name was called.) Upon this question I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON.] If he were present he would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 32, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Boreman, Boutwell, Cameron, Clayton, Conkling, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton of Texas, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Logan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Sargent, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Wadleigh, West, and Windom—32.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Johnston, Kelly, McCreery, Merrimon, Ransom, Saulsbury, Schurz, Stevenson, Thurman, and Tipton—21.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Brownlow, Buckingham, Carpenter, Chandler, Conover, Cragin, Gilbert, Hamlin, Jones, Lewis, Norwood, Ramsey, Robertson, Sprague, Stewart, Stockton, Washburn, and Wright—20.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the resolution as amended.

Mr. MORTON. I thought I had an amendment pending which I offered as an addition to the resolution.

Mr. THURMAN. If there is any Senator who desires to speak on this resolution now——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana presents an amendment. Will the Senator from Ohio yield that it may be read?

The CHIEF CLERK. The proposed amendment is at the end of the resolution to insert the following words:

And whether he has any information in regard to the existence of armed organizations in the State of Louisiana hostile to the government of the State and intent on overturning such government by force.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON.]

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, if there is any Senator who desires to address the Senate on this resolution or on the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana, I shall be very glad to hear him. According to the usage of the Senate and parliamentary usage, I believe I am entitled to close the debate on this resolution; but I am too unwell to do so to-day.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I had proposed, Mr. President, to speak very briefly on this subject; I had not supposed the debate would come to so speedy a determination. I will proceed now or let the subject pass over, which will be quite as agreeable to me.

Mr. THURMAN. I shall be very glad to hear the Senator from New Jersey at any time when it shall be convenient for him to proceed. I rose to move, in case no other Senator was ready to occupy the floor, that the further consideration of the resolution be postponed until one o'clock on Monday; but if the Senator from New Jersey is prepared to go on I shall be very happy to hear him, and no doubt we all shall be.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator make a motion?

Mr. THURMAN. I will be governed by the wishes of the Senator from New Jersey as to that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Touching what the Senator from Ohio has said, while I have no present purpose whatever to speak upon this resolution, I should not wish to have him understand that I engage to be silent after he shall have spoken, because it might happen that he would say something which would justify and require a reply from somebody; I do not mean necessarily from me. I should not want to have any understanding by which everybody's mouth shall be positively sealed after the Senator from Ohio shall have made his speech, and for one I must disclaim any such engagement.

Mr. THURMAN. I only ask for what is the usage of the Senate, and what is parliamentary law, or at least parliamentary usage, that the mover of a resolution may close the debate upon it. Nevertheless I do not say that he has any right to cut off anybody else; and, if after the remarks I may submit the Senator from Vermont shall feel that he ought to say anything, I shall listen to him with the greatest pleasure.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I can assure the Senator that I have no purpose of that kind. I only say that for general fairness on questions of this kind I do not know a usage which absolutely binds gentlemen to remain silent after a speech shall have been made, except where it is agreed by unanimous consent that a vote shall be taken at a certain hour.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not, either, know of a usage that stops the mouth or puts a gag into the mouth of any Senator. The common usage is that the mover of a resolution may close the debate upon it, and I suppose that if I submit the few remarks which I shall submit—I do not think they will be very long—if any one thinks that he ought to speak further on the question he will have a perfect right to do so, and then parliamentary usage will allow me to close the debate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You will have a chance for a reply, of course.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to be governed entirely now by the wishes of the Senator from New Jersey. If he prefers it, I will move that the further consideration of the resolution be postponed until Monday, and he can have the floor at one o'clock on that day.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That would be agreeable to me.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio moves that the further consideration of the resolution be postponed until Monday, at one o'clock.

Mr. MORTON. I hope not.

Mr. MERRIMON. Before the motion is put, I ask leave to offer an amendment to the amendment, to be printed with it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be received.

Mr. SARGENT. I also desire to offer an amendment to the original resolution, to be called up at the appropriate time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Notice can be given of the amendment.

Mr. SARGENT. I give notice of the amendment now, that it may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is moved to postpone the consideration of the resolution to Monday next, at one o'clock.

Mr. CONKLING. May I inquire of the Chair who made this motion?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CAMERON. The motion was made by the Senator from Ohio, I think, for the purpose of giving time to the Senator from New Jersey. It is now late on Friday afternoon, and I think the motion should be adopted.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I simply wish to say that I hope the Senate will not put itself to any inconvenience or lose any time on my account, for I can proceed now or I can waive speaking altogether, and let the Senate take a vote on the question.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg to say that if any matter of courtesy or convenience to the Senator from New Jersey enters into this motion, I have been thus far proceeding under a misapprehension. I understood that this resolution having been offered some days ago, every republican in this Chamber, as I believe, standing ready then and ever since to vote for its passage, the mover of the resolution has moved to postpone it not only for to-day, but for to-morrow and until Monday at one o'clock. Unless the convenience personally of some Senator requires that, I see no reason why it should be done, and I would like an opportunity to record myself against that motion, inasmuch as I want this information for the Senate and for the country, did want it when the resolution was offered, have wanted it ever since, and think it desirable, whenever the time shall come when in the opinion of Senators an appropriate discussion has been had, that the resolution should go in order that it may be answered. Now, why we should postpone it over to-morrow and until Monday and during the residue of this day, unless some Senator has a convenience of his own which courtesy would regard, I know not. If there be such a convenience, of course it might supersede the considerations which would otherwise control.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator from New York surely could not have heard what I said before.

Mr. CONKLING. I did not.

Mr. THURMAN. I said that I wished the resolution postponed until Monday, because I am too unwell to speak in the close of the debate to-day. I am as anxious for the speedy passage of the resolution as the Senator is or as any one can be. If I had not been anxious for the information, I should not have introduced the resolution. But, as I have said before, I believe I am entitled to speak upon this resolution in the close of the debate, but I am too unwell to do so now with any justice to myself or the subject, and therefore I suggested that it be laid over until Monday, unless the Senator from New Jersey was prepared to go on to-day. He preferred that it be laid over until Monday, and therefore I made the motion. Now, in respect to to-morrow, the Senator from New York knows that it is desirable that there should be some committee work done to-morrow, which can only be done in case the Senate adjourns over until Monday.

Those were my sole reasons for the motion. If the Senate see fit to force a vote on the resolution to-day, all I can say is that I may have, in the state of my health, to forego the privilege that I would wish to exercise of addressing the Senate upon it.

Mr. CONKLING. I did not hear the observation made by the Senator from Ohio which he has just repeated. I did hear him insist, more or less strenuously, upon his right to do what he denominates as closing the debate. Although I have at present no intention to interfere with the exercise of such a right, or rather such a privilege, I wish for one to disclaim any such understanding of the rule of parliamentary law and propriety, and to say to the honorable Senator from Ohio that if, on the conclusion of the remarks which he shall term "closing the debate," I should feel moved to make any observations upon this resolution, I should feel quite as free to do it at that time as at any preceding moment.

Turning from that, this proceeding thus far has seemed to me a very anomalous one. A resolution is offered in the nature of a call for information; and pending that resolution, nothing else having occurred except a motion for a formal amendment, many Senators have proceeded to discuss in their ultimate effect and relations the supposed facts. I have listened to-day, for example, to the honorable Senator from Delaware making remarks based as I believe upon understandings and assumptions unfounded and unjust, based as I believe upon an understanding of facts which, shall we be permitted to live until this resolution is answered, that Senator will himself say was erroneous. This is my opinion; but I will say I know nothing about it, because the resolution has not been answered, and no opportunity has been afforded to answer the resolution.

The honorable Senator from Delaware, as I see he is attracted to what I am saying, may wish to know somewhat further the occasion of my making these remarks. I understand him to have leveled many of his observations at General Sheridan, apparently upon the theory that General Sheridan was in command when the particular transaction took place of which he has complained. I have no such understanding. On the contrary, my information is that General Sheridan was not in command, had not assumed command, was not even a spectator, was not an actor, was not in any way responsible for the occurrence against which most loudly the honorable Senator has declaimed. He may know more about it than I do; we are both speaking prematurely and both speaking in the dark in that regard. So the honorable Senator observed that the President of the United States was, if I may use a legal phrase for brevity, constructively present; that he had some privity with, some knowledge of, that he he was in some way an actor in, this transaction, so that it was justly chargeable, be it for good or for evil, upon him. Now, my information is that the President of the United States had no knowledge whatever of this occurrence, except as we all had it, when the telegraph brought as matter of history—not as matter of prophecy, but as matter of statement after the event—tidings of it.

I could illustrate further, if it were well to do so, what seems to me the anomaly of this proceeding—calling for information and then, upon conjecture of a version of the facts, proceeding day after day to debate and to assign to all the supposed actors in this complicated transaction the measure of glory or of guilt due to them. But now, added to the somewhat peculiar mode, as it seems to me, of proceeding to which I advert, the Senator from Ohio at once says that he wishes to close the debate, and that he proposes to postpone the further debate until Monday at one o'clock. If other Senators wish to participate, as I judge they do, unless they have a wish that a postponement shall take place till Monday, the honorable Senator will see that I in no respect allude to his convenience when I say I think the time should be occupied. If on the contrary no other Senator is to speak or no other Senator is ready to speak, and the Senator from Ohio says that he wishes to speak and is unable to proceed to-day and unable to proceed before Monday, then I admit that we should accost the Senator upon a point of courtesy toward him, and I should be among the last, except on a matter of very grave public consideration, to interpose anything on that head. But it seems to me that if we are to have this resolution, or rather the information which the resolution seeks, debated, and debated at length, and debated to the injury and aspersion not only of citizens but of public officers, we had better make haste as far as we are ready thus to proceed, to the end that we may bring nearer to us the time when we shall be able to correct our preconceived impressions.

I have no information about this matter superior to that of any other Senator; very likely I shall find myself with greater occasion to correct my own understanding than any other member of the body; but now we are all in the dark, and if discussion is to go on in advance of an answer, I submit that that discussion should proceed and that no postponement should take place unless the health or the convenience—something at least as weighty as that—of some Senators stands in the way. If the Senator from Ohio is going to reserve himself until the end of the debate and other Senators are ready to go on to-day or to go on to-morrow, why should they not go on?

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator allow me a word?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly.

Mr. THURMAN. I said distinctly that if any other Senators were ready to proceed and desired to do so, I would not make any motion to postpone but would listen to them with great pleasure and hoped they would proceed, and I only made the motion upon the hypothesis that no other Senator was ready to proceed now; and then I submitted to the Senator from New Jersey, who had indicated his purpose to speak, that I would make the motion or refrain from making it according to his own wishes. He intimated that it would be agreeable to him that the further discussion should be postponed until Monday at one o'clock, and then I made the motion. But I do not want to insist on the motion if there is any Senator prepared to speak now. I would a great deal rather that the debate should go on to-day and to-morrow if necessary.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator whether he himself feels able to speak to-day?

Mr. THURMAN. I do not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If he wishes to speak now, but is ill and unable to go on, I should be, for his accommodation, disposed to accede to his wishes.

Mr. THURMAN. I would rather close the debate at once, or say what I have to say to-day, than Monday, if I were able to go on.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator has no reason to suppose he will not be able to speak to-morrow?

Mr. THURMAN. I do not know how that will be; I cannot tell. But there may be others who wish to speak besides myself.

Mr. TIPTON. Mr. President, I desire to see this subject postponed until next Monday, and the discussion consequently arrested for the present. I desire it in order that we may hear from the people whom we boastingly say that we represent. They are now being educated in regard to law and constitution. The duty of the citizen, the privileges and the prerogative of the State, and the proper jurisdiction of the United States, are all questions now passing before them. They have never known as much upon these important questions to American citizens as they know at this individual hour. They will know more by next Monday at one o'clock. I wish to hear from the people and be instructed by the people; and I have been very much gratified in the instruction that I have already received from the principal commercial centers of the country. I have been gratified that the Times, the representative of republicanism in the city of New York, unites with the Tribune and with the World and the Post in one denunciation of what I think to be a terrible military usurpation in my country domineering to-day over the State of Louisiana. Therefore I desire to hear from our common constituency from other points, and I am willing to hear from them from all points. Before this question goes to a final vote, I wish to stand up here and say one word in regard to an humble constituency that is not able to-day to cope with the arms of the United States. If any of you represent States that can turn out a military that can protect the rights of the people against the Army of the United States, perhaps it is a matter of indifference to you how soon this question comes to a determination in this body. But I represent a frontier State; a State weak in population; a State which has had a terrible visitation of the grasshoppers the last year; and therefore in God's name do not let them be visited now with that other worse curse, the unlimited and unlicensed Army of the United States; and I will claim the privilege, in behalf of that constituency, of raising my voice before this discussion comes to a close. I wish, therefore, to vote for the postponement until Monday.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I would be the last person in the Senate to deny to my colleague a courtesy, or to deny to any member of this body the courtesy of speaking at a time most favorable to him; but the circumstances that engage us now are peculiar. The question under debate is a resolution that every member of the Senate will vote for. There never has been, from the beginning of this discussion to the present hour, a doubt about the passage of the resolution. The only question that has been before us in a parliamentary way during this whole discussion is whether we will address our message to the President in the usual form of courtesy instead of in the abrupt form of a demand or peremptory request. It has now been decided by the Senate that the ordinary form shall be adopted in addressing the President of the United States in a call for information. The resolution of my colleague will be adopted without objection.

Why postpone the matter? Is the Louisiana question now under debate? Are we now debating whether the military were authorized to intervene in the organization of the Legislature of Louisiana? Are we called upon to debate whether Governor Kellogg is governor, or somebody else? Not at all. The only question is whether we shall call upon the President of the United States for information, and upon that the whole Senate is agreed. Now, I for one will never vote to postpone that question a single hour. If my colleague had desired this information in the usual form from the President of the United States, he could have had it at any moment; but what was the extraordinary spectacle presented on the very day my colleague offered this resolution? Not a single objection was made, not a single moment's delay was demanded, because every member of the Senate felt that the circumstances were so imperative, the circumstances were so peculiar, that it was our duty to call on the President of the United States for this information, and the resolution would have been adopted unanimously; and if the resolution had been in the usual form, in the form in which we have almost uniformly approached the President of the United States, in the form of courtesy due to the head of a co-ordinate department from another department of the Government, there would not have been a moment's delay, and long before this time the information would have been upon our tables, and we should have known the precise facts upon which we were called to decide. Probably had it not been for this inexcusable debate and delay, the Senate of the United States might by this time, in their organized capacity, have decided this question, and have determined what ought to be done in view of the peculiar circumstances in Louisiana.

Now, sir, to continue a debate of this kind to excite the public mind, to call for the indignation of any class of our people, it seems to me, is not only premature but it is cruel, cruel to the interests of the whole people of the United States. Sir, there is wisdom enough in this body to deal with this question. When we have the facts before us and know precisely to what extent the military has gone, precisely to what extent any officer of the United States has gone, this Senate and this Congress will be able to deal with it in a spirit of enlightened wisdom. There never has been a more causeless debate, a more causeless excitement, than has been created by a resolution that would have been adopted at any moment when the mover of the resolution would allow us to take a vote upon it. It has seemed to me, from the beginning to this moment, that all this discussion is injurious to the public peace and to the public interests, whether we regard it in a partisan light or in a patriotic light. On a mere formal resolution of this kind, a discussion of matters affecting the conduct of high officers of the Government, affecting the peace and dignity of the whole nation, is premature, and it ought to be put a stop to at once; and I therefore am prepared to vote at any time on this resolution and against all postponements of it.

If my colleague desires to address the Senate upon this question, he can do it any day or any hour that he chooses. He may at any time introduce a resolution, or call up a pending resolution at any moment and make his speech on Louisiana, and denounce, as he has a right to do, the officers of the Government. But, sir, I appeal for justice to the Senate of the United States; I appeal for common justice, due to the meanest person accused of crime, that you should not make an arraignment against these officers until you have the facts that you propose to call for. Let those facts come here; and I say to you, and I say to the people of the United States, if my voice is heard by them, that this Senate is prepared to deal with this case in the spirit of law and of liberty. If any officer has done wrong, we are prepared to rectify it and make the proper correction. But I appeal to justice, to the sense of fair play, of common honor among men, that, until we have the facts before us, these officers should not be arraigned until we can measure the extent of any fault they have committed, and deal out the proper punishment.

Sir, let this resolution be passed; let it be passed to-day. I trust in God that no man who professes faith in the party to which I have the honor to belong will hesitate for a moment, or has hesitated from the beginning, to vote for this resolution. Call out every fact, and then like Senators let us take up the facts upon some affirmative proposition presented by my colleague, or any one else, and let us deal with the facts as law, and justice, and the Constitution of our country, and our oaths, demand.

But I again say that this discussion is premature. While I will yield to my colleague anything for courtesy, I do not think we are called upon to yield any further delay in this matter. Let us have this information, and then on Monday next, if my colleague chooses, whether the information is then communicated to us or not—and I have no doubt it will be communicated by Monday morning—my colleague may call up any other resolution, new or old, and he may discuss the whole question and give us the light of his great experience and his superior wisdom, and I will listen to him with pleasure. But I appeal to the Senate now to arrest a debate which has as yet no foundation except the published statements in the newspapers, with some of the most material facts at issue in the controversy excluded and doubted, and which we cannot settle until we have the full information before us. I want to vote for this resolution, and I would have voted for it the very moment my colleague offered it, but I thought with the majority of the Senate that the request ought to be made in the usual courteous language prescribed by custom when a request is presented to the President of the United States, and that we ought not to assume guilt on his part, or on the part of any other officer of the Government, by sending a peremptory request, departing from our own accustomed usages and forms. When this information comes in then we shall have to deal with the Louisiana question, and I am prepared to sit here and hear it debated as long as is necessary; but until then, it seems to me my colleague having already secured, as he no doubt knows, the unanimous vote of the Senate in favor of the resolution, why discuss a question that is no longer pending before us, and that is not a question in dispute? When we have the facts, we can then meet him or not as the facts will justify us.

Sir, this is the only reason why I would resist even for a moment the postponement of a resolution about which there is no courtesy, or deny my colleague a request made on his statement that he is not in very good health. I say now—and I have no doubt every member of the Senate will agree to it—that if my colleague desires on Monday morning, when we shall probably have this information before us, to speak on the Louisiana question in any phases that it may be presented, I have no question that opportunity will be given him by the unanimous and cordial assent of every member of the Senate.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, I hope it will suit the convenience of the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] to allow this resolution now to be voted upon. I desire to hear him; I am sure the Senate desire to hear him, and more, the country at large desires to hear him. It is his right to close the debate, but I suggest to him that that same right will pertain to him when this information comes in. It is the information that the country wants. It is the information that we want. I desire to speak, but not on this resolution, and I concur most cordially in a good deal that has fallen from the Senator from Ohio before me, Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, this is a question above any party, unless there be a party of monarchists in this country. It is a question which addresses itself to the heart of every Senator and of every American freeman throughout the length and breadth of this land. I do not desire to do injustice to the President of the United States or to any official in Louisiana. I desire to speak, and I hope to speak when I get this information.

I cannot concur, though, in one single remark that the honorable Senator from Ohio before me [Mr. SHERMAN] uttered when he said that no debate should have been precipitated upon the introduction of the resolution. Sir, in the whole history of this nation I venture to say no such official dispatches have been flashed upon the country as in the last two weeks. I do not say what the justification was, but I say now in advance (and I hope the sentiment that I utter will find no rebuke in any heart in this Chamber) that no state of case can authorize an officer of the Federal Army to recommend to the President of the United States, after having proclaimed the citizens of Louisiana "banditti," to deprive them of the guarantees of the Constitution and to try them by drum-head court-martial and authorize him to arrest them and try them; and make that public recommendation to the President of the United States! I ask Senators on both sides of the Chamber what state of fact will authorize it? I shall not now say one word against it; I only say it astounded me, and it must have astounded everybody, and I only want the information upon which so extraordinary a recommendation rested. I have no party feeling in the matter. I hope my honorable friend from Ohio by my side [Mr. THURMAN] will let this resolution pass now so that we may have the information, and then when it comes in I propose to offer what I shall have to say, dictated entirely by the character of the information which shall be laid before the Senate.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, the gravity of the questions which are very likely to follow the information we are now seeking should of itself prevent everything like heat or passion in the approach to that discussion. I have purposely refrained from saying one word in this debate, often as I have been tempted to do so, for the reason that I am unwilling to trust myself in the discussion of this question until we get the authentic information upon which we may speak and characterize these proceedings as we shall find the truth requires us to do so. If there were nothing else to admonish us as to the propriety of making haste slowly in this business, this day itself ought to admonish us. It will be remembered that the Congress of the United States, after a long and animated and learned discussion, reversed even the action of a judicial tribunal in the city of New Orleans in the year 1815, condemning what a military chieftain did in that city in what he believed to be his duty to the country. Just sixty years ago, Mr. President, a man clothed with the responsibility of the command of armies, deemed it his duty not simply to suspend the writ of habeas corpus, but he sent for the judge that issued it and kept him where he could not issue any more. This action interfered with the liberty of the press and the liberty of speech, if I recollect aright, and a judge sitting in solemn judgment fined him $1,000 for doing that which he believed to be the discharge of his duty. We might have condemned him if we had been sitting here in 1815, acting upon telegraphic dispatches from New Orleans, if there had been a telegraph then to send them; and I hope to-day the American Congress, and especially the American Senate, will not be driven by any heat of partisan debate into any action of which we may be ashamed hereafter.

I want this information. I want to know whether it was by authority of his superior that the second in command in New Orleans went into that Legislature. I want to know whether it was by authority of the Commander-in-Chief that the principal in command sent the second in command into that Legislature; whether it was at the request of the presiding officer or of the governor of the State. I want to know that; and, as I have said, I have been unwilling to interpose one word between this minute and the time when we can get that information, much as I have been tempted upon several occasions to do it.

Now, can we not act upon the suggestion which has been made, pass this resolution at once, and if debate is necessary, if the education of the public is necessary, if it is necessary to discuss the Louisiana question, here is a resolution introduced by the Senator from Indiana a few days ago. The Senator from Ohio or the Senator from Delaware can introduce any resolution which will bring up the same question; and if the life of the Republic is in danger for want of debate, let us pass this resolution and get this information, and let the debate go on upon anything at all.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, it is a matter of entire indifference to me, so far as my personal feelings are concerned, whether I say one word on this resolution. If I know myself, I never have occupied the time of the Senate for any purpose of personal ambition, to be admired or applauded for what I might say. I have spoken and spoken frequently, and, as I think the Senate will bear me witness, spoken always directly to the point under consideration.

and, as I know, with an earnest and sincere desire to be of some service to the Senate, however humble in its consideration, of whatever subject might be under discussion. I had thought that there was some obligation, if only of self-respect, resting on me that would make it proper for me, before the close of the debate, to explain my views on this resolution, which I have not yet done. It may be that what a Senator considers due to his own character, what he considers due to the usage of the Senate, what he considers due to parliamentary law, ought not to have any effect whatsoever in a case like this. That may be so; I do not say whether it is or not. I have no desire to thrust my wishes upon an unwilling Senate, or to ask an unwilling Senate to grant me any favor whatsoever; but I have this to say, that my colleague was never more mistaken in his life than when he says that this whole debate has been premature. I am not responsible for the debate. I offered the resolution; I said not a word upon it when I offered it; I spoke not a word until others had spoken. It was not until two elaborate speeches had been made that I said anything that could be called a speech. I had merely made a few observations, a mere paragraph not as long as your finger; certainly it was not a speech. I am not responsible, therefore, for this debate; but I do say here that never was there a debate more properly timed, or more appropriate, or more called for than that debate which has taken place. I say to my colleague that the Federal Army cannot enter the halls of a State Legislature and assume, whether of its own motion or at the dictation of any man, be he governor of a State or President of the United States, to determine who are members of that body, without debate being proper on that fact, and at the speediest moment possible. And who is there to deny that that has taken place? I say that such a telegram as Philip Sheridan has sent, proposing that the President of the United States shall proclaim citizens of the United States to be banditti and then leave them to be dealt with by him, cannot be debated too soon in the Senate of the United States. And therefore let me say to my colleague that whenever an occurrence of this kind shall take place in this Republic, so long as even the name of freedom is respected in this land, so long debate will take place, and that at the earliest moment.

But, Mr. President, enough of this. I wanted to speak on this resolution, to speak on it with judicial calmness, as much as I can be calm on such a subject, for it is a subject to make a man's blood run fast; it is a subject to make the nerves thrill in the body of any man who ever loved liberty or had the least idea of constitutional law. I had a desire to speak upon it, and to speak upon it with as much calmness as possible; but there is an unwilling Senate to hear me, and I ask leave to withdraw my motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion to postpone is withdrawn; and the question now is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON.] The Secretary will read the proposed amendment to the amendment.

The Secretary read the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, I had thought it was so necessary that this information should be furnished to the Senate at the earliest possible day and go forth to the country, that up to this moment I have not said a word in this debate, and I do not propose now to detain the Senate for any length of time in discussing this matter. But it seems to me that there are some solecisms in this debate, and that consistency should be worth something. I commend this fact, which is as clearly apparent from the dispatches we have received from Louisiana as any other which has come by telegraph, that the very first intervention of the armed forces of the United States in the affairs of the Legislature of Louisiana was invited by a committee appointed by Wiltz, the usurping democratic chairman of the house of that body—a usurper in defiance of all law, and of the laws of Louisiana especially; and that after that force had been employed to override the republican members, and to control their movements, even their right of exit from the hall, a vote of thanks was passed by this democratic body—the remainder, or "rump," of the body which had assembled there. Yet is this not ignored by our democratic friends? Is it not ignored by those men who for the sake of being conspicuous in the public eye, or to get on a wave of popular opinion, or to fish in troubled waters, or for party capital, or for any other motive, are parading at public meetings in different parts of the country to shout about military interference, and to decry the President for the employment of military force? This democratic precedent, just fifteen minutes antedating the military interference so much decried, is, in the exigency of partisanship, entirely ignored. Is it not worth consideration on both sides of this Chamber? If it was wrong for the United States troops to expel men who had no right there, I ask if it was not more wrong for those troops to be invoked to override and control men who undoubtedly had a right there—that is, the whole republican portion of that assembly? Democratic Senators are eager to know if the President approves of the military being used to expel men who had no right there by the laws of the State. I desire to know if they approve of the military interference procured by their partisans whose conduct in seizing the Legislature by revolutionary proceedings they sanction? If armed soldiers intruded into a legislative body are an object of horror, where is the condemnation of it by our friends when democrats obtrude them there and thank them for coming?

There is criticism further made upon the expression of a military man. A man of illustrious service upon the fields of his country, and a man ordinarily of good judgment, happens to use the word "outlaws" or "banditti," applying to men who have covered the South with blood, who have ruthlessly shot down men by scores and hundreds, who have murdered men at their homes, called them to their doors at night and shot them fresh from their beds, who have burned their school-houses and their churches, who have committed outrages of every kind for the very purpose of compelling a large portion of the defenseless people of the South—unfortunately for themselves black or republican—to follow the lead of a certain political party. I call especial attention to one of these occurrences, which perhaps was in the mind of General Sheridan when he used the word "banditti," which men can sit here coolly and criticise. I take the case of Coushatta, to which I referred by a question the other day, and of which the Senator who was then speaking simply remarked, "I do not know anything about that case." We all know about that case, or certainly all except him.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SARGENT. Certainly.

Mr. THURMAN. Suppose the facts to be as gross as the Senator assumes them to be, suppose them to be a thousand times worse than the Senator supposes them to be, does he say that under the Constitution of the United States the citizens alleged to be guilty could be tried by military commission?

Mr. SARGENT. If the Senator will allow me I will come to that. I say look as a simple specimen illustration in a series of democratic tactics, having for their purpose the securing of a majority in the next electoral college, as a party electioneering measure—to the affair of Coushatta, where there were men, white men, men of business there, men I understand starting manufactories there, who had redeemed the place from a wilderness—for before they went there it was nearly uninhabited—settling there with their families, who for the want of anybody to fill the offices took certain parish offices to fill them. A demand was made on them to resign. To this they demurred. Finally threats were made that if they did not resign and leave the State they would be murdered. They consented under those threats to leave the State if they could have a safe escort. The escort was furnished of Louisiana citizens, and these started with the republicans toward the State line, and returned afterward without their victims, stating that they had been stopped by a company of armed men from Texas, who murdered those in their charge in cold blood. Were these men from Texas banditti? When we stigmatize things like that in the South do we pass beyond any bounds of moderation when we say they were banditti, murderers, assassins, guilty of the highest crimes condemned by the laws of God and man? Is this the "outrage business?" Are these things to be jovial over, to nickname and belittle? Will you thrive on deeds like these? I tell you these atrocities will revolt the sense of this nation, the moral sense of the world, when they are understood. You may raise party clamor in this Chamber, in your subsidized presses or your deceived presses, whatever you please; you may get superannuated politicians from our party or your own to exhibit their seared consciences, and stickle for forms when life is being trampled out; but when the people get information in spite of you of these matters, and understand that the "outrage business," as you call it with a sneer, means a system of murder, of spoliation, of destruction of the rights and lives of hundreds of men, the usurpation of State governments, and all nefarious operations, for the purpose of carrying out mere party ends, I tell you public opinion will condemn you; and that light will come! Now, sir, that that light may come at the earliest moment, I do not desire to prolong this debate.

Am I in favor of trying these men by a military commission? I am not in favor of it. I speak as a lawyer, and in my sphere here. I am not speaking as a soldier accustomed to camps and dangers. Speaking in my own sphere and not in that of another, I say I am not in favor of trying these banditti by military commission; although I might think that if it were constitutional it would be effective. That something effective should be done is most certain.

Why, sir, we have been holding for years past a wolf by the ears in the South; we have been trying to hold men still who were in armed rebellion against the Government, with their passions and hatreds excited against us; and we have pursued a course of peaceable reconstruction measures, hoping that we might have results in peace to the country and prosperity to those communities. Never was a rebellion closed and so few men punished for participation in it. The purpose of the republican party all the way through was that of mercy and humanity. It is shown in every line of our statute-books; it is shown in the bills that pass here day by day removing disabilities from men who were most prominent in their efforts to stab at the life of the nation. Sir, the republican party and the Administration have been humane and kind in all these proceedings; but we have been continually confronted by men acting with nefarious purposes, who would not extend to others the mercy which we so willingly extended to them; and I say with Sheridan, and repeat, that they are banditti. I do not by so doing stigmatize the southern people, for I believe that there is in their midst very much of reprobation of these things. I believe there are hundreds and thousands—I hope I might say hundreds of thousands—of people in the South, white men, too, whose souls revolt at these deeds of iniquity which are here whistled down the wind as "the outrage business." If I did not believe it to be so, I should think that the traditional hell was located in that part of our country. I have too much hope for the future of our country to believe this. I am not yet convinced that such terrible depravity exists in the South that the mass of its people can encourage, excuse, or desire to make party capital by means of such nefarious things. But there are many men who are engaged in this business in the South. Who can deny it? A few years ago they frequented the highways in masks, and sociably massacred innocent and helpless men, burned cabins by night, and sought to strike terror by masqueradings. But the mask business got played out. Government prosecutions impeded it, and it was too dramatic. It excited the attention of the country, and midnight murder will not bear notice. Then the White League was organized to take its place and do its work more quietly, of which we have had so much experience of late.

These things are of tremendous national importance, and it is well the country should look at them. But let us begin at the right end; let us have the information that the President has. He is the one to speak. He is the one who is accused by this resolution, if it is an accusation. He is the one accused of responsibility in this matter. Has he not a right to plead before he is tried and before judgment is pronounced? Let the President of the United States speak, as I would say, be he of my party or be he not. This resolution gives him the opportunity.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, it may be that in consequence of the very great interest that I take in events which are transpiring in my State my attention is more particularly given to certain circumstances that I have occasionally to present here to this Chamber. I want now to remind the Senate briefly of the events of the 14th of September. There was an armed collision in the streets of New Orleans between some of the inhabitants and the legally constituted authorities of sufficient magnitude and sufficient gravity to invite the attention of the Executive. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the Executive on that occasion thought that the disorders and the tumults and the violence there were sufficient to require at his hands the issuance of a proclamation requiring the peace to be observed. I can not now put my finger on the proclamation of the President, but we all know its terms. He required that insurrectionary body to lay down its arms and return to its home. Has that proclamation been complied with up to the present hour? And was it not against these very men that the Lieutenant-General of the Army directed the epithet of "banditti?" Was it not against these turbulent white-leaguers who, regardless of the proclamation of the President, still maintain that organization in my State, that that language was used? I state it now as a fact in connection with the State, that that banditti have never laid down their arms, never have complied with the proclamation of the President; that they are there in full organization to-day, and in possession of the arms of the State of Louisiana captured from her on that occasion. Are they not in rebellion? If not against the State of Louisiana, are they not in rebellion against the executive authority of the United States, and was it not proper that they should be classified as "banditti?" If not banditti, they are rebels. That is one of the facts which probably will be elicited on the passage of this resolution, and it is well to bear in mind that such is the case when we are discussing it here in the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. Has the Senator a list of the arms that have not been returned?

Mr. WEST. I have.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to know what are the arms to which the Senator refers which have not been returned under the proclamation.

Mr. WEST. The State arms taken possession of by white-leaguers and not yet returned are 2 mountain howitzers, 624 Springfield breech-loading rifles, 301 Winchester rifles, 664 Enfield rifles, 93 Spencer carbines, and 1,590 bayonets. They are State arms, and those men carry them to-day, and are in rebellion against the executive proclamation to lay them down.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, there seems to be a general desire for a present vote upon this resolution, and I propose to acquiesce in that disposition of it. I want to say, however, before I consent to let the resolution go from the consideration of the Senate, that it calls for the exercise of considerable forbearance and considerable magnanimity on the part of this side of the House to consent to that arrangement.

The simplest resolution of inquiry in the world was introduced here on Tuesday last, by a Senator not distinguished for his attachment to the present Administration. Over and over again it has been said that there was no sort of objection to asking for the information that resolution called for. Over and over again the Senate and the country have been assured that everybody desired to get that information. An inquiry was made by the Senator from New York, a simple inquiry, whether that resolution was in the form usually adopted by the Senate; and the answer, somewhat excited, made to that inquiry by the Senator from Ohio has precipitated the Senate upon the debate which we have listened to since that time; and it has turned out that while the only question pending before the Senate was whether a resolution of inquiry should be made to harmonize with the precedents of the Senate, the opposition in this Chamber has framed and urged an indictment against the republican party, and for three days they have occupied the attention of the Senate and the attention of the country exclusively in prosecuting that indictment. Now I understand they are ready to let the debate be closed and to let that resolution, which might have gone last Tuesday without a word, go to the President, and I understand they are particularly desirous of this.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. TIPTON] wants to hear from the people. He thinks he knows what the people will say. Well, I am content to wait and hear from the people. I had a very strong desire that the people should hear from us, and early. The republican party has been arraigned here, as I say, for three days and it has been charged with every crime which I ever heard discussed in politics. I did want to hear some rejoinder to these charges. I happen to know that there are those sitting about me who have carried the republican flag to victory through stormier times than these, who were not absolutely dumb in the presence of these charges, who were ready to plead to them, and plead the general issue, and go to the country upon that issue. I would have been glad to have that plea interposed, and to have heard something said in support of it, before the resolution went out of the Chamber; but Senators think it is best not to do so. Republicans in whose judgment I have great confidence think it is best not to do so; democrats in whose judgment I have not unlimited confidence, but in whose tact I have sufficient confidence, are very unanimous, I think, in that conclusion, that it is best to have the debate close as it is. Well, let it be closed. I have nothing to say against closing the debate now.

I want, however, before it closes to say three things. The first is that if the democratic party expect to regain the confidence of this country, they will attempt it by some mode not quite so desperate and so reckless as that which has been persisted in for the last week, to wit, that of making the country believe that the republican party is the one political party which is hostile to the Constitution of this country. That is not quite practicable, if I understand the intelligence of the people of this country. That is one indictment that I think cannot be maintained.

Secondly, I want to say to my honorable friend from Nebraska who seems, if he will permit me to say so, unduly excited about the use to which the Army of the United States may be put, that his constituents—and I am glad to see that he is so jealous of their interests and of their welfare—are in no sort of danger from that Army. If they can contend successfully with the grasshoppers, the Army will let them alone.

And the last thing I want to say is this: To make a clean breast of it, I do understand that a very small detachment of the Army of the United States—I do not learn it from the Executive, I have not seen the President; I have gathered it from the newspapers—I do understand that a very small detachment of the Army of the United States on Monday last, with or without authority, led out of the house of representatives for the State of Louisiana five men who had forced themselves into seats there and thus held the Legislature of a State by the throat. I understand that to be so. The five men, I say, who were led out were men who had no business there, and I think there is not a Senator on this floor who will say they had, but they held that Legislature by the throat and thus strangled for the time being the voice of Louisiana. Those five men were led out of the State-house by a detachment of the Army of the United States. There was not a drop of blood spilled; there was not a wound given, so far as I am informed. That was the thing done, and this Senate Chamber and this country have rung with declamation from Tuesday morning to this hour against the infamy of that act. The whole democratic party of the Senate have arrayed themselves against it; and yet, from no one of them have I heard one single word of rebuke to the miscreants who thus, without any authority in the world, took the Legislature of Louisiana by the throat, and held it there. From all which, I am led to infer that, according to the understanding of our friends on the other side of the Chamber, it is a greater outrage to prevent a State from being strangled without the due warrant of law than it is to strangle a State without any authority of law whatever.

That is the issue before us. I am on the other side of that question. I very seldom prefigure purposes, but I thought I was resolved not to let this question go out of the consideration of the Senate without saying why I take the other side of that issue. I am overruled, however, by the judgment of Senators. I think it better, as the feeling is, to let this inquiry go out to the White House. I should like to know, as I have said often before, whether this thing was done without authority or not. I think I am very well advised as to what was done; but I think there will come an occasion, here or elsewhere, when I can speak to every count in the indictment which has been presented here during these three days; and I think I know of one constituency in this country, not much lacking in intelligence, in virtue, or in patriotism, to which I shall be able to plead satisfactorily; and so, if it be the pleasure of the Senate, I will let this resolution go to the White House.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, I feel so deep an interest in the subject before the Senate, the people whom I represent are so deeply interested in it, that I was anxious to submit some remarks before the debate closed, but I am too hoarse to do it to-day. I avail myself, however, of this occasion to enter my solemn protest against the unjust, outrageous, and insulting manner in which the people of the South have been aspersed and reviled since this debate began, and to say that the imputations made against them, when they are tried by the touchstone of fact, cannot be sustained. I trust that I shall be in better condition on another occasion to say many things by way of reply to what has been said. I am too hoarse to-day to make such defense as the honor of the people of the South demands.

The amendment I have just offered to the amendment of the Senator from Indiana is intended to get the whole truth, so far as it will appear by any communication from the President of the United States. I am opposed to his amendment, because it is not germane to the resolution offered by the Senator from Ohio. The object of the Senator from Ohio is one thing; that is, to get information from the President touching what was done in New Orleans on Monday last; but the amendment of the Senator from Indiana is to gather information touching all the various troubles that have transpired in the State of Louisiana for the last two or three years, and it may be very voluminous, and it may throw very little light upon the point we are now driving at. But if the Senate shall adopt that amendment, then I insist that my amendment ought to become a part of the resolution as it shall pass eventually; for it is well known that there are two persons claiming to be the governor of the State of Louisiana; that there are two sets of officers, each claiming to represent the State. It is well known, furthermore, that both these classes of officers have been in communication with the President. What I want to get at is what each class of officers have said to him, what communications they have made to him, and what communications he has made to them. I want the whole truth. In the language used by a Senator the other day, "I want the whole truth, and nothing more."

My friend from Georgia has suggested an amendment which, with the permission of the Senate, I will accept. It comes in after the word "State," in the line before the last.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The modification will be made if there be no objection.

[Mr. MORTON addressed the Senate. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. GORDON. Mr. President, I take the occasion now, which was denied me a few moments ago, of stating the facts in reference to this Troup County affair introduced by the Senator from Indiana. I give as authority for my statement the gentlemen whom I saw upon the very day of the occurrence, and for whose veracity I vouch. The facts, as nearly as I can remember, were these: The negroes to whom the Senator refers came into the town of La Grange, the county seat of Troup, in a body, as is their custom in certain portions of Georgia, marching as soldiers to the polls. On arriving at the court-house door, where the polls were kept, this body of negroes demanded additional representation upon the board of managers of the election. A discussion arose. While the discussion lasted the leader of this band beckoned and called them away. An immediate effort was made by the democratic white people to recall them, proposing either that they should name their managers or at any rate offering to give them every guarantee that their votes should be fairly counted. They, however, declined to vote, and assembled outside of the town, and there, upon the very day, within one hour after the effort was made to satisfy them and induce them to vote, with the same freedom from intimidation as any citizen of that county, they proceeded to raise money to send their messenger to the Chattanooga outrage convention. I have not a shadow of doubt—and I am as much entitled to my opinion as the Senator from Indiana is entitled to his—that the whole programme was prearranged and perfected before they ever entered the city on that morning. This I believe to be an unbiased statement of the facts in this case, which the Senator has introduced upon the authority of a man whose name he declines to give to the Senate.

The Senator refers to the election for governor in Georgia in the year 1868. It was my fortune to be the democratic candidate at that election. The Senator says the republicans carried the State. I will remind him that a republican, a very prominent one in that election, who had much to do with what was claimed as a republican success, is reported and very generally believed to have stated on the streets of Atlanta that unless he was elected to the United States Senate by that republican Legislature or else made superintendent of the State railroad—the property of the State—he would expose the programme by which republicans were counted in and show that the democrats had really carried the State by six thousand or seven thousand majority. I repeat, I cannot vouch for the truth of the rumor; but the fact is he was both made United States Senator and superintendent of the road, and no exposures were ever made.

Let me go further in reference to that election in Georgia.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. GORDON. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORTON. Who was the person referred to?

Mr. GORDON. Yes, sir; I will not imitate the example of the Senator and refuse to give names. That man was Foster Blodgett.

Another matter to which I wish to refer in regard to this election in Georgia is this: I was appealed to by the democrats of Georgia to see General Meade, who was the military commander of the State, as to the manner in which returns were being made by the election managers, all of whom were republicans. In one county, the county of Madison, the election was according to law, the votes counted by the republican managers, the returns made in due form, signed and sealed according to law, and sent to the State capital; all under the seals and signatures of republican managers. These returns showed that democrats in that county were elected. Affidavits were afterward obtained in the county to the effect, not that the negroes were intimidated, nor that any irregularities had occurred, but that certain colored voters who had intended to vote the republican ticket had been deceived by democrats into voting democratic tickets; that they had put into the boxes democratic tickets, supposing them to be republican tickets. Upon those affidavits the general commanding authorized the chief of the bureau of registration to open the returns and change them. Is there any difficulty in obtaining majorities by such means in any State of this Union, Mr. President? I went myself in person to the commanding general, and said to him, "General, do you think this is the proper way to manage elections?" The general, who I am glad to believe intended no injustice, but who, unfortunately for Georgia, did not appreciate the illegality of such proceedings, said that it was his opinion that, if these men were actually cheated out of their votes or into voting a ticket which they did not intend to vote, the correction ought to be made. I then proposed that if he would allow the right to both parties to procure affidavits and change returns accordingly I would guarantee to carry the State of Georgia by 50,000 majority. Of course the privilege was denied.

The Senator boasts that the republicans carried the State at that election by 10,000. Why, sir, it was just as easy to carry it by 100,000 majority. But the honorable Senator says the registration in Georgia at that time showed a majority of colored voters, or very nearly a divided vote, I think, between the two parties.

Mr. MORTON. About six hundred less than the white vote.

Mr. GORDON. Does not the Senator know—if he does not, allow me to inform him—that the registration in Georgia was conducted by registrars appointed by authority derived from Federal authority, and that not one of them were other than supporters of the Federal administration then in power? Moreover, they acted under a law which authorized these registrars to strike from the list the name of any man for cause by the board deemed sufficient. With such surety nothing else was needed to carry the election by any majority.

But an additional fact is that the examination of the returns and the final count were made by republican appointees. No democrat was allowed to be present. Is not this privilege alone sufficient to account for the republican majority?

But the Senator complains that the republican vote has since fallen off in Georgia. Majorities obtained by the means I have mentioned, I apprehend, would fall off in any State upon a return to legal elections.

But even upon the impossible supposition that that election was a fair one, it is not very difficult to account for the decrease of the republican vote in Georgia upon many other grounds. My predecessor in this Chamber was a republican, a man who bears as unblemished a character as any Senator upon this floor. For causes satisfactory to himself, he refuses to vote the republican ticket in Georgia. That is one change, and a quite prominent one; and the same reasons, whatever they were, which influenced him to abandon an organization, the record of whose acts in Georgia is enough to blacken the reputation of any citizen who sustains it, carried doubtless many of his followers with him.

I come now to the charge of intimidation. It is true that numbers of colored men vote the democratic ticket in Georgia, and without any intimidation. The Senator does not seem to understand this. If he had been in Georgia during the rule of the carpet-baggers in that State he would have very readily understood it. He would have seen that negroes who have property to protect, and upon which taxes are to be paid, might very well prefer that laws should be made and taxes collected and disbursed by those who themselves had some permanent interest in the good government. My own carriage-driver desired in 1868 to vote the democratic ticket, but was afraid of being murdered by his own people if he deserted his color. A number of colored people in Georgia have declared their willingness to vote with the democrats, and in some instances, I believe, riots have grown out of the effort on the part of republican negroes to prevent it.

Mr. CLAYTON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GORDON. Certainly.

Mr. CLAYTON. Does the Senator know of a single instance where a colored man has been murdered for voting the democratic ticket?

Mr. GORDON. I am not answerable for the courage of my carriage-driver.

Mr. CLAYTON. That is not the question.

Mr. GORDON. That is not pertinent, I think, to this discussion. As to whether there was reason for apprehension or not, I am not prepared to answer. I only give the Senator the facts.

Mr. MERRIMON. I will state to the Senator from Arkansas that I know of one.

Mr. CLAYTON. In Georgia?

Mr. MERRIMON. No; in my State, North Carolina, in the city of Raleigh.

A colored man was murdered on the day of election for voting the democratic ticket, and it was a matter of public notoriety.

Mr. CLAYTON. If the Senator from Georgia will permit me, I gathered from his remarks that he intended to give the idea—although he disavows it now—that the colored men would vote the democratic ticket if it were not for fear of being interfered with by their colored brethren.

Mr. GORDON. I certainly did intend to convey the idea that in some instances such was the case.

Mr. CLAYTON. And I ask the Senator if he knows a single instance in the State of Georgia where a colored man has suffered for having voted the democratic ticket?

Mr. GORDON. I neither know of an instance where a democratic colored man has suffered for voting that ticket, nor do I know of a case where a republican colored man has suffered for voting his way. I only give the fact, that colored men have apprehension of danger from their own color. But as the Senator presses for a single instance of republican intimidation of colored democrats, I beg to refer him to the testimony quoted from the investigation made at Opelika, Alabama, in my speech of yesterday. He will there see that colored democrats swore that they were not only threatened but actually beaten and turned out of the church for voting the democratic ticket. If the Senator discredits the testimony given by the colored brethren, I certainly do not feel called upon to attempt their defense.

The Senator from Indiana asks how it is we have since carried Georgia so largely for the democrats, unless it is done by intimidation. Before I answer that, I beg that the honorable Senator will tell me how the republican State of Indiana has been carried for the democrats? Were he and his party beaten in his own State by intimidation?

How was the great State of Ohio, which but a few years ago gave from 40,000 to 60,000 republican majority, carried for the democrats? How were New York and Massachusetts and Pennsylvania carried? Was the political revolution of these great Commonwealths by intimidation? If not, with what justice, I ask, can the honorable Senator charge the democrats of Georgia with unlawful acts of intimidation? Upon what plea can the Senator justify the charge which he has made, that I could stem the tide of lawlessness in Georgia, as evidenced he thinks by our heavy democratic majorities, while he makes no such charge against these our allies and confederates in the great States North to which I have referred?

I do not know how the Senator will consider himself as answered, but I apprehend that all honest men, those not biased by political prejudices, as I am afraid the Senator from Indiana is—all men who seek the truth for the good of their country—will be satisfied that the Senator is answered, and fully answered.

But let me go a little further. The Senator says that the colored people do not vote in Georgia. That is true of a great many of them; many do not want to vote. If the Senator will come to Georgia, I will show him colored men who do not vote the republican ticket, but who do vote the democratic ticket, notwithstanding the terror in which they stand of their own color.

Intimidation! During this last campaign, Mr. President, I made a number of speeches in Georgia. I spoke in what is known as the "Black Belt." On my first visit to that section of the State during this campaign, in traveling through the county of Mitchell, I was met by gentlemen who came excitedly upon the cars and desired to see me. I inquired what the matter was; and they related very briefly the facts of the arrest that morning of I think ten or twelve boys, some of them not more than fifteen or sixteen years old, by the United States marshal on the charge of having intimidated a republican meeting. The meeting consisted of a large number of men, fully grown, white and black republicans. I saw these beardless youths, harmless, without any arms. I asked for the facts. The statement I received was that at the meeting, to which these boys had been formally invited, a colored man made a speech. One of these boys asked if he had not promised to vote the democratic ticket. The colored man denied it; when the boy denounced him as a liar. Without any other threat, as I understand, without any other disturbance, the whole number of youths were arrested at the instance of the United States Government. No; I recall that remark. Let me say, for the honor of the Government, that it was only the act of a petty tyrant, who styled himself a marshal of this Government. I will not, for the honor of my countryman, suppose that the Government was guilty of such petty tyranny as this. They were arrested by the United States marshal. And after having suffered the costs of the arrest, and lawyer's fees, they were turned loose upon a bond. If the facts are doubted, I will add that substantially I vouch for their truth upon the honor of a Senator and a man.

In another place in that State, a gentleman who bears the title of honorable was serenaded with tin pans. The United States marshal was called for, and the whole community threatened, on the charge of intimidation. That Senator does not seem to understand how the colored people decrease in Georgia. It is easy to explain. They are leaving Georgia for Mississippi. They want lands. Lands happen to be higher, however, in the State of Georgia, in democratic hands, than they are in Mississippi, which is in republican hands; and at a recent convention of colored people in Georgia to discuss the question of emigration the announcement was made by a missionary from Mississippi that the lands of Mississippi could be bought at five cents an acre. He succeeded in inducing some from Georgia. But there is another reason for this exodus, which it may be proper for me to state. They desire social equality, which they hope to get in Mississippi, but which they cannot get in Georgia. All their political rights, however, are secure in Georgia. If the United States Government were to withdraw its judges, and all the appointments of its power from Georgia to-day, the colored man would still be protected; but we do not propose to make them our social equals.

Mr. President, as I said yesterday, nothing was further from my intention than to participate in this debate—especially to ask to be heard a second time. But the Senator has forced me to my feet. Now, as he has been pleased to say that in Georgia we could not stem the tide of blood and of murder which there existed, I want to challenge him, here in the presence of the Senate and of the American people, to a comparison of the records of the courts in Indiana with the records of the courts in Georgia since that State passed into democratic hands; and by the records of all the murders, all the trials and convictions, my people will stand or fall before the judgment of an unbiased public. There is a challenge, and I ask the Senator to accept it.

I have thus endeavored to make an open, frank, and full declaration of all matters concerning which the Senator from Indiana has seen fit to arraign me and my State before the bar of public opinion.

Mr. CARPENTER. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. SHERMAN. O, no; let us take the vote. I hope the Senator will withdraw the motion.

Mr. CARPENTER. I will withdraw the motion if anybody thinks we shall get a vote to-night.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I did intend to participate in the discussion upon this resolution. The evident desire of the Senate, however, to reach a vote on the resolution this evening has induced me to forego my determination to discuss the question. I do so the more readily because I apprehend that other occasions will arise when I may express my views on this whole subject. Still I cannot consent that a vote shall be taken on this resolution without first entering a disclaimer to the attempt that evidently has been made to throw upon the democratic side of this Chamber the responsibility for this discussion. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] attempted to make the impression that there had been a misuse of the time of the Senate in the discussion of this question, when upon the other side of the Chamber they were ready to have voted at any moment. If there had been objection in no form interposed to the resolution, there would have been not one word of debate upon it. The resolution of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] was dignified in its language. It was demanded by the circumstances under which we found ourselves placed on the morning of the 5th instant. It was courteous in its bearing toward the President of the United States; it did not charge any offense against the President, or against any of his subordinates whether civil or military. But an amendment was offered the effect of which must necessarily have been to delay the answer of the President to the resolution. I will not say that the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] in offering that amendment, proposed to cause any delay whatever; but it might very justly have been apprehended when it was proposed that it would provoke discussion; and therefore I think, if there was a desire to reach any immediate conclusion on this subject, no amendment to the resolution ought to have been proposed. While I disclaim any intention of saying that the Senator from New York intended that such should be its effect, yet I know that that is the judgment of many persons in the country, and I have here an extract from a newspaper which states that the obvious intent and purpose of the amendment was to prevent reaching the information required. I do not say so myself, but I say that is the impression which has been made on the country. But apart from his amendment there was an amendment proposed or notice given of an amendment to be proposed by the Senator from Indiana which necessarily must lead to a discussion of this whole question. Therefore I disclaim for this side of the Chamber all responsibility for the discussion which has taken place.

But, sir, I am not sorry that this discussion has been had. I believe that discussion was eminently proper under all the circumstances, and I have no doubt that the effect of it will be good upon the country. It has served to call the attention of the people of this country to an act which I am satisfied their judgment will condemn. It has served to call the attention of the people of this country to the fact that a military chieftain, paid by the Government of the United States, entered the halls of legislation in one of the sister States of this Republic and expelled at the point of the bayonet five of the members of that body against the protests of the speaker, against the protests of the members themselves, in violation of law, without any warrant or authority of law, and in contravention of every practice that has ever existed under this Government from its foundation to the present time. We had the information. We had the information through the press; we had it through the telegrams; and let me say that in my opinion the telegraph never conveyed a sadder message to the people of this country than it conveyed on the evening of the 4th of this month. It had heretofore told of the demise of men distinguished and honored by their country; it had told of battles lost and of disaster by flood and fire; but on the 4th it told a sadder tale still. It told of liberty stricken down in one of the States of this Union; and all over the land, wherever we can hear any expression of opinion on the part of the people, there is one universal expression of condemnation against the acts of the military power of this country that could invade the halls of legislation and expel members who were entitled to seats on the floor.

Sir, I am glad that the resolution of the Senator from Ohio was offered, and I am not sorry that it has provoked this debate. He could have done nothing less as a Senator than to inquire if the facts as reported by the telegraph were true, and to inquire where was the authority in law for such an act on the part of the military power. He had greater experience than some of the rest of us, but I apprehend that the youngest member of this body would have been derelict in duty to himself, derelict in duty to his State, derelict in duty to the common liberties of the people of this country, if he had not interposed an inquiry to the President of the United States to know whether the facts as stated were true, and if so the grounds upon which this was done. Therefore, sir, while we are not responsible for this debate, I assert in my place that I am not sorry it has taken place; and when this question comes up again I shall take occasion to say something more about it.

I say to the Senator from Indiana that none of these tales of horror, of bloodshed, and of murder, which are iterated and reiterated so eloquently by that Senator and by others on this floor, will have the effect which they are designed to have. This "outrage business" is about "played out." The people have heard that song so often that it fails to be music to their ears. In the last campaign a regular outrage convention—I believe the Senator from Ohio the other day called it an outrage mill—was convened in one of the Southern States. It sent forth its messages. Every man in the country knew that it was a part of the political machinery put in operation to carry the republican ticket in the late election. The wings of every wind bore out intelligence of these outrages. They were gathered from the four winds of heaven; they were put in volumes and distributed as public documents, published in party newspapers; but what was their effect? They passed as idle wind passes over the American people. And if the Senator from Indiana wants to renew that story, if he wants to sing the old song, if he wants again to deal with murders, with assassinations, with outrages, we shall welcome him whenever he chooses to touch that string. But I intended simply to apologize for not making a speech on this occasion.

Mr. LOGAN and others. Go on.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The time is too far spent now; it is near six o'clock in the evening, and the Senate is anxious to go home. I do not desire to trespass longer on its attention; but in yielding my own intentions to what I believe to be the wish of the Senate, in not discussing this question, I want to say that it is not because I do not feel that it is one of vast importance and one that is calculated to stir the feelings of every man who is a true lover of liberty, but I only forego the pleasure which it would afford me to participate in this discussion because I know it is the desire of the Senate to reach a vote on this resolution this afternoon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] to the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON.]

Mr. WEST and Mr. SARGENT. Let it be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment of the Senator from Indiana is to add to the resolution the following words:

> And whether he has any information in regard to the existence of armed organizations in the State of Louisiana hostile to the government of the State and intent on overturning such government by force.

It is proposed to amend that by adding thereto the following:

> And particularly whether the persons whom he has recognized as the official authorities of said State of Louisiana were elected according to the constitution and laws of that State; and if so, how and by what means he ascertained such facts; and whether other persons than those recognized by him as such authorities claimed, and claim, to be the lawful authorities of said State, and upon what grounds the last-mentioned persons claimed to be such lawful authorities, with all the evidence furnished the executive department by said persons to sustain said claim, and all communications between the executive department and said persons in reference to said claim, and what, and all, information he had, or has, to that effect.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have not the slightest objection to calling for the information, but I suggest to the Senator from North Carolina that that clause calls on the President to send in whole documents relating to the McEnery and Kellogg conflict, all of which have been sent to us and are printed. If the Senator proposes to call for any new information, I would be very willing to vote for it, but if he calls for the whole amount of matter involved it would take about a month to copy it.

Mr. MERRIMON. I should object to such a delay as strongly as the Senator from Ohio; but I say that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana is not broad enough and by that we can only get one side.

Mr. SHERMAN. The mistake of the gentleman is that the amendment of the Senator from Indiana calls for a simple fact as to whether any organization exists called the White League, a matter which I suppose has sprung up since the last adjournment, which is perfectly proper and entirely in harmony with the resolution of my colleague.

Mr. MERRIMON. It is manifest that under the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana the Senate will be put in possession of all communications between the President and the so-called Governor Kellogg. We know that there are two persons there claiming to represent the State government, and I say that it is not fair or just to the people of Louisiana or to the people of the United States or to the Senate that we should have a one-sided, garbled representation, and not have the other side. All I want is the whole of it. I am content to let the resolution pass as it was offered by the Senator from Ohio; but if we have the amendment of the Senator from Indiana put on, it is fair and just that we should have the whole information.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion to him in reference to calling on the President of the United States as to the election? The Senator well knows that there is a report here, printed by the Senate, containing all the testimony that was taken on that subject—a report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, which is certainly much more full and complete and reliable than anything that could possibly be obtained by this amendment. It strikes me that this amendment merely embarrasses the information that we desire to obtain. It is impossible to get any information under the amendment that the Senator offers which he has not now at his desk or cannot get in five minutes.

Mr. MERRIMON. I am content to accept the suggestion of the Senator from Illinois, so as to embrace all information not heretofore sent to the Senate.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. "Not heretofore communicated."

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator does not mean that.

Mr. LOGAN. The document that I refer to is not a communication from the President; he has not charge of that. It is the report of a committee, a full and complete report, with all the testimony relating to everything connected with that election.

Mr. MERRIMON. We know, Mr. President, that many communications have been made to the President of the United States, or at all events the newspapers say so, from McEnery and the McEnery government. What I want is that information.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion to him?

Mr. MERRIMON. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. It seems to me that the suggestion he made a moment ago was exactly right. Say all that has been received since a certain date. If he changes it, as the Senator from Maryland suggested, and makes it all not heretofore communicated, that, I suggest to my friend, will have practically no sense, because the report of the committee was never communicated by the President, and therefore the Senator will see the words would not be opportune; but let him simply say all the communications received from those whom the Senator describes since a day fixed, or since the report was made. That will answer his purpose.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Since this report.

Mr. MERRIMON. I am content with that, and will say "all communications made or received since the report made by the Committee on Privileges and Elections."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be so modified.

Mr. WEST. I should like to have it read as it is modified, because this amendment calls for information from the President of the United States that he certainly cannot by any possibility give. It is not for the President of the United States to judge whether a man is legally elected. No returns are made to the President of the United States. The Senator requires the President to state whether the governor of that State now acting has been legally elected. The Senator will remember that the President has on various occasions, quite as numerous as three, I believe, communicated to Congress his action in connection with the Louisiana case; and every particle of information the Senator calls for here, as far as it can be given by the President of the United States, is now available to him in various documents.

Mr. MORTON. I will say to the Senator from North Carolina that the President a few weeks ago said that he believed Kellogg was elected governor.

Mr. MERRIMON. It becomes the duty of the President to exercise his quasi-judicial power in applications to him such as that made by Kellogg and McEnery. It is his duty, when an application is made, particularly if Congress be not in session, to determine who represent the State government; and in doing that he must ascertain simply who were ascertained to represent the State government according to the constitution and laws of Louisiana. When Congress shall convene, Congress may overrule that judgment, as Congress may do now. Congress may pass a joint resolution recognizing the McEnery government as the true government, in which case it would be the duty of the President to recognize it. He had certain data before him, or he ought to have had, which would enable him to decide who represented truly and lawfully the government of the State of Louisiana. That is the information I want.

Mr. PEASE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MERRIMON. Yes, sir.

Mr. PEASE. Is it not true that the President has indicated to the Congress of the United States his course in relation to the Louisiana government and the reasons why he has recognized Kellogg? It was embodied, I think, in the last message.

Mr. MERRIMON. O, he has mentioned the fact that he recognized the Kellogg government and asked Congress to take action, but he did not lay before Congress the data on which he acted, and that is what I want.

Mr. CRAGIN. I suggest to the Senator to so word his amendment that the President be requested to communicate to the Senate any information that he has not already communicated, and which is not in the possession of the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. Or in the possession of the House?

Mr. CRAGIN. Yes.

Mr. MERRIMON. That is substantially the amendment I accepted a while ago. I ask the Clerk to report my amendment as modified.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think that on the whole, unless the Senator modifies that, it should be voted down. I want this information; the Senator wants it; and he ought not to load it down with a lot of cumbersome matter. The President will obey your instructions, of course.

Mr. MERRIMON. My amendment is not captious at all. I want both sides.

Mr. SHERMAN. But your amendment will load down the resolution.

Mr. MERRIMON. I am content to withdraw my amendment if the Senator from Indiana will withdraw his.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the amendment of the Senator from Indiana is perfectly legitimate.

Mr. MERRIMON. Then I insist on mine. Let us have a vote.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well, then; let us have a vote.

Mr. THURMAN. I shall not detain the Senate with a speech; but I wish before the vote is taken to say a word about the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana. The resolution submitted by me simply called on the President to know whether a portion of the Army of the United States, or any officer or soldier thereof, had intermeddled with the organization of the Legislature of the State of Louisiana, and especially whether by such military intervention any persons claiming seats in that body had been prevented from taking them or expelled from them after they had taken them, and, if the facts were so, then to state by what authority of law such military interference took place.

Now, these are questions that are as independent of the existence of a White League down there as they are of the transit of Venus across the sun's disk. Were the facts so? Did that armed intervention take place? Whether there was a White League or whether there was not a White League cannot change the matter of fact, did that armed intervention take place? The President is asked to answer. If it did take place, then comes the question, by what authority of law did it take place? And that is a question to be determined by the Constitution and the statutes of Congress made in pursuance of the Constitution. It is wholly independent of any question of murder; it is wholly independent of any question of outrage; wholly independent of any question of white league or not. It is a simple, naked question of law. Supposing this armed interference to have taken place, was there authority in the Constitution and laws of the United States that warranted such military interference? That is all of it, sir; and everything contained in the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, and every word that has been uttered upon this floor about southern outrages and murders, and that long tirade of exaggeration which we have heard here so often and have heard repeated now, is simply to hide the real question whether or no the Army of the United States, in violation of the Constitution and without any authority of law, has undertaken to decide who are members of a State Legislature. Does the Senator from Indiana think the people of the United States are so besotted and stupid that they cannot see through this mist that he would throw around the question and get at the real point? Does he think that the men who will discuss this question next Monday night in the great city of New York—your late republican Attorney-General, one of the ablest and oldest of the republican editors in this country, and men of the same stamp—can have their vision obscured by your cry of outrages and white-leaguers down South so that they cannot see the real question? No, sir; they see. The only thing that is lamentable to consider is to behold that in this Senate of the United States, when a State Legislature has been violated, its hall entered, its members torn by military force from their seats, and that by a portion of the Federal Army, and when, after one week's debate, not one single line or word of the Constitution, not one single word or letter of a statute has been shown to justify such a thing, the effect of this is sought to be palliated or diverted or obscured by talking about homicides, murders, and white-leaguers in the South? Sir, there was a time when an American Senator would have hesitated before he would have thrown the least obstacle in the way of such an inquiry. How is it that the Federal Army has been used to overthrow the Legislature of a State or to decide who are members of a State Legislature? That is all the question before us; and all this talk of murder and southern outrages is merely throwing sand in our eyes to divert the public attention.

If the facts are as I believe them to be, that it is one of the most flagrant and outrageous violations of the Constitution and laws of the United States and the principles of free government that ever has taken place on this continent; and it cannot be hidden. Pass the resolution; and now I say to my friends who said here to-day, "Let us take the vote; let us get this report," when you get this report you will have only half the story. Mark it, when you get this report from the Executive Mansion, in answer to this resolution, you will have but half the story; but if it contains one thing, it will contain all that I care about knowing officially, for I know the rest already by sufficient testimony. If it contains the fact that this violation of the Constitution and of the law has the sanction of the President of the United States, I ask for no more information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. SARGENT in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina to the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. BOREMAN. Let it be reported as it has been modified.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment to the amendment is to insert at the end of the pending amendment the following:

And particularly whether the persons whom he has recognized as official authorities of said State of Louisiana were elected according to the constitution and laws of that State, and if so how and by what means he ascertained such fact, and whether other persons than those recognized by him as such authorities claimed, and claim, to be the lawful authorities of said State, and upon what grounds the last-mentioned persons claim to be such lawful authorities, with all the evidence furnished the executive department by said persons to sustain said claim, and all communications between the executive department and said persons in reference to said claim, and what, and all information he had, or has, to that effect that has come into his possession since the 20th of February, 1873.

Mr. MERRIMON. I hope the President will send the information on both sides, and I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, The amendment to the amendment being withdrawn, the question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON.]

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will be excused for asking the Clerk to read the amendment offered by the Senator from California, [Mr. SARGENT.]

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend the resolution by inserting after the word "Senate," where it last occurs in the original resolution, the words "under what circumstances;" so that if amended it will read:

And if such has been the case, then that the President inform the Senate under what circumstances and by what authority such military intervention and interference have taken place.

Mr. MORTON. That is right.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. CONKLING. Let the resolution first pass.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. It has passed.

Mr. CONKLING. I think not. I think we ought to have the yeas and nays. The amendment as amended was passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has already declared that the resolution as amended is adopted.

Mr. SHERMAN. We were all in favor of it anyhow, and the yeas and nays were not necessary.

Mr. CONKLING. I intended to ask for the yeas and nays on it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is my impression that the Senator is too late. I am subject to correction, however.

Mr. CONKLING. I think we ought to have the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments having been made, and the question put on the resolution as amended, the Chair thinks the Senator is too late.

Mr. BOREMAN. The Chair stated the amendment was adopted, but I did not hear the Chair state that the resolution as amended was adopted.

Mr. WEST. It was an inadvertence on the part of the Chair in putting the question; that was all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair intended to state it. If he did not, it was a verbal inaccuracy; but the Chair was understood as having put the question on the resolution as amended, and such is the record; and he will therefore adhere to his decision until overruled. The question now is on the motion of the Senator from Maryland that when the Senate adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at six o'clock and eight minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 8, 1875.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CHARGES AGAINST HON. W. H. STOWELL.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Naval Affairs, pursuing the investigation into the charges against the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. STOWELL,] may have authority to sit during the sessions of the House, and also that the evidence taken in that case be printed for the use of the committee.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the authority asked will be granted.

There was no objection.

REVENUE AND TAXATION.

Mr. COX, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to furnish this House with a statement of receipts from the revenue for the second quarter of the fiscal year of 1874-'75; also to state whether the estimates of receipts furnished by him in his report on the 7th of December, 1874, for the remaining three-quarters of the current fiscal year have undergone any modification which may require additional taxation.

MRS. MARY ANN M'DONALD.

Mr. FINCK, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4203) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary Ann McDonald; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL HOME FOR DISABLED SOLDIERS.

Mr. GUNCKEL, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 135) appointing managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN M. DORSEY AND WILLIAM SHEPEARD.

On motion of Mr. PAGE, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Indian Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4158) for the relief of John M. Dorsey and William Shepeard; and the same was referred to the Committee on Claims.

J. A. YECKLEY.

Mr. LAMPORT, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4204) for the relief of First Lieutenant J. A. Yeckley, of the Twentieth Infantry, United States Army, acting commissary of subsistence; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

DANIEL WILLIAMSON.

Mr. HUNTON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4205) for the relief of Daniel Williamson, of Fairfax County, Virginia, late a guide for the Army of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

SUCCESSORS IN DISSOLUTIONS OF PARTNERSHIPS.

Mr. BIERY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4206) to amend the act of July 13, 1866, so that no additional special tax shall be levied on the successor or successors in certain cases of the dissolution of partnerships; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at fifteen minutes past twelve o'clock; and this being Friday, the first business in order is the call of committees for reports of a private nature.

WILLIAM H. DE GROOT.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, from the Committee on Claims, reported back adversely the memoral and accompanying papers of William H. De Groot, praying the passage of a joint resolution directing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay with interest a certain award; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM JOSLIN.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, also, from the same committee, reported back adversely the petition of William Joslin, asking indemnity for loss of United States bonds; and moved that the same be laid on the table and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I ask that this may be sent to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. There is no bill; nothing but a petition. I suppose it cannot go to the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. A petition cannot be put upon the Calendar.

The motion of Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, was agreed to.

JAMES B. WHITE.

Mr. SHOEMAKER, of Pennsylvania, from the same committee, reported adversely the bill (H. R. No. 647) for the relief of James B. White; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

RICHARD B. IRWIN.

Mr. DAWES. I hold in my hand a privileged communication, which is addressed to the Speaker of the House. I send it to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hon. JAMES G. BLAINE,
Speaker of the House of Representatives:

We, the undersigned, attending and consulting physicians in the case of Colonel R. B. Irwin, having been informed by telegram from his attending physician in the city of San Francisco, Dr V. J. Fourgeaud, that said patient was severely injured by a fall from his carriage in the city of San Francisco on or about the 28th of January, 1872, by striking his head against the iron rail of a street railway, resulting in a fracture of the malar bone, and concussion of the brain, from which he has suffered occasionally severe attacks of pain, with cerebral and gastric disturbances; and having personally, and in each other's presence, examined the above-named person, we do hereby certify, and most respectfully represent to the House of Representatives, that the said Colonel Richard B. Irwin is now in such a physical condition in consequence of the said injuries that the execution of the order of the House of Representatives dated January 6, 1875, in view of the surroundings and consequent physical discomforts, together with the moral effects on his morbidly sensitive and impressible nervous system resulting therefrom, would, in our judgment, be attended with results pernicious to his health, the extent of which we are not prepared to predict.

W. P. JOHNSTON, M. D.,
Attending Physician.
ALEX. Y. P. GARNETT, M. D.,
Consulting Physician.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 8, 1875.

Mr. DAWES. I move that this paper be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and that, pending their consideration of it, the Sergeant-at-Arms be instructed to omit so much of the execution of the order as commits Mr. Irwin to jail. On that motion I call the previous question.

Mr. RANDALL. What would be the effect of this motion? The committee would have power to do what?

Mr. DAWES. They will have power to report upon the question; and pending their consideration of it the Sergeant-at-Arms will be at liberty not to send Mr. Irwin to jail. [A pause, during which Mr. DAWES conferred with several members.] Some of my colleagues on the committee desire that the House should dispose of this matter without the committee taking the responsibility. Therefore, while I make my motion, I will not call the previous question; and my colleagues on the committee, with whom I have had no opportunity to consult, can oppose the motion or submit different views if they desire to do so. My own idea is that it would be proper to refer the communication to the committee, and while they are examining into the question that the Sergeant-at-Arms keep this man as he has kept him. There are no physicians of higher standing in this city, in personal or professional character than those who signed that certificate; and I simply suggest their communication be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and in the mean time this man can remain in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. RANDALL. I judge the better course would be to refer this communication without any instructions or any expression of opinion from the House to the committee, allowing them to act as they may deem best.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I think that is the better way.

Mr. KASSON. I ask my colleague on the Committee on Ways and Means to confine his motion to the question of reference, in order that we may make the requisite examination, as the committee is anxious to do, and report to the House at once. I do not think the committee ought to take the responsibility proposed.

Mr. DAWES. At the suggestion of the gentleman from Iowa, a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, I modify my motion, simply confining it to the reference of this paper. Still I will call the attention of the gentleman from Iowa to the fact that the Sergeant-at-Arms would be left under a positive order unless the House shall in some way give him leave to retain the recusant witness in his custody instead of taking him under that order at once to the jail.

Mr. KASSON. I assume that the Sergeant-at-Arms will do to-day as he did yesterday. If the condition of the witness is such as stated, he will of course await further instruction from the House.

Mr. DAWES. If that be understood, then the Sergeant-at-Arms will be left free from responsibility, and my objection will be removed.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to add to the motion of my colleague for reference, that the Sergeant-at-Arms be instructed to await the report of the Committee on Ways and Means before executing the order of the House to take this witness to jail.

Mr. DAWES. That is what I suggested, but my colleague on the committee objected to it.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts modify his motion as suggested by the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. DAWES. My original proposition was as my colleague has suggested, but for some reason some of my colleagues on the committee think it ought to be referred without instructions. I think, however, the result will be the same either way.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The difference between my motion and that of my colleague is, that he proposes to refer his instructions to his committee, while I propose to refer with instructions to the Sergeant-at-Arms to await the action of the committee.

Mr. DAWES. Mine was precisely the same in effect. I do not believe the result of things will be any different. I do not think the Sergeant-at-Arms, pending this examination, will feel himself called upon to take this witness to jail.

Mr. BURCHARD. I hope the motion will be accompanied with the privilege to the Committee on Ways and Means to report at any time.

Mr. DAWES. Of course.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I am not quite satisfied with that disposition of the matter. We have ordered the Sergeant-at-Arms to keep Irwin, and, if the jailer will permit it, to keep him in the jail of this District. The Sergeant-at-Arms has no discretion. Some gentlemen say it will kill the man if he is kept there. Now, I would not want that done by any means. But the Sergeant-at-Arms must keep him there if he has the order to do so, whether it kills him in an hour or not. If you want the Sergeant-at-Arms to exercise his discretion, if you want to shove the responsibility upon a subordinate officer of this House, then let it be distinctly understood that you do not wish to decide that question. You give him an order to hold the prisoner in jail, and if he is not held in jail the Sergeant-at-Arms is responsible. You propose to wink at his violation of the order of the House. I am not satisfied with any such proceeding. Refer this question to the Committee on Ways and Means, and then let the order be modified by that committee as mercy shall dictate. Make a distinct order, and do not wink at any evasion of duty on the part of the Sergeant-at-Arms. He has no business to do otherwise than execute the positive order of this House to confine this man in jail.

I will say a word in addition. Some one has said you would treat this man as you would a murderer. Well, I would treat him precisely as I would one charged with murder. This prisoner freely testifies to being involved in a crime greater than murder; but there is no murderer whom I would kill by keeping him in a cell for twenty-four hours. I would treat this prisoner precisely as I would any other great criminal, holding him under the same ordinary rules of humanity.

Mr. DAWES. I adhere to the original form of my motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves a reference of the communication read at the Clerk's desk to the Committee on Ways and Means, and pending their investigation and report thereon the Sergeant-at-Arms shall be directed to detain this recusant witness as at present.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is not that proposition divisible?

The SPEAKER. It is not divisible if the gentleman demands the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. But he has not called the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to make the motion compound or separate. A division has been called for.

Mr. LOWE. What is the motion?

Mr. DAWES. I move the reference of this paper to the Committee on Ways and Means, and pending their examination and report thereon that the Sergeant-at-Arms shall detain this man in his own personal custody.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for a division of that question.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It is not a divisible question.

Mr. DAWES. I demand the previous question. I suppose it is capable of division after the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The question is on seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. DAWES. I wish to inquire whether, if the previous question be seconded, the motion will be open to a division?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It is not a divisible question.

Mr. DAWES. Would it not be divisible after the previous question is seconded as well as before?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not; but there can be a separate vote by moving to strike out.

Mr. BURCHARD. I suggest to my colleague on the committee that he should allow an amendment striking out the latter part of his motion; and the House can vote on that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can himself divide the motion if he chooses.

Mr. RANDALL. Is not any resolution which is divisible before the previous question divisible after it?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I suggest that the two questions are totally distinct, so that if the point of order were raised they could not be put together; one being a reference of the paper and the other an order to the Sergeant-at-Arms. It is not a case of a reference to a committee with instructions to the committee, but the reference of a paper to the committee, accompanied by instructions in a distinct matter to an officer of the House.

The SPEAKER. Yes; but the reference with instructions is voted on at the same time. Parliamentarily the question is precisely that of reference with instructions.

Mr. DAWES. I will relieve the House of any embarrassment on this subject by moving, first, that the paper be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. DAWES that the communication be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, it was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. Now, any gentleman may make such motion as he pleases in reference to the present custody of this man.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move that, pending investigation and report by the Committee on Ways and Means——

Several members called for the regular order.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have the floor, I believe, and this is the regular order. I move that, pending investigation and report by the Committee on Ways and Means, the Sergeant-at-Arms be instructed to retain this man in his personal custody without committing him to the common jail.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is that motion in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that it is.

Mr. BURROWS. If in order, I move to lay the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that there is no use in complicating the question by the motion to lay on the table, because the question comes up directly and must be settled one way or the other on the motion itself.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask that the division on my motion be taken by tellers.

On the question of ordering tellers there were ayes 24; not one-fifth of a quorum.

So tellers were not ordered.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Then I ask that the division be taken by yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 34, nays 161, not voting 93; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Barnum, Berry, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cessna, Clayton, Crooke, Dobbins, Eldredge, Field, Frye, Hagans, John W. Hazelton, Hooper, Hoskins, Alexander S. So the motion was not agreed to.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS IN THE TERRITORY OF NEW MEXICO.

Mr. ELKINS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4207) to confirm certain private land claims in the Territory of New Mexico; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Territories, and ordered to be printed.

THE ACCIDENT ON THE BALTIMORE AND POTOMAC RAILROAD.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk has sent to the Chair a telegram received from the Post-Office Department. As a matter of interest probably to members it will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

POST-OFFICE, Washington, January 8, 1875.

To Clerk House of Representatives:

All the mail for the North that accumulated in this city yesterday was burned last night. The mails for the West and Northwest and Southwest went on Baltimore and Ohio Road at 6.10 and 11.40, are all right, and not included in the calamity.

GEORGE S. BANGS,
General Superintendent.

The SPEAKER. The mail-car was destroyed, as gentlemen may have seen.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will regard the morning hour as beginning at ten minutes before one o'clock. Reports are still in order from the Committee on Claims.

JOHN C. LEMMON.

Mr. HAMILTON, from the Committee on Claims, reported as a substitute for the bill (H. R. No. 294) a bill (H. R. No. 4208) for the relief of John C. Lemmon, late colonel of the Tenth New York Cavalry Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

W. W. VAN ANTWERP.

Mr. LAWRENCE, from the Committee on War Claims, reported as a substitute for the bill (H. R. No. 4160) a bill (H. R. No. 4209) for the relief of W. W. Van Antwerp, of Jackson, Michigan; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

HENRY Z. EATON.

Mr. LAWRENCE also, from the Committee on War Claims, reported as a substitute for the bill (H. R. No. 902) a bill (H. R. No. 4210) for the relief of Henry Z. Eaton, late lieutenant Company H, Seventh Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

RELIEF OF CERTAIN CITIZENS OF PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. LAWRENCE also, from the Committee on War Claims, reported adversely on the bill (H. R. No. 883) for the relief of certain citizens of the State of Pennsylvania; and the same was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

MARY H. NOONAN.

Mr. LAWRENCE also, from the same committee, made an adverse report in the case of Mary H. Noonan; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

FOLKES, WINSTON, AND OTHERS.

Mr. LAWRENCE also, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do not pass, the bill (H. R. No. 3763) for the relief of Folkes, Winston, and others, citizens of Lynchburgh, Virginia; which was laid on the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

GEORGE F. SELLECK.

Mr. KELLOGG, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 2434) for the relief of George F. Selleck, late a lieutenant in the Fifth Connecticut Volunteers; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

MARVIN H. AMESBURY.

Mr. KELLOGG also, from the same committee, reported back, with a substitute and with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 2360) for the relief of Marvin H. Amesbury; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the substitute and report ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH W. M'CLURG AND OTHERS.

Mr. MORRISON, from the same committee, reported back, with a substitute and with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 162) for the relief of Joseph W. McClurg and others, of Camden County, Missouri; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the substitute and report ordered to be printed.

JOHN H. SOTHRON.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do not pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1975) for the relief of John H. Sothron, of Saint Mary's County, Maryland; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin, also, from the same committee, made adverse reports on the petitions of Charles H. Wiltberger, for loss of property taken for the use of the Army during the late war; and the petition of Ann G. Eaton, administratrix of the estate of Jacob F. Eaton, for loss of crops, damage to land, &c., on Long Island, Boston Harbor, Massachusetts; which were laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed.

Mr. BARBER, from the same committee, made adverse reports on the petitions of Valorous G. Austin, of Washington, District of Columbia, for property taken, used, and destroyed by the United States forces, and Mrs. Mary Geary, asking compensation for the use of dwelling-house, loss of stock, &c., at Chickasaw City, July 31, 1862; which were laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH DUNLAP.

Mr. LOWE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4211) for the relief of Joseph Dunlap; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CREEK ORPHANS.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 3610) for the relief of the Creek orphans, and to carry out the treaty made with the Creek nation of Indians March 24, 1832; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ALVIS SMITH.

Mr. MACDOUGALL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (S. No. 345) for the relief of Alvis Smith; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM BOWLIN.

Mr. MACDOUGALL also, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (S. No. 344) for the relief of William Bowlin; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. MACDOUGALL, from the same committee, also reported back the following adversely; and the committee were discharged from their further consideration, and they were laid on the table:

The petition of S. C. Green, late commissary of subsistence of volunteers;

The petition of Jonathan Witler, late private Company H, One hundred and first Regiment Ohio Infantry Volunteers, for change of military record;

The petition of John T. Brown, for compensation for carrying dispatches and acting as spy in 1861;

The petition of J. H. Huntington and S. A. Nelson, for compensation for establishing a signal station on Mount Washington, New Hampshire; and

WILLIAM M. MOORE.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1259) for the relief of William M. Moore, late captain of Company G, Third North Carolina Mounted Infantry; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

ASHER R. EDDY AND RUFUS SAXTON.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report back favorably House bill No. 3893, to correct the date of commission of certain officers of the Army. I ask that the bill be now put upon its passage.

The bill authorizes the President to nominate and promote Asher R. Eddy and Rufus Saxton to be lieutenant-colonels and deputy quartermasters-general, to date from July 29, 1866, and to take places on the Army Register next below Colonel Stewart Van Vliet; but that no officer of said Department shall be reduced from his present rank, nor shall any additional pay or allowance be made to any officer, by virtue of this act.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. While this bill does not reduce anybody from his present rank, will it not put two men over somebody else?

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. Yes; it does.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Will not that reduce them?

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. It does not reduce them from their present rank.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No; it only puts somebody over them, and they cannot have promotion until somebody else is promoted.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. This case is analogous to the cases of Major Myers, of the Quartermaster's Department, and Major Baird, Inspector-General's Department, which were examined by the Military Committee and reported upon at the last session of Congress. Those men were overslaughed as these were. I have the opinion of the Attorney-General and the report of the Military Committee. Three different cases have been passed upon by this very Congress, and they are of the same nature.

Mr. GARFIELD. I always feel great reluctance to vote for any bill that reorganizes the grade of officers in the Army. I do not know enough about this case to speak intelligently upon it; but I want to ask the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. YOUNG] whether this is not a part of the old quartermaster question of rank which we have had before us for several Congresses, and whether this is not one of the contested questions in the Quartermaster-General's corps; whether one part of that corps would not feel itself aggrieved if this bill passes, and another part aggrieved if it does not pass? Have the committee heard both sides of this question? Have the parties been fully heard who would feel themselves aggrieved by the passage of this bill?

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. This is precisely similar to the case of Major Myers of the Quartermaster's Department. That case was thoroughly investigated by the committee, reported favorably by the committee at the last session of Congress, and passed by the House and Senate, to restore Major Myers to his place over these same gentlemen. Both sides have had an opportunity to be heard before the committee and have had ever since the case was presented.

Mr. ELDREDGE. What are the reasons for this bill?

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. The reason is that the two persons over whom these men are now to be promoted were promoted contrary to law in 1865 by the Secretary of War.

Mr. GARFIELD. To be more explicit, I will ask the gentleman what effect this will have upon Quartermaster Ekin; whether it will not overslaugh him, and leave him in a much less favorable condition in regard to rank than he now is, and whether he has been heard before the committee either by himself or his friends?

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I can say to the gentleman that General Ekin has not been before the committee. But this question has now been open for a year; and every time it has been brought before the committee in any case—in the Inspector-General's Department, in the Quartermaster-General's Department, and in any other Department where officers have been overslaughed and others promoted outside of the law—the committee have adopted measures to correct it. This is one of the few cases adjudicated by the committee.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I would like to put a few questions to the gentleman. In the first place, has not General Ekin been sent out to the plains and been far away during the pendency of all this matter? Has he had any notice of this proceeding? And is there not an order of the War Department that no officer shall apply to a committee of Congress unless he gets permission from his superior?

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. Yes, sir; and I think it is a very unjust order, and I hope the Secretary of War will revoke it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Has General Ekin been heard at all? Could he be heard or could he apply for a hearing?

Mr. NESMITH. That question has been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary for a report, but never has been reported upon.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that this is not a question concerning General Ekin or anybody else in his position. It does not make any difference how it affects him. I do not know what interest the gentleman from Massachusetts has in General Ekin.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have no interest except to see that a valuable officer is not overslaughed without a hearing.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. Here were two valuable officers overslaughed.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Not by Congress.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. No sir, but by the Secretary of War. He promoted these men when he had no right to do so; the promotion was contrary to law.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. When was that?

Mr. MACDOUGALL. At the time of this appointment of General Ekin.

Mr. NESMITH. Upon the reorganization of the Army.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. It was done when the Army was reorganized. We have a decision of the Attorney-General upon this subject declaring that these promotions were made contrary to law.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. The Committee on Military Affairs now propose simply to do justice to these two officers.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. This is the report of the committee.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. No matter whom it may affect, it is a matter of justice to these two officers that they should receive this promotion.

The question being taken on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, there were—ayes 70, noes 20; no quorum voting.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I must insist upon a further count; and I wish to inquire whether this does not provide for some new officer?

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. No, not at all. This officer has been in the Army twenty-five years.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is not this bill subject to the point of order that it must go to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. That point comes rather late.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. WHEELER.) It is too late for that point to be made.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I ask that the opinion of the Attorney-General on this question be read.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The opinion of the Attorney-General has nothing to do with it.

Mr. SCOFIELD. If I understand this bill its object is to take two men out of the position in which their service according to the military law of the country places them, and to promote them over the heads of quite a number of others. In other words, it is proposed by special legislation to break in upon the established rule of the Army and Navy to promote by seniority except in certain cases.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I will say to the gentleman that that is the proposition we are trying to get at. These gentlemen have been wronged. Two men have been taken out of civil life and placed over the whole list of quartermasters, some of whom have been in the Army for twenty-five years. We are now trying to put these gentlemen back where they should stand. The bill does not change the rank of any officer, but simply the date of their commission.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I think I know better perhaps what I am trying to say than some of the gentlemen who are seeking to instruct me. I know that this bill does not change the rank of these gentlemen; but it changes their position upon the Register of the Army; it places them above men whom they are now below, so that when vacancies happen in the rank above, these men will step up to that higher grade before the men whom it is now proposed to place below them; so that although these men are kept in the same rank, and the men now in that rank are not placed in a lower grade, the latter are placed further from the day of promotion.

Now, the disturbing element is just what the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. YOUNG] has stated. When the war was over, and in fact during the war, we by special legislation broke in upon the old established principle of promotion by seniority in the Army and Navy. We did this in order to do what we thought justice to some men who had distinguished themselves during the war in the defense of their country.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. As quartermasters?

Mr. SCOFIELD. Yes, sir, as quartermasters; for the staff of the Army in many cases deserved as much from their country as the men placed in command. A man who as quartermaster distinguished himself as honest, faithful, resolute, energetic, deserved promotion as much as men who had been in command though they might have done nothing in actual war.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I now yield for five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. DONNAN.]

Mr. SCOFIELD. I have the floor at present. Now, ever since those changes were made by legislation, (whether wisely or not I am not now going to say, but it was what our predecessors thought best at the time,) there has been a struggle on the part of these men who were not so promoted by legislation to get to the place they would have had if the new element had not been brought in by act of Congress.

I would not interfere with the judgment of the Military Committee, because I am aware as a general thing they know much better about their own business than I do; and the only interest I take in this matter is because of the fact which I will state. I would not interfere here except that one effect of this bill is to place a man whom we esteem very much in our State, now on duty in Texas, I believe, below these men, or rather to place these men over him, which we who know him believe will be doing him great injustice. I state frankly to the House why I particularly interfere now with matters I never take much interest in, and it is because I take an interest in this case in common with my colleagues who are in favor of having this man to whom I have referred kept in the place which we think he deserves.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I now yield to the gentleman from Iowa who is a member of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DONNAN. Mr. Speaker, the only cause of disagreement on this bill, as I apprehend, on the part of the House is because it is not understood. This bill now sought to be passed is the fourth one of a precisely like character. The other three were passed, I believe, by unanimous consent of the House, and in this case division has arisen simply because gentlemen do not understand the facts of the case. The objection of my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] has been explained by him. He is afraid some friend of his will be placed lower in grade by this act than would otherwise be the case. It is a sufficient answer to his argument to say that friend of his was placed by misconstruction of the law in rank over and higher than these two officers who have served their country faithfully in the Army of the United States for a quarter of a century. How so? Simply by the construction given to the act of July 28, 1866. There is in that law a provision of this character:

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That the Quartermaster's Department of the Army shall hereafter consist of one Quartermaster-General, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier-general; six assistant quartermasters-general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of colonels of cavalry; ten deputy quartermasters-general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of lieutenant-colonels of cavalry; fifteen quartermasters, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of majors of cavalry; and forty-four assistant quartermasters, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of captains of cavalry.

Now mark what follows:

And the vacancies hereby created in the grade of assistant quartermaster—

Not of quartermaster—

shall be filled by selection from among the persons who have rendered meritorious services as assistant quartermasters of volunteers during two years of the war

Under that section there were four or five of these colonels of volunteers promoted, to the disgrading of these two men who served faithfully for a quarter of a century, and that, too, in violation of the Army regulation which is to be found in paragraph 19, Statutes at Large, page 618, that all promotion in the staff department and corps shall be made as in other corps of the Army, that is, by seniority. I say these officers were overslaughed in seniority in their proper rank by this action of the President. They were disgraded by the act to which I have referred, and they have asked one after another to be placed in the position they were entitled to by statute and by Army Regulations.

This question has been submitted to the Attorney-General of the United States, and he has distinctly decided they are entitled to that rank. What has Congress done? As these men appeared and asked to be placed in the legitimate rank to which they were entitled by the laws and regulations of the Army, have they been placed there? It has been done in the cases of Inspector-General Absalom Baird and Major William Myers. These two officers now ask the same rank which you have given in each case heretofore without division. Why divide on this bill? Why deny the same right to these two officers which you have heretofore granted to others?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to say a word.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Let me make a request. I understand my colleague, who is a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, [Mr. ALBRIGHT,] has been looking after this very bill, and expected to oppose it on the floor of the House when it came up. He is now absent from the city on special business under the order of the House, and I therefore ask whether the gentleman from Georgia will not agree to withhold his report in this case or let it stand over until my colleague shall return?

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I should like to do that, but I am under the order of my committee.

Mr. DONNAN. There is no division in the committee on the subject.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I understand the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs is opposed to the bill.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. We never heard the chairman was opposed to the bill. He agreed to this bill in my charge, upon which I wrote a report. I considered the committee to be unanimous on the subject.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Was Mr. ALBRIGHT present?

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. At that time, but not on this bill. But he did not inform me of any objection to this bill. If I felt authorized to do so I would have no objection to postponing the consideration of this bill, but I am directed by the committee to report the bill, and I feel it my duty to press it to its passage.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Will the gentleman allow me to suggest that the bill be allowed to go over until next Friday without prejudice?

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I cannot agree to that.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Will he not allow me to ask the unanimous consent of the House that it shall take its place on Friday next without prejudice?

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I cannot allow that. I yield to my colleague, the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MACDOUGALL.]

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I wish to say that General ALBRIGHT was present in the committee when the cases of General Baird and General Myers were considered, which were exactly parallel to this. He favored both of them, and favored the passage of the bill relating to those officers. General ALBRIGHT will not oppose the passage of this bill. I know what I assert.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I have no knowledge of my own that he will.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I have no objection myself to let this bill stand over, but I am here by instruction of the committee to ask its passage. The committee is, and the Attorney-General is, in favor of the passage of the bill; the Secretary of War is in favor of it, and the President of the United States is in favor of it. It is right and proper, and ought to be done.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I rise to a question of order. Is it in order to tell us what the views of the President of the United States are in regard to any pending legislation?

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. WHEELER in the chair.) The Chair hardly thinks it proper.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman from Georgia now allow me one moment?

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. This is the old struggle between the volunteers and the regulars; that is exactly what it is—nothing else. When we came out of the war there was an attempt to take certain volunteer officers and promote them for their efficiency, and that was done. Those that were thought to be especially efficient were promoted, and from that hour to this there have been attempts by legislation to put back the regulars over those volunteers. It has been done in four instances.

Mr. DONNAN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes, sir.

Mr. DONNAN. Were not those volunteers put over those regulars in violation to law, or rather with a want of law?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Pardon me, sir; it was done by the then President of the United States and the then Secretary of War of the United States, and done by them believing it to be right; and it has remained so done for something like nine years.

Mr. DONNAN. Will the gentleman allow me to correct him? We have rectified it in three other instances.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Pardon me; I have said that. That is not a correction. I know that the regulars have been pegging away at this. They are all here, attending all the parties and doing all the duties of social life and log-rolling, while the volunteers are out on the plains. Now, Colonel Ekin, who was one of these volunteer officers, and who I believe is a constituent of my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. ALBRIGHT,] was in the first place sent out upon the plains, so that he could not object. Having got him removed from Washington far enough off then they presented a bill. He had a friend on the Committee of Military Affairs, General ALBRIGHT, of whom he was a constituent, and then General ALBRIGHT was sent away to Mississippi or Louisiana, and while he is gone they get the bill through, and say it has the unanimous support of the committee. They make a desert and call it peace.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. The gentleman is mistaken in what he says about General ALBRIGHT.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Pardon me; he is gone and you will not agree to wait until he is back, and the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBURN,] is not here.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I wish to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts what authority he has for stating that General ALBRIGHT would oppose this bill.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] says that two of his colleagues had informed him that he is opposed to the bill. And General Ekin, a volunteer officer who earned his promotion in the field and not by sleeping in Washington, is to be overslaughed by this bill. It is an act of injustice to a volunteer officer.

Now, I agree there have been four other cases which were slipped through when no one of us knew anything about it. There was no division.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. The gentleman is mistaken; there was a division, and we had a pretty hard contest.

Mr. NEGLEY. If the gentleman will allow me, there was this difference: the promotion of the gentlemen made by the previous legislation was deserving, owing to their meritorious conduct in the war; the retention of General Ekin is also required in consequence of his meritorious services.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have only to say that this gentleman is the constituent of General ALBRIGHT; and if General ALBRIGHT, when he returns, agrees to this bill, I shall have nothing further to say. But I ask for fair play. I am always with the under dog in the fight. I always insist there shall be fair play, and do not care whom it hits.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. These gentlemen are the constituents of every member in this House, and ought to be so considered; and with regard to the suggestion which has been made that this is a democratic trick, I beg to say that if there is an extreme radical in the Army, I know it is Rufus Saxton.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. He is the first man that armed the blacks.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. Yes; the first man that armed the blacks; and if I could have prejudice in the matter, that would prejudice me against him; but this is a case of law and of right.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Let me understand. Do you say that Rufus Saxton was the first man who armed the blacks?

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. Yes, sir; I am so informed by my friend from New York, [Mr. MACDOUGALL.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Is that the reason why all the democrats are voting for him?

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. It is not the reason why I vote for him; but I believe this is a matter of justice. The Committee on Military Affairs only desire to do justice. We do not know these men and do not care anything about it. We only follow the decision of the Attorney-General of the United States and the recommendation of the War Department.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Is that the reason why the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. NESMITH] is voting for it—because the Attorney-General has given a decision in favor of it?

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I yield now to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MACDOUGALL.]

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I have sat here to-day and heard the gentleman from Massachusetts sneer at the regular Army.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. O, no; you have not.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. He says they hang around Washington.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Some of the officers do.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. And that they button-hole us.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Well; don't they?

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I want to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts where he learned his lessons at the beginning of the rebellion? Where did we all do it? Did we learn them from the regular Army, or did we send to Massachusetts for a head to lead us, or to New York, or any other State?

Now, I assert on the floor of this House, and I do it by authority and on the record, that no officer on either side in the great contest distinguished himself as anything greater than a division commander who was not a graduate of West Point.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I agree to that; they would not let him.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. They would not? Did not you get a chance?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No; I could not get officers of the regular Army to obey my orders, over and over again, lest a volunteer should come to something. I removed two, and it did not do any good, for I got worse ones in their places.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I have the floor, and I presume I have the right to speak now. I was a volunteer officer myself, and I have great respect for the gentleman from Massachusetts, so far as he went and so far as he was capable of going; but, Mr. Speaker, could he command an army? He tried it. Did not the gentleman try to command an army?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes, sir; I did try to command an army; but because of the insubordination of these men, who hold their offices for life and live here in Washington, seeking places and nothing else, it was impossible to get things done. I ordered two corps commanders to move on Richmond on the 5th of May, when they had ten thousand men under their command, and they would not do it.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. You telegraphed that you had cut all the telegraph lines, and that all was safe.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Pardon me; I had used no telegraph, for there was no telegraph there.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I remember reading your dispatch.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Pardon me; you could not have read that.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. Great injustice is done to the regular Army——

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. We volunteers went home. We did not require to be kept in the service lest we should starve.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I went home, too.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I am glad you did.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman from New York allow me to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question? I was amazed at one statement he made, and I am sure he would not be willing that it should go out in the broad way in which he made it. He stated as a general proposition that officers of the regular Army refused to obey his orders.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I said that two officers of the regular Army, two corps commanders, did so.

Mr. GARFIELD. But previous to that he made a general statement.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I had those two men in my mind when I made the statement.

Mr. GARFIELD. I know nothing about the specific instance to which the gentleman from Massachusetts refers; but I should be sorry to allow the statement to pass unchallenged that officers of the general Army refused to obey orders.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. There is no class of men to-day in this country whose integrity stands so high before the people of the world as the officers of the regular Army and of the Navy. Why? Simply because they hold their places for life. It is their profession and business. An officer of the Army simply certifies on his honor. He is not required to make an oath. Why? If he certifies incorrectly he is blasted for life and turned out of the Army in disgrace. And yet the gentleman from Massachusetts comes here and says that the officers of the regular Army hang around Washington and buttonhole members of Congress for promotion.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I say so.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. Did the gentleman from Massachusetts ever hang around Washington during the war?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No, sir.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. You never did ask promotion?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No, sir.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. It came fast enough. I will simply say this in relation to the regular Army: I wish to say that these men choose a profession and enter into it. Their rank is sacred to them; their honor is sacred to them—the dearest thing on earth to them. During the war we had some gallant volunteer officers; the gentleman from Massachusetts, for instance. Some of them were promoted rashly, impetuously, improperly, and not in accordance with law. Now the Committee on Military Affairs come here and report a bill to correct the record of two of the bravest officers who fought during the war.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Quartermasters!

Mr. MACDOUGALL. Was General Saxton a quartermaster in the war?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. He is a quartermaster now.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. Now, yes; but was he a quartermaster during the war?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. He commanded troops during the war.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. He was quartermaster in South Carolina during the war.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. He commanded a division.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Afterward, yes.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. The gentleman says General Saxton was a quartermaster commanding a division; that shows what he knows about military affairs.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I did not say so.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. What did you say?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I said that he was a quartermaster and afterward commanded a division as major-general of volunteers.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. And was he not a brave officer?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes; though the most I know of him was that he was very efficient in carrying on the Freedmen's Bureau. I think he did well there.

Mr. KELLOGG. I am not in the habit of speaking upon military bills here, for I do not claim to be either a volunteer, like the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, or a regular. Yet from the year I first came here, now nearly six years ago, whenever these Army bills have come up, I have heard the same old unjust attacks on regular Army officers. Now I think it is time that that feeling should be wiped out, and peace and harmony restored between volunteer officers and regular Army officers, as much as I believe we should go for peace and harmony between all sections of the country; and the officers themselves are not in fault, but the men who stir up feeling here.

Mr. NEGLEY. In which branch did you serve?

Mr. KELLOGG. I did not serve in either, as I said. The gentleman cannot disturb me by saying that he served, or by any assumption of that sort. I think that it is but an act of justice to two worthy officers to pass this bill. I know Rufus Saxton well, who is a citizen of the State of the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts. Rufus Saxton grew up in my own neighborhood. I knew him as a boy, and I have followed his course ever since. I say that he has been a true and faithful officer all his life, and has served long and faithfully, and a wrong was done him years ago, and there is no man in the Army who deserves this justice more than he does. I say that it is but a simple act of justice to put these two men where they would have been if a wrong had not been done them. I understand they are both in the same position, and this bill will simply place them where they belong, without any interference with or reduction in rank of any other officer. I think that we ought to do this. And I say also that when the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] and others who were in the volunteer service will cease making these attacks on regular Army officers they will do themselves and the country more credit than they do now.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I would like to yield for further discussion of this bill, but I will lose it if I do not call for a vote now. I hope the House will sustain the unanimous report of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I call for the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The morning hour has expired, and I move to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has the right to call the previous question. The morning hour continues until superseded by some question of higher privilege.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to go into the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion is not in order.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I raised the point of order before the previous question was called.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has ruled that unless some question of higher privilege intervenes, the morning hour does not expire at the end of sixty minutes. The question is upon seconding the call for the previous question.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 78, noes 48; no quorum voting.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I rise to a privileged motion, and move to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion cannot be entertained during a division upon the call for the previous question. No quorum voted, and tellers will be ordered; and the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. BUTLER, and the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. YOUNG, will act as tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported there were—ayes 89, noes 60.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered, which was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. CESSNA. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Suppose that further proceedings upon this bill are suspended at this time, what will be its position on next Friday?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That will depend upon the form in which it is suspended.

Mr. CESSNA. The previous question has been ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has been, and the question now is, "Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time?"

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 115, noes 66.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. CESSNA. I call for the reading of the engrossed copy of the bill.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. Then I will call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The bill has not yet been read a third time.

Mr. CESSNA. And I call for the reading of the engrossed copy of the bill.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. Then, in order to give time to engross the bill, I will move that the House now adjourn; and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CESSNA] to withdraw the demand for the reading of the engrossed bill, as the call of the yeas and nays will simply consume time.

Mr. CESSNA. We may as well spend time on this as on some other folly.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken on the motion to adjourn; and there were—yeas 6, nays 189, not voting 93; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Eldredge, Hagans, Lamison, Southard, Todd, and Pierce M. B. Young—6.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Albert, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Barber, Barrere, Bass, Beck, Begole, Bell, Berry, Biery, Blount, Bowen, Bradley, Bright, Bromberg, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Carpenter, Cessna, John B. Smith, Snyder, Speer, Standiford, Stephens, Strait, Sypher, Taylor, Waddell, Walls, Jasper D. Ward, White, Charles G. Williams, Ephraim K. Wilson, and Wood—93.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

The bill, having been engrossed, was then read the third time.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I call for the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered, and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. YOUNG moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The Chair has just decided that that motion cannot be put. I suppose that the rulings of the Chair must be considered as continuous in their operation; that no matter who may occupy the Chair, the rulings of one Speaker must guide another. The gentleman occupying the Chair a few moments ago decided the motion to go into Committee of the Whole to be not in order.

Mr. WHEELER. I beg leave to differ with my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOFIELD.] The late occupant of the Chair decided no such thing.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. RANDALL. There was yesterday some controversy in this House as to what were the proceedings of the Committee on Banking and Currency in reference to the finance bill. I am now at liberty, by a vote of the committee, to state the proceedings of the committee in regard to that bill. That bill was never before the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to a point of order, not because I have any objection to the gentleman's statement, but that we may have it determined whether——

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the gentleman will wait till he hears me before making his point.

Mr. GARFIELD. No, I want to make the point now. The point is whether a committee has any power to bring into the House a divulgement of the past action of the committee.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest that this thing is entirely amicable; that there is no ill feeling about it. It is a mere question of settling a fact.

Mr. GARFIELD. I want the point decided merely for the sake of settling the question of parliamentary law, not to interrupt the gentleman. I submit that this is a question of the privilege of the House, not of a committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not correct in that. It is not in order under the rules to allude on the floor to anything that has taken place in committee, unless such action appear by a written report sanctioned by a majority of the committee. The committee have the right to disclose their own proceedings; or, in other words, to remove by their own vote the obligation of privacy or secrecy in regard to them. If a sharp point should be made, of course authority would be required in writing.

Mr. RANDALL. It is true, as stated yesterday by the gentleman from Tennessee, the bill was not in the possession of the Committee on Banking and Currency, but that committee did as many committees have done in this House often and again, informally considered that bill; and on motion of the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] it was voted to request the chairman when the bill was considered he should allow two amendments to be submitted to the House; the first amendment that the first and second sections of the bill should be stricken out; and the second, that the bill should be so amended as to insert the words "canceled and destroyed" in their appropriate place in the section relative to the retirement of greenbacks.

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that I did not wish myself to be understood yesterday, nor do I see myself reported in the RECORD as having on yesterday called in question any fact which the gentleman stated. I wish still further to say that my own actions, as those of any other gentleman in his place here, are open and liable to the fullest criticism, which, if made in a fair spirit and with good temper, is perfectly legitimate. I do not deprecate or wish to avert any criticism; but gentlemen here are aware that sometimes it is difficult to decide when one is acting as an organ of the committee and as the organ of the House with the supposed majority one way or the other. As has been stated, this bill was not before the Committee on Banking and Currency. It had been assigned to its order on my motion, the Chair having been pleased to assign me the floor to make it. I hold it to be the duty of any gentleman who takes charge of any measure, unless he is acting as an organ of a committee, and then he must carry out the action of the committee; then it is not a request but an instruction—but aside from that I hold it to be the duty of any one having charge of a general measure to endeavor if possible and bring the majority sentiment of the House to a result, so it shall not be defeated by any indirection or by any proceeding that does not affect the merits of the measure, whatever it may be. As to the limit of discussion and the question of amendment, he must necessarily be governed by his own judgment, and he must take the responsibility to act on it; and if he is not willing to do it he should never rise in this House and attempt to take charge of any measure, but should leave it to others who have more self-poise and more confidence in their own judgment.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman acquired the right to make that motion, as is customary in parliamentary practice, by reason of the fact that he was chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency. Subsequently that subject was considered by his own consent, and the jurisdiction of the committee was not denied by him.

Mr. MAYNARD. I shall not pursue the subject any further.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to say now it was not my intention yesterday to be in the least offensive to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. MAYNARD. It is perhaps proper to say our personal relations have ever been of the kindest character.

Mr. NIBLACK. I should like to know what the gentleman from Tennessee meant yesterday by saying he was responsible here or elsewhere for his conduct. It terrified me somewhat at the time, and I should like to know now whether there was any cause for that terror.

Mr. MAYNARD. What I meant was that I was responsible to my associates upon this floor and to my constituents at home for my action, in this House.

Mr. NIBLACK. I thought it meant more than that. I thought the gentleman meant, when he used the words, something quite different and more belligerent.

Mr. RANDALL. I did not take it in that way.

Mr. NIBLACK. I was therefore curious to know what the gentleman did mean, but as he now says he only meant it in a Pickwickian sense, and not in a fighting way, I feel much relieved.

REPUBLICAN FORM OF GOVERNMENT FOR LOUISIANA.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4212) to provide for a legal and fair election in the State of Louisiana, and to guarantee to said State a republican form of government; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. That cannot be done.

TRANSIT OF VENUS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to report a bill (H. R. No. 4213) to provide for compensating the officers of the Government in observing the transit of Venus; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, provides that the legal compensation and allowance due to the officers of the Government in the parties engaged in observing the transit of Venus shall be paid from the appropriations for the support of the branches of the public service to which such officers are severally attached.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask for the reading of a letter from the Superintendent of the Coast Survey. It explains a decision of the First Comptroller of the Treasury which gentlemen ought to hear, as it is a new ruling, and will have to be provided for in our future legislation.

The Clerk read as follows:

UNITED STATES COAST SURVEY OFFICE,
Washington, December 17, 1874.

DEAR SIR: It has been the constant custom, and had come to have almost the force of law, as a matter of comity between the several Departments of the Government, that officers, specially qualified for the performance of certain exceptional duties, to be executed under a special law, have been temporarily transferred from the Department to which they are attached to another Department, in order to carry out the specific purpose named in the special law. And while officers so transferred were performing the special duty their legal compensations were paid from the appropriation for the support of the branch of public service to which such officers severally belonged.

A law of Congress (Sec. 3678 in the Revised Statutes) passed in 1868, requires that "all sums appropriated for the various branches of expenditure in the public service shall be applied solely to the objects for which they are respectively made, and for no others."

Congress, by an act passed in June, 1872, authorized the observation of the transit of Venus, and appropriated a sum of money to be used for the purpose, under the direction of the Navy Department. The amounts asked for were based upon the supposition that the astronomers not in the employ of the Government should receive no compensation; and that certain other officers of the Army, the Navy, and the Coast Survey should be detailed for the duty. Several officers of the Coast Survey, at the request of the honorable Secretary of the Navy and by direction of the honorable Secretary of the Treasury, were detailed for observing the transit. Subsequent to the departure of two of them, and on the eve of the departure of four others, it was decided by the First Comptroller, and his decision was approved by the honorable Secretary of the Treasury, that under the law above quoted the compensations of the six officers of the Coast Survey during their absence abroad could not be paid from the appropriation for the survey of the coast. It is therefore desirable that a law of Congress shall authorize the payment of the compensation of those officers from the appropriations for the branches of service to which they belong. No additional sum is required, the amount necessary being already appropriated. Authority merely is required to make the payments.

Very respectfully, yours,

C. P. PATTERSON,
Superintendent United States Coast Survey.

Hon. JAMES A. GARFIELD,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives, Washington, District of Columbia.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I would like to have the bill read again.

The bill was again read.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say that the committee are unwilling to recommend a general law, changing what is now the statute on the subject. But it is clearly a case that ought to be taken out of the operation of the general law, and we thought it best to provide for it as it arose, rather than to attempt to make a general law.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CUSTOMS REVENUE.

Mr. KASSON, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4214) declaratory of the act entitled "An act to amend the customs-revenue laws and to repeal moieties," approved June 22, 1874; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read. It declares that nothing in the nineteenth section of the act entitled "An act to amend the customs-revenue laws and to repeal moieties," passed June 22, 1874, shall be construed to affect any authority, power, or right which might theretofore have been legally exercised by any court, judge, or district attorney of the United States to obtain the testimony of an accomplice in any crime against or fraud upon the customs-revenue laws, or any trial or proceeding for a fine, penalty, or forfeiture under said laws, by the discontinuance or dismissal, or by an engagement to discontinue or dismiss any proceedings against such accomplice.

Mr. KASSON. A single word will explain the object of this bill. By the present law no officer or person who in any manner relieves or attempts to relieve from fine, penalty, or forfeiture shall be deemed guilty of a felony. It was not the intention of the Ways and Means Committee to deprive the proper officer of the means of exempting from prosecution for the purpose of obtaining the testimony of an accomplice. But three judges of United States courts regard the present law as preventing that. The Attorney-General does not think it prevents it. The Committee on Ways and Means did not so intend. And as an emergency will very soon arise requiring that the law shall be clear on the subject, the Committee on Ways and Means recommend the adoption of this clause to put the matter beyond doubt.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KASSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON MILEAGE.

Mr. BUNDY, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House the sum of fifty dollars, for clerical services rendered the Committee on Mileage during the present session.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS IN NEW MEXICO.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting ten reports of the surveyor-general of New Mexico on private land claims in said Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

FOULKES & WINSTON.

On motion of Mr. WHITEHEAD, by unanimous consent, the House reconsidered the vote by which the bill (H. R. No. 3763) for the relief of Foulkes & Winston was this day ordered to be laid on the table; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that when the House adjourns to-day, it be to meet on Monday next.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 97, noes 43.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. G. F. HOAR in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of business on the Private Calendar.

OFFICERS AND CREW OF WYOMING AND TA-KIANG.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 782) for the relief of the officers and crew of the United States ship Wyoming and the Ta-Kiang.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to raise the question of order as to the subjects that should first come before the committee for consideration at this time. I send to the desk to be read the rule of the House relating to this subject, as found on page 34 of the Digest. I ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUSINESS—UNFINISHED AT END OF A FIRST SESSION.

After six days from the commencement of a second or subsequent session of any Congress, all bills, resolutions, and reports, which originated in the House, and at the close of the next preceding session remained undetermined, shall be resumed and acted on in the same manner as if an adjournment had not taken place. And all business before committees of the House at the end of one session shall be resumed at the commencement of the next session of the same Congress as if no adjournment had taken place.

And by the twenty-first joint rule the resumption of all undisposed-of bills, resolutions, and reports, which originated in either house, is in like manner provided for. The word "resolutions" in the foregoing rule has been invariably held to apply to "joint resolutions" only.

Mr. HOLMAN. My point is that under the rule business is to be resumed as if no adjournment had taken place. A portion of this Calendar had been considered prior to the adjournment; and I submit that the committee should now proceed with it from the point where it left off at the last sitting of the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, as if no adjournment had intervened.

Mr. MYERS. That is exactly what we are doing.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. We left off just at this bill, No. 782.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed by the Clerk that the Calendar is being proceeded with in the order in which it stood before the adjournment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I thought the committee had gone clear through the Calendar on objection-day.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. But this is not objection-day. Of course, if it were objection-day, we should have begun where we left off when it was objection-day. But this not being objection-day, we begin with the first case upon the Calendar.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not understand that there is any difference as to the rule in taking up the Calendar, whether it be objection-day or not. In either case we have to proceed with the Calendar under the rules.

The CHAIRMAN. The validity of the opinion expressed by the gentleman from Indiana depends on a fact. The Chair is of opinion that on resuming the Calendar on any day which is objection-day, the Calendar is to be taken up from the point where it was left off on the previous objection-day, unless an adjournment has intervened and a new session commenced. In that case after the expiration of six days the rule will be applicable. If this were objection-day, the rule would require going back to the business as it stood on the last day of the preceding session; but unless the point of order were raised on the first day, not objection-day, on which the House took up the Private Calendar, it cannot be raised. It cannot be raised after the Committee of the Whole has gone on from day to day considering the Calendar.

Now, the Chair is informed by the Clerk that, as a matter of fact, the bill now called would be the first in order under the construction of the rule contended for by the gentleman from Indiana. Of course the present occupant of the chair cannot undertake to know for himself the order of business in the committee heretofore.

Mr. HOLMAN. My recollection is that this bill had been considered on a day which was not objection-day; at least I find bills further down on the list which I know have already been considered by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will overrule the point of order on the ground that if the fact be as reported to the Chair by the Clerk, the point of order does not apply. If the fact be otherwise, the point should have been taken on the first day after the expiration of the six days from the commencement of the session on which the House went into committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is, however, the first day the House has gone into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar since the adjournment.

The CHAIRMAN. This rule does not apply to the adjournment for the holidays, but for the session.

Mr. HOLMAN. Since the first adjournment of this Congress the House has not been into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. It is so far a question of fact, but the Chair is informed by the Clerk that at the last session before the adjournment, when the House was in Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, this bill was reached in order.

Mr. HOLMAN. If that is the fact, of course it is properly before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair relies for his knowledge of the fact entirely upon the Clerk.

The bill was then read.

It authorizes and directs the Secretary of State to sell so many of the registered bonds of the United States, now under his control, belonging to the Japanese indemnity fund, as shall realize $125,000, and shall pay the proceeds of the same to the Secretary of the Navy, who shall cause the whole amount thereof to be distributed among the officers and crew of the United States ship Wyoming, and officers and crew who manned the Ta-Kiang on the 5th, 6th, 7th, and 8th days of September, 1864; the same to be distributed as sea-pay to the officers and crew attached to the Wyoming, according to the pay-roll of the ship on the 16th day of July, 1863, and to the officers and crew detached from the United States ship Jamestown, and who manned the Ta-Kiang, according to the pay-roll of the ship on the 5th, 6th, 7th, and 8th days of September, 1864: provided that the provisions of this act shall be held and taken to be in full satisfaction for all bounty or claim for bounty on the part of the officers and crews aforesaid, under any and all existing laws of the United States or regulations of the Navy Department, for the destruction of piratical vessels at Simonoseki on the 16th day July, 1863, and bombarding the forts erected at the straits of Simonoseki in September, 1864. And if any of the officers or crews aforesaid shall have received any bounty for the service aforesaid, the same shall be deducted from the amount to be paid such officer or seaman under the provisions of this act; and it provides further that no money shall be paid to any assignee of the mariner, but only to the mariner or his duly authorized attorney in fact, or, in case of his decease, to his legal representatives, excluding any assignee.

The Committee on Naval Affairs reported the bill with the following amendments:

In line 21 strike out the words "or claim for bounty," and insert in lieu thereof the words "ransom or prize-money, or claim therefor."

In line 30, after the word "bounty," insert the words "ransom or prize-money."

Add to the bill the following section:

SEC. 2. That the remainder of the Japanese indemnity fund is hereby covered into the Treasury of the United States, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to cancel the bonds belonging to the said fund.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make the point of order on that last amendment that it is public legislation and is not in order in a private bill.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I make the point of order that it is not germane to the bill, and is in the nature of public legislation.

Mr. MYERS. I desire to offer an amendment before the point of order is made.

Mr. GARFIELD. Well; I reserve the right to make the point of order.

Mr. MYERS. I move to amend the proposed second section by inserting after the word "fund" in line 2 the words "now invested in registered bonds of the United States."

Mr. GARFIELD. I make my point of order to cover the whole of the second section as being public and not private legislation.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would like to submit a single remark on the subject of that point of order, and it is this: That the point is very different to what it would be if this were an amendment now offered to a private bill; that is to say, if a proposition looking to general legislation was sought to be incorporated in a private bill. In that case I admit that the point of order that the amendment is not germane would have to be sustained; but the committee of the House to whom this subject-matter has been referred reported a bill which contains not only provisions of a private nature but also of a public nature. Now, that is legislation that occurs every day. And the question cannot come up as to whether it is germane, because this is the subject-matter of the bill. It is a thing of constant occurrence that a bill not only embraces matters of private concern, but also of public concern, and the question, I submit, as now presented, is entirely different from what it would be if the point were raised upon an amendment now offered for the first time proposing legislation of a public character.

Mr. GARFIELD. On the point of order I desire to say this: We are now engaged on the Private Calendar under the rules. The rule is imperative that a private bill cannot be considered in this committee if it includes general public legislation. The Japanese indemnity fund is a matter of general concern. It has been temporarily placed in the hands of the Secretary of State as a yet undisposed of public fund. The proposition hitherto has been that we do not own it—that it is with us a trust fund. Several bills have at different times been introduced to restore that fund to the Japanese and Chinese governments respectively. In many ways that fund has been treated as a great and difficult public question.

There is a bill in this committee, on the Private Calendar, which proposes to dispose of that fund by turning it into the Treasury and treating it as the property of the United States. I hold that that is virtually inconsistent with the rule that private bills shall not contain public legislation. That point is good not only against the section as a part of the bill, but of course it is good as to the proposed amendment to the section.

Mr. MYERS. I ask to be heard, having reported the bill.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I would suggest to the Chair that if the point of order is good, it takes the whole bill with it. You cannot say that a portion of the bill is of a public character, and therefore that portion must be stricken out of the bill, for it will take a vote of the committee to strike out any portion of the bill. Therefore if the objection is good, it lies against the whole bill.

Mr. MYERS. I think I have yielded sufficiently for the discussion of a point of order which has been kindly permitted by the Chair. In reply to my friend from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] he takes it for granted that because the United States have received from Japan a certain sum of money, and somebody or various bodies have for years past been trying to return it to Japan, therefore the United States Government has nothing to do with it. The subject of the Wyoming claim was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. That committee in a previous Congress reported a bill to give the men who brought that money to the Government the equivalent of bounty, which under a mere technical view of the law they are deprived of. And this House in the last Congress passed as a private measure a bill giving them this identical sum out of this fund, $125,000. No such objection existed to the payment of $125,000; then no such objection would lie to the payment of $250,000.

Now, in order that the Chair may fully understand the question before he rules upon the point of order, let me say this: It is proper in the decision of this point of order that the Chair and the committee should understand exactly the question before them. We received from Japan, under the treaty of Simonoseki, what the Secretary of State reported to amount to $842,000 on March 5, 1874. At that time only half the amount had been received. In 1872 the House of Representatives, so far as it could, remitted the other half of the sum to Japan, to promote good feeling between the countries; but the Senate did not concur. The President now informs us that we have recovered another installment of the sum due.

This bill does not propose to marshal that fund into the Treasury, but it proposes to place there so much of the half first paid us not given to these seamen. If it is a private bill to pay these men $125,000 out of the fund, it is just as much germane to provide for the payment of the balance to them. And why cannot an amendment to place it in the Treasury be germane? This bill was properly sent to the Committee on Naval Affairs. It is a private bill; it is properly on the Private Calendar, because sent there by order of the House after it was reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs. Therefore the objection, if it originally existed, has no force now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not desire to hear the point of order further discussed. The Chair is of opinion that an amendment reported by a committee to a bill is liable to the same objection as if moved by a member on this floor. It is very clear, that a proposition to dispose in any particular way of a trust fund held in the Treasury of the United States is a matter of public legislation; that such a proposition is neither germane to a private bill nor upon a bill on the Private Calendar. The Chair therefore rules the amendment to be out of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. HOLMAN. This bill having been referred to the Private Calendar, I desire to inquire if in the House points of order were reserved upon the bill? If not, then I submit that this point of order comes too late.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No point of order was reserved on the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the point of order is not too late; that under the custom of the House and as a convenient rule it is unnecessary to reserve the point of order, when a bill is referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, that it contains matters of general legislation proposed by way of amendment. The Chair, therefore, holds that the point of order is not too late.

Mr. MYERS. This subject-matter was reported to the House, and was placed on the Calendar by order of the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not know whether the decision of the Chair goes to the extent of reaching the first section; possibly not.

The CHAIRMAN. The decision of the Chair applies only to the second section.

Mr. GARFIELD. I submitted the point only in regard to the first section.

The CHAIRMAN. The decision of the Chair would be strictly appropriate when the second section had been reached and this amendment had been proposed.

Mr. GARFIELD. Now let us have the report read.

The Clerk read as follows:

This bill proposes to pay from the Japanese indemnity fund $125,000 to the officers and crew of the Wyoming, and the officers and crew detached from the United States ship Jamestown, who manned the Ta-Kiang. As this fund, amounting with interest to $842,226.33, is mainly the result of the services of these men in the naval engagements which took place in the straits of Simonoseki, in July, 1863, and September, 1864, your committee believe the appropriation to be an act of undoubted justice, and recommend it as in conformity with the practice and precedents heretofore established.

The history of these engagements, with the causes which brought them about and the excellent results attending them, will, it is believed, fully exhibit the propriety of passing this bill.

In 1863, when nearly all our available naval forces were actively engaged in the patriotic struggle for the maintenance and preservation of the Union, an edict was issued by the Mikado of Japan excluding foreigners from the empire, excepting at certain ports. In pursuance of this edict, one of the daimios, the Prince of Nagato, erected shore batteries on his side of the narrow and dangerous strait of Simonoseki, and undertook to suppress all commerce and capture or destroy all merchant-vessels attempting to pass through this strait; through which, it must be remembered, nearly all the commerce between China and Japan is carried on.

Accordingly, in June, 1863, the Pembroke, an American steamer, bound from Yokohama to Shanghai, when passing through the strait of Simonoseki, was attacked by armed Japanese vessels bearing the ensign of the empire. At the same time the shore batteries opened fire on the Pembroke. The attack was made on the Pembroke in the night-time and while she was lying at anchor, with her guns lashed. Her topmast was cut away and she was otherwise damaged, and only escaped capture or total destruction by weighing anchor and steaming through "Bungo channel, a narrow and unfrequented strait."

Hon. Robert H. Pruyn, then United States minister resident in Japan, made known to the State Department the piratical outrage that had been committed upon the Pembroke by the Prince of Nagato, under the Japanese ensign, and in the execution of the anti-national edict of the Mikado, and asked for instructions.

Mr. Seward, evidently after a full consultation with President Linclon, in reply to the official dispatch of the resident minister, gave him large discretionary power, as the following extract will show:

"If, in your judgment, it should be necessary for the Wyoming to use her guns for the safety of the legation or of Americans residing in Japan, then her commander will employ all necessary force for that purpose.

"The Secretary of the Navy will give all necessary instructions to the commander of the Wyoming in harmony with the views of the President expressed in this dispatch. (See E. Doc., vol. 2, 1863-'64, No. 43, page 1127.)"

In pursuance of the foregoing authority and instructions, the minister resident issued the following orders:

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Yokohama, July 15, 1863.

* * * * * * * *

I indulge the hope that by the time this reaches you their piratical vessels will have been destroyed or captured. If so, you may have been attacked by the batteries, and have doubtless demolished them. Should their ships unfortunately have taken the alarm and escaped, I would recommend that you do not return without vindicating our flag and taking full satisfaction for the outrages upon it.

And I beg you to co-operate with Admiral Juaris in the destruction of the batteries and forts in the territories of the prince, thus giving a lesson which will not soon be forgotten, and which will put a stop to the acts of lawless violence which the hostile daimios, encouraged by the humane forbearance of the treaty powers, are so ready to commit.

I am, very respectfully, your most obedient, humble servant,

ROBERT H. PRUYN,
Minister Resident in Japan.

Captain D. MCDOUGALL,
United States Steamer Wyoming, &c.

In obedience to the orders of the properly-constituted authorities of the United States Government, the Wyoming weighed anchor at Kanagawa on the 13th of July, 1863, and set out on her voyage to the strait of Simonoseki. She entered the bay of Simonoseki on the morning of the 16th of July. When she approached the entrance of the bay the fort next to her fired a signal gun, which was answered by all the forts and by the ships in harbor. At this time the Wyoming had no flag up, but upon the signals being fired she hoisted her flag and proceeded into the bay, keeping as close as she could to the northern shore, contrary to the expectations of the Japanese. The first fort immediately opened a heavy fire upon her, and so did all the others, as she moved slowly on, shelling the forts with such an effect as to silence such of them as received her fire. The men in the forts which received shells from the Wyoming were observed to rush off and to jump from the heights in such a precipitate manner as to lead to the belief that the shells must have told with greater effect and done more damage than the Japanese anticipated.

The bark and the brig Lanrick—the two vessels which fired on the Pembroke—were still there, and another vessel also, the steamer Lancefield. Those vessels lay close under the town, the bark being inside, the Lanrick next to her, and the Lancefield outside, with steam up, and a great number of men on board, apparently making preparations to approach and board the Wyoming. Captain McDougal ordered the Wyoming to be taken between the Lancefield and the Lanrick, and prepared to give each of them a broadside in passing. The Lanrick fired first, but immediately after the Wyoming delivered her broadside on the two Japanese vessels and sent a ball through the stern of the Lanrick in such a way as to leave her apparently sinking. The Wyoming moved on slowly, firing into the forts of the town as she went, and making a curve to enable her to return fire on the ships again; but, as she was turning, the Lancefield moved on across the track of the Wyoming further into the bay to escape at the western outlet, but the Wyoming, while curving, brought her great pivot gun to bear on the Lancefield in her new position, and sent a ball right through her boiler, causing her to blow up, and scattering destruction through every part of the vessel; steam, cinders, &c., were blown out in all directions, and such of the crew as were not immediately overwhelmed jumped overboard. The Wyoming returned under a slack fire from the forts, and, having done all that she deemed necessary for that time, she returned to Kanagawa to report what had taken place. She arrived here about 2 a. m. on the 20th of July. The engagement lasted an hour and ten minutes. The Wyoming received eleven shots, and had four men killed in action and seven wounded, one of whom died on the passage back.

This is substantially the description of the engagement as it appears in the Japan Commercial News of July 22, 1863.

For a time the punishment inflicted on the Prince of Nagato seemed to be all that could have been desired, but he rebuilt his forts, and fresh insults were offered to the flags of several nations. This conduct was evidently inspired from higher authority, the edict of the Mikado against foreigners being its main instigation, and Great Britain, France, and the Netherlands sent fleets to the bay of Simonoseki to open the passage of the straits, inviting the United States to give the moral force of their presence and to participate in the action. We had at Yokohama at the time but one ship, the Jamestown, a sailing-vessel; and as the current in the straits was very rapid, it was deemed best to charter a small steamer called the Ta-Kiang, which, with the vessels of the powers named, participated in the naval engagement against the shore batteries of the daimio on September 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8, 1864.

Lieutenant Frederick Pearson, of the Jamestown, was placed in command of the chartered steamer Ta-Kiang by Captain Price, commanding the Jamestown, under the following orders:

"UNITED STATES STEAMER JAMESTOWN,
"Yokohama, Japan, August 11, 1864.

"SIR: You are hereby appointed to the command of the chartered steamer Ta-Kiang, and will proceed in her to the straits of Simonoseki, to act in concert with the treaty powers, who will appear in large force at that place.

"The object of sending the Ta-Kiang is to show the American flag there, and to manifest to the Prince of Nagato that we are in accord with the other treaty powers, and equally demand with them the passage through the straits without let or hinderance.

"As the steamer under your command is not a man-of-war or prepared to attack the forts, you will render any and every other aid in your power to promote the common object—such as towing boats, landing men, and receiving the wounded on board of you, if required to do so. To this end you will consult the senior officer present, particularly the British admiral, who will be senior officer of the expedition, and who will have the largest force there."

Lieutenant Pearson, not satisfied with these orders, obtained permission to take the Ta-Kiang under fire. With three officers and fifteen men, armed with a Parrott gun, or howitzer, and Sharp's rifles for each man, the Ta-Kiang went into the battle.

The engagement continued five days, and ended in a victory to the fleets, the Japan prince making an unconditional surrender, and, according to Minister Pruyn, "agreed to pay such sum as the ministers of the treaty powers might demand for the expenses of the expedition." And Mr. Pruyn also says (Dip. Cor. 1864-'65, part 3, page 553) "Ensign Pearson, of the Jamestown, who was placed in command of the United States chartered steamer Ta-Kiang, I am happy to say, conducted himself so as to receive the special written thanks of Admiral Kuper, commanding the combined fleet, and a large bronze 32-pounder gun was assigned to said ship as a trophy. The 30-pounder gun of the Jamestown was used by him with such precision and efficiency as to command universal admiration." And the diplomatic correspondence of J. Hume Brumley to Mr. Seward (Dip. Cor. 1865-'66, part 2, page 17) shows the warm appreciation of the services of the Ta-Kiang by the lords commissioners for the ready co-operation which that gallant officer afforded to the British admiral during the whole of the operations in question.

The result was that the Tycoon, being forced to acknowledge and recognize the active hostilities of his subject prince as acts of piracy, was constrained to enter into a conventional treaty with the diplomatic authorities of the United States of America, Great Britain, France, and the Netherlands, which was concluded on the 22d day of October, A. D. 1864, and afterward accepted and ratified by all the aforementioned powers; the public proclamation of all which was formally made by the President of the United States on the 9th day of April, A. D. 1866.

Article I of said treaty stipulates and provides that the Japanese government shall pay to the other four powers the sum of $3,000,000 as indemnity for piratical depredations of "Movi Daizen, Prince of Nagato and Smoo." This sum was to be paid in quarterly installments of $500,000 each. Part of it was so paid, received, and accepted, and divided by and between the four powers mentioned, the United States Government receiving the sum of $586,125.87 in gold, which was afterward converted into United States Government bonds, that are still in the custody of the Secretary of State, under the designation of the "Japanese indemnity fund," and now, as above stated, amount to the sum of $842,226.33. The unpaid installments, of one-half, at the request of the Japanese minister, and in order still further to promote friendship between the United States and Japan, it has been proposed to remit, and a bill for that purpose passed the House of Representatives on May 29, 1872, was reported favorably by the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, and was pending at the adjournment of the last Congress.

The Japanese vessels in the engagement of 1863 were destroyed or sunk, and not taken as prizes. Again, as these ships were not, strictly speaking, "enemy's ships," the bounty of $200 allowed by the act of July 17, 1862, for each person on board of "any ship or vessel of war belonging to an enemy" sunk or otherwise destroyed in an engagement, if of equal or superior force, cannot be claimed as an absolute right.

These vessels were treated as piratical, and their hostile character not recognized by the Japanese government. Yet the Prince of Nagato was powerful enough to set that government at defiance, and had he not been finally subdued, there is little doubt that not only would the straits of Simonoseki have been closed to commerce, but several of the ports which had been opened under our treaties; and that the government of Japan would have openly assumed a hostile attitude toward foreigners.

The officers and crew of the Wyoming are entitled to no less credit for their brave and meritorious service than if they had sunk or brought in as prize the vessels of an enemy.

A letter of the United States consul at Yokohama at that time, Hon. George S. Fisher, to an officer of the Navy, thus speaks of the value of these ships:

"The vessels destroyed by the Wyoming were the British brig Alert, clipper-built, twelve guns, and a very superior sailing-vessel. She was sold to the Japanese government for $45,000, Mexican money.

"The British steamer (iron) Lancefield, sold but a few weeks previously ostensibly to the Japanese government, but really to or for the Prince of Nagato, for $160,000, Mexican money, and the American bark Daniel Webster, also sold to the Japanese government for $22,000, Mexican money.

"These vessels, with the batteries placed upon the Lancefield and Webster, and the other public property of the enemy upon the three destroyed, amounted in value to full $300,000 or $350,000 of our money."

The engagement in September, 1864, in which the Ta-Kiang took so gallant a part was entirely with shore batteries. It ended, however, not only in silencing them, and opening the straits to unimpeded commerce, but in the capture of the town of Simonoseki, part of the indemnity stipulated for in the treaty being for the "ransom" of that town, and the sum to include also all "past aggressions on the part of Nagato," which clearly covers the attack on the Pembroke and the fight with the Wyoming. While the facts stated in relation to these two ships, the Wyoming and Ta-Kiang, do not technically bring them within the principles of our prize-laws, yet the value of the vessels sunk by the Wyoming, two of which were afterward raised and sold by the Prince of Nagato, who was forced by the Tycoon to pay the indemnity subsequently received by us, and the very large ransom and indemnity which the actions of both these vessels were so instrumental in obtaining, fully entitle their officers and crews to the sum named in the bill reported, the passage of which your committee earnestly recommend.

As there are no other parties who have an equitable claim upon the Japanese indemnity fund, the committee recommend that it be transferred to the Treasury and the bonds canceled.

Mr. MYERS obtained the floor.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS] will permit me a moment, I desire to ascertain exactly what portion of this bill is pending. The point raised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] that the committee had lost jurisdiction of the whole bill because a portion had been struck out on a point of order, was not ruled upon, I think.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the attitude of the bill as he understands it. The bill was introduced originally by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.] It was thereupon referred by the House to the Committee on Naval Affairs. That committee did not report a new bill, which might have been within their province, they having jurisdiction over the general subject, but reported back this bill with a distinct amendment; so that if the bill had not been referred to the Committee of the Whole at all, but had been considered in the House, the question would have been on the amendments proposed by the committee separately. Thereupon the bill and the amendments were referred, by order of the House, to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar; and if the amendments had been in order the Committee of the Whole would treat these amendments proposed by a committee exactly as they would treat an amendment proposed by a member of the committee from his place on the floor.

Now, one of these propositions undertakes to amend the bill by adding to it matter of public legislation; and the Chair rules that the amendment is out of order, and that it is not too late to raise the objection that it is out of order after the reference of the bill and amendments by the House to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar. The gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] the Chair presumes, will see that this ruling is not only in the direction of promoting the convenience of the House, but also of preventing improper legislation; for otherwise, whenever, as happens in such numerous instances, a bill is reported by a committee, and without any examination by the House is referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, it would be possible to bring the whole general legislation of the country on any subject whatever before the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and so before the House, out of order. The Chair therefore rules that this proposed amendment, adding to the bill the second section, is out of order, and that the remainder of the bill is properly before the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Will the Chair allow me to state the point that I made, as I see the Chair has not replied to it, and perhaps did not fully understand it?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Pennsylvania anew.

Mr. SCOFIELD. If the Chair will refer to the back of the bill he will find this:

March 17, 1874. Reported back with amendments; committed to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

The gentleman from Massachusetts presented this bill to the House; the House sent it to the Committee on Naval Affairs, who reported it back with amendments. Now, if that had been all, then the decision of the Chair would, in my judgment, be correct. But that was not all. The House then took the bill up again as a new bill. The Committee on Naval Affairs——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will correct the gentleman. The House did not take it up as a new bill, but as a pending bill with pending amendments.

Mr. SCOFIELD. In the first place, the gentleman from Massachusetts presents this bill to the House; afterwards the Committee on Naval Affairs reports the bill with amendments; then the House acts on the report of the Naval Committee exactly as the House acted upon the bill when presented by the gentleman from Massachusetts. The House sends the bill as a whole to the Committee of the Whole House, just as in the first place it was sent to a standing Committee. Now, then, the House having sent the bill in the shape in which it came from the Naval Committee to the Committee of the Whole House, the, whole or more of the bill is referred to that committee for action; and if after the House sent it to that committee it is found that portions of it cannot be acted upon on this day, the whole bill must go over.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair apprehended the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and ruled that the reference by the House to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar of a bill with a proposed amendment, which amendment is a matter of general public legislation, does not prevent the raising in that committee of the point of order that the proposed amendment is a matter of general public legislation and not in order before the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LAWRENCE. May I be allowed to make an inquiry?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Suppose the House should refer a bill with a pending amendment to the Committee on the Judiciary, or the Committee on War Claims, or any other standing committee. Now, when a bill with a pending amendment is so referred, is it competent for that committee to say that the reference was wrong, and to refuse to consider the matter referred? Does not the Committee of the Whole House stand exactly in the same position with relation to the House that a standing committee does to the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the Committee of the Whole House does not stand in this particular in the same relation to the House as the others, the general standing committees of the House, do. The Committee of the Whole House is confined to a particular function.

Mr. GARFIELD. My colleague [Mr. LAWRENCE] will remember that a reference to the Committee of the Whole is a reference under the rules. The rules of the House operate here as they do in the House.

Mr. LAWRENCE. If objection had been made in the House, I should think that to be probably correct; but I do not see how this committee can determine that it will not consider anything that has been referred to it by the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS] will proceed.

Mr. MYERS. The report of the committee just read at the Clerk's desk is a long one, and I hope it was attentively listened to by members of the House.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will give us some further explanation of this case.

Mr. MYERS. The object of the bill is to pay the equivalent of prize or bounty money to men equitably entitled who are deprived of it by the strict technicalities of the law, and to pay that money out of more than a million dollars which the Government of the United States possesses, the result of the bravery in battle of these very men. If I could feel that I was not tiring the committee, I would briefly recapitulate the facts in this case. The report so fully stated them, however, that I believe nothing more is needed. If therefore my friend, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] the only one who demands further explanation, does not press me, I will no longer retain the floor.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Members of the House do need some further explanation, and I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will give it.

Mr. MYERS. A bill, as I have already stated, passed this House for a like amount of money during the last Congress, appropriating $125,000 to the men of the Wyoming. There have been four favorable reports in the Senate, two of them rewarding only the men of the Wyoming. By some inadvertence they failed to include the men of the Ta-Kiang. In 1872 a bill was reported by Senator STOCKTON, including the men of both vessels. Again, during the first session of the present Congress, Senator CRAGIN reported a bill to the same effect. I mention these facts to show the favorable disposition of Congress heretofore in the matter; and certainly the measure proposed is one of the simplest justice to men whose exploits reflected great credit upon our Navy, and brought a substantial benefit to the country far greater than the money we have received under the treaty.

Commodore Perry's treaty with Japan, the first between that country and any foreign power, opened the ports of Simoda and Hakodadi to American vessels. This was followed by similar advantages allowed to several of the European powers. In 1857 Perry, by convention, procured the opening of the port of Nagasaki, and in 1858 our minister, Townsend Harris, concluded a commercial treaty which gave us entry into Kanagawa and other ports and a residence for the United States minister at Yeddo. The Japanese, who for hundreds of years were forbidden all intercourse with other nations, were violently opposed to these liberal measures, and a large anti-foreign party, led by the Mikado, the then spiritual head of the empire, and many of the native princes, bid fair to annul the treaties. The Tycoon was completely overawed, one of the British legation officers was murdered, and several legation buildings were burned.

Matters in Japan were daily growing worse. An edict of the Mikado excluded foreigners from most of our treaty ports. Mr. Pruyn, our minister, wrote Mr. Seward that every offer was made to have the port of Kanagawa closed, and in June, 1863, the Japanese government announced to the Tycoon and Mikado that there was no foreigner in Yeddo.

It was just after this, in July, 1863, that Prince Nagato, who owned the territory at the entrance of the straits of Simonoseki, determined to close these straits against commerce. They form the chief passage between the islands of Japan through which the commerce from China floats, and are almost in a direct line between San Francisco and Shanghai by way of Nagasaki. In going from Yokohama through the inland sea, they avoid a rough outside passage of one hundred and fifty miles, which is frequently dangerous.

Under Nagato's orders a Dutch corvette was fired upon about this time, and also a French vessel, and finally the American steamer Pembroke, injuring her materially, and compelling her to take the outside passage in a severe storm of five days, during which she was nearly lost. The damage in all to the vessel was ascertained to be $10,000.

In view of the outrages upon our citizens in Japan, Mr. Seward, after consultation with Mr. Lincoln, had already given orders to Mr. Pruyn to send the Wyoming to punish them with force, if found necessary, and to keep the treaty ports open. Mr. Pruyn consulted with the United States consul at Kanagawa, and determined to take decisive measures. No minister ever acted with better judgment than Mr. Pruyn, as his actions and correspondence with the Government will show. He ordered Captain McDougal to proceed at once with the Wyoming and open the strait of Simonoseki at all hazards. On July 16, 1863, our vessels appeared at the entrance of this passage, and then followed the battle detailed fully in the report just read. She had to contend with seven batteries, masked, upon precipitous rocks seventy feet in height, with three forts, and the three vessels named—a bark, a brig, and a large iron steamer. The vessels were sunk, destroyed, or temporarily disabled, and the masked batteries and forts silenced. The Wyoming returned victorious, her victory being the theme of admiration. For a time the straits were freed; but in a few months Nagato rebuilt these forts. Then it was that the English, French, and Dutch powers determined to unite in putting an end to the rebellion in Japan, which had almost seized the reins of power in Japan and was breaking out into open war upon all foreigners. They asked assistance of the United States, not because of the guns we had there, for we had but one vessel near by at the time—the Jamestown, a sailing-vessel, unable to stem the rapid current of the straits. We had to charter what my friend from Massachusetts once called a little bum-boat there. No; they desired the presence of the power of the United States for the moral effect it would have, coming from the nation which had first opened Japan to the outer world and was most respected there.

Ensign Pearson, of the Jamestown, by order, took the Ta-Kiang to aid the fleet and care for the wounded, but insisted on going into the battle, and used his Parrott gun with such effect as to win the praise of the fleet and the especial commendation of the British admiral, Kuper, for his services in the five days' conflict of September, 1864.

And now, Mr. Chairman, what did these battles result in? A treaty was made in 1864, in which these words occur:

The representatives of the United States of America, Great Britain, France, and the Netherlands, in view of the hostile acts of Mori Daizen, Prince of Nagato and Suwo, which were assuming such formidable proportions as to make it difficult for the Tycoon faithfully to observe the treaties, having been obliged to send their combined forces to the straits of Simonoseki in order to destroy the batteries erected by that daimio for the destruction of foreign vessels and the stoppage of trade, and the government of the Tycoon, on whom devolved the duty of chastising this rebellious prince, being held responsible for any damage resulting to the interests of the treaty powers, as well as the expenses occasioned by the expedition, the undersigned, animated with the desire to put an end to all reclamations concerning the acts of aggression and hostility committed by the said Mori Daizen since the first of these acts, in June, 1863, against the flags of divers treaty powers, and at the same time to regulate definitively the questions of indemnities of war, of whatever kind, in respect to the allied expedition to Simonoseki, have agreed and determined upon articles in which $3,000,000 are guaranteed to the four powers, with the privilege, however, to Japan to avoid this payment by opening a port at Simonoseki or on the inland sea.

But, sir, the indemnity in our coffers fades into insignificance beside the fruits of those victories. If unsuccessful, there can be no doubt a bloody war would have been needed to open the ports of Japan. The treaty itself recites enough to prove this. Instead of losing all authority and power for mischief at that time, the Mikado would have become the ruler of the empire and the anti-foreign policy would have prevailed. Not only did these victories bring the indemnity out of which we propose to pay the gallant tars who won them; not only did they destroy the only naval power of Japan; not only did they open that country to an intercourse which is fast changing the views of its rulers as it advances the civilization of its people, but it has fostered our commerce to a wonderful degree, and enabled us to exchange our products with this great empire of the East, adding largely to our revenue.

In the six years which followed Perry's treaty with Japan our imports from there were but $17,000 in value. In the ten years between 1860 and 1870 they were twelve millions. Now they are ten millions a year!

What, then, shall be given to the men who rendered so great a service? They enlisted to fight the rebellion, and while their brethren were obtaining prize-money and bounty they were sent to a distant sea, where their bravery redounded to the glory of the nation and to its material wealth.

Nagato was to every intent an enemy. Mr. Pruyn's official dispatches charge that he was acting under authority of the Mikado, if not of the Tycoon. In May, 1863, as will be seen in the Executive Documents of that year, volume 2, pages 1106 and 1124, the Mikado had ordered the expulsion of all foreigners, and the Tycoon had submitted to his authority on this question. The treaty refers to this very fund as a "war indemnity." We should never have permitted these straits to be sealed even if our flag had been respected in the Japanese towns open to us. Yet, because war had not been actually declared, the men of the Wyoming were not, under the law, entitled to the bounty allowed for sinking an enemy's vessels. In equity their claim is too strong to be ignored. But suppose Nagato was, as claimed, a rebel against Japan, and we were invited by that nation to aid in crushing him; it seems strange to allow our seamen bounty and prize-money against the southern rebellion, but not as the allies of Japan in quelling one against their authority and their solemn treaties with us. Why should not the value of Nagato's vessels be awarded to the Wyoming and part of the ransom of Simonoseki to the Ta-Kiang? Yet we have not recommended nearly the value of those vessels in all; and remember this prince, it is said, was made to pay the indemnity and his possessions were imperialized or confiscated.

In the excitement of our own war this brilliant episode in Japan was scarcely noticed; but our naval history, full as it is of credit to our flag, contains very few conflicts more memorable and certainly very few more beneficial in their results. When this Japanese indemnity is all paid, it will amount to one-tenth of all the money paid under the treaty of Washington for the Alabama claims; and able as was the diplomacy which aided to secure it, but for the bravery of our men, the officers and crews of the Wyoming and Ta-Kiang, we should neither have this fund nor the other benefits I have mentioned without fresh fighting for them.

Some gentlemen here object to this bill and have made points of order against it because, they say, we received too much from Japan, and the fund is held in trust to be returned. Japan only asked a remission of the half which was unpaid in 1872, and in that year I joined in a report from the Foreign Affairs Committee, which was adopted by the House, to grant this request. If Congress shall determine on such a course yet, I shall not stand in the way. But in order to promote friendship between the countries, I will not take part in humiliating Japan by giving back what is not asked and is not due.

During the present Congress we gave as large a sum as that named in this bill to a vessel which did not participate in a fight, but being within signal distance was entitled by law to share in the prize-money. Yet a meritorious claim like this is first objected to because it ought not to be paid out of the very money obtained by the valor or the claimants, and if defeated now will be fought with double vigor should we propose to pay it out of the Treasury.

I earnestly appeal to the committee to give a proper reward to the men of the Wyoming and Ta-Kiang. The country will applaud the act. There are a number of precedents for it, and if there were none it is one which appeals warmly to our sense of justice.

I now yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. WHITTHORNE.]

Mr. LAWRENCE. I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS] a question.

Mr. MYERS. Will the gentleman from Ohio for the present allow my colleague to proceed with his remarks?

Mr. LAWRENCE. Very well.

Mr. MYERS. I yield five minutes to my colleague.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I desire now, if it be proper, to make the motion, or if not, when it is proper, that this bill be reported back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass, and that the balance of the Japanese indemnity fund be covered into the Treasury of the United States. Whenever that motion is proper I desire to make it. I wish that to be understood by the House.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I make the point of order on the latter part of that motion, if it is treated as being now made.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee rose informally; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed the bill (H. R. No. 3819) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes, with amendments, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House of Representatives.

The Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar then resumed its session.

OFFICERS AND CREW OF WYOMING AND TA-KIANG.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. If the motion I have suggested be not proper, I will then move that the bill be reported back to the House, with the recommendation that it be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means with instructions to report such a bill as I have indicated.

Now a word or two, and I shall have done with this question. I regard the proposition in the first place to appropriate $125,000 to the officers and crew of the Wyoming and Ta-Kiang as a gratuity on the part of Congress, if so voted. Under the law as it existed then and as it exists now, looking to the facts, they are not entitled to one cent; but with the view that I have taken of the question as a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, if I can get rid of the fund or know in what direction it is going, then I am willing if it is to be regarded as a fund belonging to the people of the United States, brought into our Treasury by the achievements and conduct of these officers and crews, to make this compensation or gratuity; but if the fund is to be returned to the Japanese government, or to be appropriated for educational purposes, then I am not willing to charge the fund with the payment of this gratuity or compensation. I repeat, that under the law as it existed in 1863, looking to the fact that we were not at war with the Japanese government, that we were at peace with it according to the law, and these captured vessels were not enemy's vessels, we were not according to international law really and justly entitled to any part of that indemnity. I question very much as an original proposition whether in justice and fairness and equity and good faith the United States had any right to demand or receive any portion of this fund from the Japanese government. Having done so and this money having been paid, and that treaty having been made with, so to speak, our colleagues of other governments, I shall not reflect upon their want of good faith or their conduct by favoring a proposition to return it. I will accept it, the Government having acted heretofore; I will not call in question the acts or conduct of our own Government. I will accept it and put it where it belongs, according to the theory of the treaty made with Japan, into the Treasury of the United States. I propose to diminish by doing so the obligations now resting by reason of the investment of this fund on the people of the United States in the payment of interest on these registered and other bonds. I would diminish so much of the public debt and so much, if you please, of the public burden under which the people are now complaining. These being my general views, I shall favor the proposition that I have indicated to the House.

Mr. MYERS. I resume the floor.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to be heard for three or four minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. MYERS. My friend from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] said he had a question to ask, and I suppose he will make it a long one.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I would rather make a little speech of not many minutes.

Mr. MYERS. I will yield to the gentleman for a few minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has thirty-five minutes of his hour remaining.

Mr. MYERS. Then I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE.]

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this fund ought to be covered into the Treasury if the Government has any right to keep it at all. It looks to me very much as though the disposition of the money proposed by this bill is a misappropriation or misapplication of the fund. Let us see the purpose for which our Government received it. By reference to the treaty of 1864, which will be found on page 526 of the collection of treaties which I hold in my hand, it will be found that it is said in the treaty that—

The government of the Tycoon, on whom devolved the duty of chastising this rebellious prince, being held responsible for any damage resulting to the interests of the treaty powers as well as the expenses occasioned by the expedition—

Now, there are two things which this treaty contemplates—the payment of damages resulting to the interests of the treaty powers, among which powers were the United States, and the expenses occasioned by the expedition. Now, what were the expenses contemplated by this treaty? Why, evidently national expenses; those which the Government had already incurred; not those amounts which the Government might afterward choose to give as gratuities, but those expenses which the Government had already incurred. And now, to show that this was the plain object of this treaty, and the payment of this money by the government of Japan at the demand of the United States, let me read a little further on in this treaty. It says:

The Tycoon of Japan, animated with a desire to put an end to all reclamations concerning the acts of aggression and hostility committed by said Mori Daizen since the first of these acts in June, 1863, against the flags of divers treaty powers, and at the same time to regulate definitely the questions of indemnities of war, of whatever kind, in respect to the allied expedition to Simonoseki, have agreed and determined upon the four articles following:

First. The amount payable to the four powers fixed at $3,000,000. This sum included—all claims, of whatever nature, for past aggressions on the part of Nagato, whether indemnities, ransom for Simonoseki, or expenses entailed by the operations of the allied squadrons.

Now what?

Now, it seems to me to be perfectly plain that this treaty did not contemplate an appropriation of this money for any such purpose as that to which this bill proposes to devote a portion of this fund. It is a misapplication of the fund, which does injustice to the Government.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Does the gentleman suppose that any member of this House would agree to any such thing?

Mr. LAWRENCE. As this bill? I think not.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Then why make an argument against what nobody would agree to? Nobody alleges that any such thing was ever thought of.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The question is whether we should devote this money to a purpose which the treaty did not contemplate. If we do, if we obtain money for one purpose and devote it to another purpose, we either have obtained money under false pretenses or we devote it to a purpose which was not contemplated by either of the governments at the time the treaty was made.

I know it is the easiest thing in the world to vote money out of the Treasury. It is the most unpleasant duty that any member of this House has to perform to resist the appropriation of money.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MYERS. I yield for five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to call the attention of the committee to two features of this bill. My first objection to it is that it comes to us the wrong end first. It comes to us as a private bill; it should come to us on the greater issue involved in it, the public question. I mean to say that there is a great public question so interwoven with this measure that you cannot settle this bill without incidentally settling a much greater question, the public and international question, whose money is this that we call "the Japanese indemnity fund?" Hitherto it has been treated not as our money, but as a trust fund.

Mr. MYERS. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. GARFIELD. A trust fund which we held, either to be sent back to Japan or, if we conclude it to be ours, to be put into the Treasury. Now, that public question has never yet been settled. In my judgment it is to be settled as the first step that Congress ought to take on the subject of this fund. If it is our money, then let us put it into the Treasury with the rest of our money. If it belongs to Japan, let us send it home where it belongs. If it is partly our money and partly the money of Japan, then let us divide it and put our share into our Treasury and send the rest of it to the Japanese government.

Now, while it is lying here in the hands of the Secretary of State, as it were, in trust, waiting to be settled, we are asked to settle a claim upon it, which claim has been rejected by the Department. There is no law of the United States that would give this money, or any portion of it, to the officers and crews of these vessels. The State Department says there was no war, no declaration of war, and therefore the law of prize does not apply, and there can be no prize-money. These officers and crews made no capture; they did sink a few junks which, if raised—would not be worth a dollar. They made no capture, there was no prize, and there was no war. Yet we are asked to give $125,000 as a gratuity to the officers and crews of these ships; and to make the giving easy we are told that we can take that amount out of this indemnity fund, and it will not really come out of the Treasury.

That is the reason I said this bill comes to us the wrong end first. It comes to us on the ground of a private claim, and we are asked incidentally to settle great public questions. Now, when the proper time comes, if I can obtain the floor for that purpose, I shall move to report this bill back to the House with the recommendation that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, so that they may take cognizance of the great public question that underlies the bill, or at least report to the House a plan of settlement. And I hope the Committee of the Whole will stand by me in that motion.

Mr. MYERS. I now yield to my colleague from Maryland [Mr. ARCHER] for five minutes.

Mr. ARCHER. In a former Congress I had the honor to report a bill similar to this, and it was passed by the House. Under the law the officers and crews of these vessels are not entitled to draw money as prize-money, and hence they come to Congress; but under all the equities of prize law they are entitled to recover from this fund. The simple reason why they are not entitled under the law is that these acts of aggression against the United States were perpetrated, not by a nation, but by a portion of a nation, which portion was regarded as in rebellion against the government of that country. Had Japan been at war with the United States, there would be no question that the officers and crews of these vessels would have been entitled to the amount that is now asked under the name of head-money. They contended with vessels of superior force, and were entitled, not to the vessels after condemnation, but to what is denominated in prize law as head-money.

This Prince of Nagato having been a rebel to the Japanese government, and his acts being only the acts of a subject of Japan, which the government of Japan afterward assumed, these officers and the crews who were in these vessels are entitled in equity, but not in law, to have this money paid to them.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The existing law does not give them any claim to head-money.

Mr. ARCHER. The existing law would have given them a claim to this money, provided we had been at war with Japan, provided the Prince of Nagato had been a belligerent power. But as we were not at war with Japan and the Prince of Nagato was not a belligerent power, the officers and the crews of these vessels were not entitled to the money. Hence they address themselves to the Congress of the United States in its capacity as a court of equity.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Equity follows the law.

Mr. ARCHER. The sum of $125,000 was fixed by the committee upon the best proof that was before them as to the number of men and the size of the vessels that were engaged in this action. These American officers, under directions from the Navy Department, were to obey the orders of the American minister at that port. They were acting under those orders when they engaged these pirates and sunk their vessels, achieving a complete victory. It is in this way that they come before this Congress.

In reply to what the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] has said about the treaty question, I will say that the very proposition here is indemnity to the families of men who lost their lives in that fight, and partly also to others who constituted the officers and crew of that vessel.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Are they entitled to any indemnity which was not then authorized by law?

Mr. ARCHER. Under the law of nations this claim stands upon the same footing as the demand we have been making upon Spain for redress to the families of the officers of the Virginius who were executed. This is a claim that the families of those who were killed in that contest shall be rewarded; that compensation shall be made for the injury to these citizens.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Our demand on Spain was only with reference to those killed—four of them.

Mr. ARCHER. Very well; what compensation can be made for the death of the American citizens that fell in this contest?

Mr. LAWRENCE. And our demand upon Spain was for the act of a national ship, not a pirate.

Mr. ARCHER. Though in this case one of the belligerents was a pirate, yet the Government of the United States stepped in and made the parent nation father the acts of its citizens, because that nation had not exerted properly its authority to make its citizens preserve peace and amity toward a foreign nation.

Mr. MYERS. Six of our men were killed in that engagement. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. KELLOGG.]

Mr. KELLOGG. I will not detain the committee long with anything I wish to say on this question. No man can read the report of this committee, and the documents furnished by the State Department, without being satisfied that the sailors of these two vessels in winning that victory over those pirates achieved one of the most brilliant victories during the late war.

A MEMBER. What war?

Mr. KELLOGG. I will tell you what war; and when any of my friends object to paying prize-money or head-money to these men, they should remember that our gallant sailors who in the lamentable war of the rebellion were fighting our own countrymen were paid prize-money for every battle when they achieved success in the capture of vessels or property. But these other sailors were engaged in a more hazardous undertaking—fighting pirates on the other side of the globe, and opening up to us the commerce of half the world; enabling this foreign power to conquer its own piratical prince who had rebelled against the imperial power, and continue that commerce to us and other nations from the hour of that victory. I say that if any of our sailors ought to be recognized as entitled to such money, these men deserve such recognition; for they fought their vessels single-handed against odds that might have appalled any but American sailors, and the result of their victory has been a free and uninterrupted commercial intercourse with that empire from that hour to this.

My friend from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] says that this is a trust fund, because it is in the hands of the Secretary of State, and we have never determined whether we will pay it back to Japan or not. Does my friend say that the fund of ten and a half million dollars arising out of the Alabama claims is a trust fund? That we have not determined whether we will pay it back to Great Britain, and for that reason we cannot make any appropriation out of it? This fund stands precisely in the same position as that. Both of these funds are in the hands of the Department of State, and bonds have been issued for them; and they are on interest, for the benefit of such parties as we say ought to share in them.

Now, I am in favor of doing anything we can to cultivate commercial relations with Japan. I voted to give back to that country the other half of the money; almost all of us voted for it; but the bill failed in the Senate for some reason or other. We will vote for it again. But here is one-half of it, which has not been paid by Japan, but paid by that piratical prince who was setting at defiance the laws of his country and of all the world; and I say that with this half now here we ought to do justice to the sailors who won that victory and opened commerce for us through those straits at a time when our own energies were all concentrated here at home in the great struggle to preserve the Union. If you would do justice, pay them out of this or some other fund, precisely as you paid the gallant sailors who won the victories in our own waters against foes nearer home.

Mr. MYERS. I yield to my colleague, [Mr. SCOFIELD.]

Mr. SCOFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I believe that a legislator who makes bargains almost always gets cheated. On this bill I made a kind of a bargain; and I find that, in consequence of the ruling of the Chair, which cuts out of the bill everything that commended it to my support, I have been cheated, as perhaps I ought to have been. I thought it was very questionable whether Congress ought to appropriate $125,000 as prize or bounty-money to the officers and crew of these two vessels. We did make an appropriation of, I think, $200,000 for the officers and crew of the Kearsarge that sunk the Alabama.

Mr. MYERS. One hundred and ninety thousand dollars.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The officers and crew of another vessel which, under the command of Commodore Collins, took the Florida, which was afterward sunk, made application for similar reward; and that bill is now pending before the Naval Committee. The officers and crew of the Monitor that drove back the Merrimac in that celebrated contest have made application for similar recognition; and that is pending before the Naval Committee also. Quite a number of cases somewhat like these, originating in the late war, but which I do not recall just at this moment, are also pending before us.

Now, when those cases were before us, and we were hesitating whether we would make an appropriation in recognition of victories that marked great periods in our history and contributed very largely toward the preservation of the Union, I felt inclined to hesitate a good deal more as to whether we should go back to this little struggle with Japan.

Mr. MYERS. A great struggle.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Only middling, let me tell my friend; great in speeches here, but quite moderate in history.

Mr. KELLOGG. Great in the odds against the victor.

Mr. SCOFIELD. But still a little magnified in your speeches. But while I thought that, and hesitated about the propriety of asking the Government in these hard times, and when the Treasury was running behind—almost four millions last month—I saw, or thought I saw, a chance to save the balance of this fund, amounting now to more than a million dollars, which everybody was trying to get their hands upon. My friend the gentleman from the Committee on Foreign Affairs [Mr. ORTH] has been trying to give it back to the Japanese. Other parties are trying to get it to build a great college in Japan, where we can all send our boys to learn Japanese literature and oriental diplomacy. The Committee on Education, for aught I know, may bring in a bill for this purpose. One time it was sought to be used to build the State Department. In the mean time this fund was lying around loose; it was left in the State Department, and seemed to belong nowhere in particular. Hungry claimants and visionary schemers were after it. I believed when this bill came before the Naval Committee that if I could manage to get the balance of the fund away from my friends on the Foreign Affairs and Education Committees, and from all these different interests struggling to get it and put it safely in Uncle Sam's empty pocket, by giving something to the actors in this Japanese war, I would make a tolerably good bargain. Therefore I voted to report the bill with the proviso, that after this bonus to the sailors the balance should be placed in the Treasury. But the rule of the House cuts off the proviso. The $125,000 is sliced off, and the balance hung up to attract any crow that flies this way. I do not reflect upon your ruling, Mr. Chairman; I guess it is correct, that you are compelled to so rule; but it takes me by surprise, and cuts out of the bill pretty much all that induced me to support it.

Mr. MYERS. I will yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts, who desires however, I believe, to speak in his own right.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. You cannot do that.

Mr. MYERS. How much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has twelve minutes remaining of his hour.

Mr. MYERS. It is too late to finish this bill to-day, and I therefore move the committee rise.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to amend, so as to move the committee rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that it do not pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is not amendable or debatable.

The House divided; and there were—yeas 110, noes 8.

So the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. G. F. HOAR reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 782) for the relief of the officers and crew of the United State ship Wyoming and the Ta-Kiang, and had come to no resolution thereon.

SALT LAKE AND COLVILLE RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. NEGLEY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4215) granting to the Salt Lake and Colville Railroad Company the right of way through the public lands of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

SALT LAKE AND BINGHAM CANYON RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. NEGLEY also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4216) to incorporate the Salt Lake and Bingham Canyon Railroad Company; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

SOUTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. HOUGHTON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4217) to empower the Southern Pacific Railroad Company to change the line of their road, and to construct an additional branch; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

REPEAL OF SECTIONS OF REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4218) to repeal sections 3823, 3824, 3825, and 3826 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

PAY OF LETTER-CARRIERS.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4219) to adjust the pay of the letter-carriers of the country, and providing that they shall rank with the clerks of the Post-Office Department; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

BOUNDARY BETWEEN ARIZONA AND NEW MEXICO.

Mr. MCCORMICK introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4220) to authorize the survey of the boundary between Arizona and New Mexico; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

SARAH MAYNARD.

Mr. ADAMS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4221) granting a pension to Sarah Maynard; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN CAMPBELL.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4222) for the relief of John Campbell, late a clerk in the Pension Office, Department of the Interior; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

BERTHOLD LOEWENTHOL.

Mr. BURCHARD, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4223) for the relief of Berthold Loewenthol, of Chicago, Illinois; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calander, and ordered to be printed.

HIBBEN & CO., OF CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.

Mr. BURCHARD also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4224) for the relief of Hibben & Co., of Chicago, Illinois; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM M. NANCE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a commucication from the Secretary of War, transmitting papers relative to the claim of William M. Nance, of Nashville, Tennessee, for compensation for a barrel factory alleged to have been taken for the public service in 1864 by Major-General George H. Thomas; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

And then, on motion of Mr. GARFIELD (at four o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned till Monday next.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers, were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. ARMSTRONG: The petition of sufferers from ravages by grasshoppers in Clay County, Dakota Territory, for relief, to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Also, memorial of the Legislature of Dakota Territory, for the establishment of a mail-route from Sioux Falls, Dakota, to Lake Benton, Minnesota, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Also, the petition of Samuel McKee, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. McKEE: The petition of Harper P. Hunt, of Vicksburgh, Mississippi, for payment of rent for houses in Vicksburgh, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. NIBLACK: The petition of Charles H. Mason, of Cannelton, Indiana, late deputy collector of internal revenue for third division of second collection district of Indiana, to be compensated for cigar-stamps alleged to have been stolen from him, to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. PARSONS: The petition of Daniel P. Eels and others, of Cleveland, Ohio, for the passage of an act to amend the fourteenth section of the act to establish the judicial courts of the United States, approved September 24, 1789, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. PIERCE: The petition of C. W. Galloupe, to change the name of the yacht Dolly Varden to Clochette, to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, papers relating to the claim of James Thompson, late acting assistant quartermaster, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS: The petition of soldiers in the late war, for an amendment of the act increasing pensions, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SENER: The petition of William McDaniel, jr., for pay as special watchman at the Capitol, to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. SHERWOOD: The petition of citizens of Toledo, Ohio, for a short-line narrow-gauge railroad from Toledo to Omaha, to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

By Mr. SMALL: Numerous petitions of medical societies and practitioners, in behalf of the Medical Corps of the Army, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. THOMAS, of North Carolina: The petition of W. T. Norwood, for payment of cotton claim, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. THORNBURGH: The petition of John C. Nelson, of Roane County, Tennessee, for payment for a horse taken by United States troops, to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, the petition of the trustees of Holston College, Tennessee, to be paid for rent and for fuel and supplies furnished the Federal Army, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. TYNER: The petition of Thomas J. Lindley, late second lieutenant Company G, One hundred and forty-seventh Indiana Volunteers, for relief, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. VANCE: Resolutions of the Legislature of North Carolina, asking an appropriation to remove obstructions from the Neuse River, to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, resolutions of the Legislature of North Carolina, asking an appropriation to improve the harbor at Edenton, North Carolina, to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, resolutions of the Legislature of North Carolina, concerning the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company, to the Committee on Freedmen's Affairs.

Also, resolutions of the Legislature of North Carolina concerning the tax collected on spirits of turpentine after the late war, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, the petition of Aaron Buchanan, of Mitchell County, North Carolina, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. WARD, of New Jersey: The petition of the medical profession of Newark, New Jersey, in behalf of the Medical Corps of the Army, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. WILSON, of Iowa: The petition of the physicians of Iowa in behalf of the Medical Corps of the Army, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, January 11, 1875.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

POWELL'S EXPEDITION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate, concurring,) That the Congressional Printer be, and he is hereby, authorized to print the report of Major Powell's expedition in quarto form.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLINTON LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 3893) to correct the date of commission of certain officers of the Army;

A bill (H. R. No. 4213) to provide for compensating the officers of the Government in observing the transit of Venus; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4214) declaratory of the act entitled "An act to amend the customs-revenue laws, and to repeal moieties," approved June 22, 1874.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, presented a petition of J. F. Joy and others, citizens of Detroit, Michigan, praying the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 3830) to amend section 110 of the act of June 30, 1864, and section 9 of the act of July 13, 1866, imposing taxes upon the circulation of other than national banks; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Detroit, Michigan, asking the passage of a law defining a gross of matches; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PRATT presented a petition of citizens of Erie County, Pennsylvania, praying for the passage of the House bill granting pensions to all soldiers of the war of 1812; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of Robert Anderson, of Idaho Territory, praying the Senate to protect his right in the Oneida Road, Bridge, and Ferry Company, chartered by the Legislature of that Territory, against the infringement made by the treaty made by commissioners of the United States with the Bannock and other tribes of Indians at Fort Hall, on the 7th day of September, 1804; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented an argument of certain attorneys of Saint Louis, Missouri, in favor of amending the fourteenth section of the act to establish the judicial courts of the United States, approved September 24, 1789; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BOUTWELL presented the petition of Colonel A. B. Eddy and General Rufus Saxton, asking for the restoration of their proper rank in the Army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BOREMAN presented a petition of citizens of West Virginia, praying the establishment of a post-route from Winfield, in Putnam County, to Flat Fork, in Roane County, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented the petition of James Dix, of West Virginia, praying compensation for services rendered by him in conveying the family of Washington Summers from the town of Buckhannon, Upshur County, West Virginia, to near Staunton, Virginia, under orders of General T. M. Harris, commanding the United States troops at Beverly, West Virginia, in 1862; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HITCHCOCK presented a petition of citizens of Butler County, Nebraska, praying the passage of House bill No. 3281, amending the act entitled "An act to amend an act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and for other purposes," approved July 2, 1864; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. LOGAN presented a petition of citizens of Chicago, Illinois, praying the passage of the bill defining a gross of matches; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LOGAN. I also present the petition of Jearum Atkins, asking a rehearing of his case before the Committee on Claims. I presented a petition of this citizen a few days ago, and the chairman of the Committee on Claims suggested that the newly-discovered evidence on which he desired a rehearing was not set forth in that petition. Hence I have had him draw a new petition setting forth the evidence so as to comply with the rule. I now present this petition, and move its reference to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN presented a petition of soldiers of the late war residing in Biggsville, Henderson County, Illinois, asking for the equalization of bounties; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the petition of Samuel Vancil, of Jackson County, Illinois, asking pay for property taken from him for the use of the Army during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented the petition of certain officers serving in California and Arizona, asking the passage of a bill for the protection of widows and orphans of officers of the Army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HAMLIN. I present a memorial of Jotham Johnson, a soldier of the war of 1812, aged eighty-seven years, in which he very earnestly asks the favorable consideration of the Senate that the bill from the House be passed granting a pension to all who served in the war of 1812. As that subject is before the Senate, I move that the memorial lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KELLY. I present concurrent resolutions of the Legislative Assembly of Idaho Territory, in relation to the Portland, Dalles and Salt Lake Railroad. I ask that they be printed and laid on the table, as the bill has already been reported. And in this connection I will say that resolutions of a similar character have been passed by the Legislative Assembly of Washington, and I would also say that in 1872 the Legislature of Oregon instructed the Senators from that State to support a bill of the kind here indicated, and that at the last session in 1874 the Legislature instructed my colleague and myself to use all efforts to have the bill passed and become a law.

Inasmuch as we are instructed to act and the people expect us to do so, I desire that the bill shall be presented at an early day for consideration before the Senate, and I therefore ask that the Senate will allow us to take it up on Friday after the morning business is over; and if it be the pleasure of the Senate not to consider it finally at that time, I shall at least ask the privilege of one hour in presenting it for the consideration of the Senate, and then if it be the pleasure of the body to postpone its further consideration to a subsequent day, I shall make no serious objection. I do this because, as I said, my colleague and myself are instructed, and have been twice instructed, to act in this matter, and I deem it imperative upon me to be somewhat persistent until the Senate shall decide one way or the other. I therefore ask that I may have at least one hour after the morning business on Friday next to take up and present this case.

Mr. CLAYTON. I suppose that it is desirable that the Senate should receive all the information that is available bearing upon the condition of affairs in Louisiana. I introduced a resolution on the 23d of December looking toward the obtaining of certain information in relation to affairs there. I do not believe there is any Senator who will make objection to the procurement of that information. I therefore ask unanimous consent to allow that resolution to be taken up now. If it leads to debate, I will take occasion to allow it to pass over and bring it up at some other time; but I certainly do not see how it can lead to debate unless it is in relation to the phrascology of the resolution; and if that is objectionable, it can be amended.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to take up a resolution relating to Louisiana.

Mr. DAVIS. Let the resolution be read for information.

Mr. PRATT. I ask the Senator from Arkansas to give way that we may present morning business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The reading of the resolution is called for. It will be read.

Mr. CLAYTON. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. KELLY] states that he had not finished his remarks. Of course I yield to him.

Mr. KELLY. I was asking the general consent of the Senate to take one hour after the morning business on Friday to consider the bill to which I have alluded.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator gives notice that he desires on Friday next to take up a bill and address the Senate upon it. The paper presented by him will be laid on the table and printed.

Mr. CLAYTON. Now I ask unanimous consent to consider the resolution to which I referred.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested, if not incompatible with the interests of the public service, to lay before the Senate the official reports and communications of Major Lewis Merrill, United States Army, relating to certain disorders in Louisiana known as the Coushatta troubles.

Mr. MERRIMON. I object to the consideration of that resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. CLAYTON. Then I desire to give notice that immediately after the expiration of the morning business, if the morning hour should not be consumed, I will move to take up this resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Petitions and memorials are still in order.

Mr. SHERMAN presented the petition of J. M. Irwin, praying to be reimbursed for the amount of money paid for two pieces of property purchased by him near Memphis, Tennessee, and sold by the United States authorities for direct taxes; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CONKLING presented the petition of Andrew Caisin, late a private in Company B, First Regiment United States Colored Cavalry, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of Mary Ann Daniel, mother of Major J. T. Daniel, asking an increase of his pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MITCHELL presented the memorial of the Board of Trade of Portland, Oregon, relative to the plans of H. I. Chapman, civil engineer, for the improvement of the Willamette River; which was refered to the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Sea-board.

He also presented the petition of B. P. Patterson, postmaster at La Grande, Oregon, praying relief for moneys destroyed by fire April 9, 1874; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. JOHNSTON presented a petition of citizens of Charlottesville, Virginia, praying the adoption of specific in place of ad valorem duties on wine; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DENNIS presented the petition of A. W. Wagman, H. H. Webb, J. H. Price, and others, being the advisory board on behalf of 3,600 depositors of the Baltimore branch of the Freedman's Saving and Trust Company, praying Congress to grant them such relief as it may deem fit in their loss in that bank; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WRIGHT presented eight memorials of citizens of the counties of Lee, Van Buren, Wapello, Mahaska, Washington, Appanoose, Decatur, and Henry, Iowa, remonstrating against the removal of the United States district court from Keokuk to Burlington, in that State; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. WRIGHT. I desire that an order shall be entered allowing W. C. McCool, of Guthrie Centre, Iowa, to withdraw his discharge and other original papers filed with his claim for additional compensation. There has been an adverse report, and the order for the withdrawal can be made on condition of leaving copies as to these papers.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That order will be made.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WRIGHT. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of Glover & Mather and others, praying that their claim for compensation for transporting the United States mail from Louisville to New Orleans, on route No. 5102 and way lines, may be restored to the docket of the Court of Claims, have had the same under consideration, and instruct me to report it back and ask to be discharged from its further consideration.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not wish to object to that, but I would like to remark that I have found in my experience, and I presume other Senators have in theirs, that motions for indefinite postponement have been put and carried relating to business of interest to myself, and I presume to others, which we have been compelled afterward to interrupt the proceedings of the Senate to ask shall be reconsidered and placed on the Calendar. It seems to me that the rule should be enforced that before any motion to postpone in the morning hour is taken the business shall be distinctly announced from the Clerk's desk. Then each Senator is put upon his notice.

Mr. WRIGHT. Following what has been my practice always, I stated distinctly what this petition was for and the parties and exactly the action of the committee, so that I supposed every Senator understood the report.

Mr. SARGENT. I have no doubt of the good faith of the Senator, but we cannot hear him always on this side of the Chamber.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on discharging the committee from the further consideration of the petition.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. I am also instructed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 222) to extend the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide compensation for the services of James Witherell, Ross Wilkins, and Solomon Sibley, in adjusting titles to land in Michigan," to report adversely thereon, and recommend its indefinite postponement. This bill was introduced by the Senator from Michigan, who is not in his seat, and I suppose it would be better, therefore, to let it go on the Calendar.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. In the absence of my colleague I hope the bill will take that direction.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed upon the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. WRIGHT. I am also instructed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 646) to amend the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved March 2, 1867, to report it back and recommend its indefinite postponement. The bill was introduced by the Senator from Kansas nearest me, [Mr. INGALLS.] I remind him that the same object has been arrived at by the amendments to the general bankrupt act passed in June last. We recommend the indefinite postponement of the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. The bill may be indefinitely postponed.

The bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 933) to provide for the holding of terms of the district court of the United States for the western district of Missouri, at Springfield, in said State, reported adversely thereon, and moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2080) to provide for deducting any debt due the United States from any judgment recovered against the United States by such debtor, reported it with amendments.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3687) granting a pension to Victoria L. Brewster, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Horace Clough, late of Company D, Sixth New Hampshire Volunteers, praying that he may be allowed a pension, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. MERRIMON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1844) for the relief of John Heberer, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. STEVENSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1012) for the relief of the district judge of Vermont, reported it without amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. NORWOOD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1099) for the relief of the Central Railroad and Banking Company of Georgia; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHERMAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1100) chartering the Forty-first Parallel Railroad Company of the United States of America, from Lake Erie to the Missouri River, and to limit the rates of freight thereon; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to say that I introduce this bill by request, and that I am very far from committing myself to any provisions of the bill. I do not know what committee should take charge of it. The Committee on Railroads, probably.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It ought to go to the Committee on Transportation Routes.

Mr. SHERMAN. That was discharged.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It was revived this session.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Transportation Routes, and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1101) to amend the act entitled "An act to incorporate the National Union Insurance Company of Washington," approved February 14, 1865; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SARGENT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1102) to promote the efficiency of the light-house service of the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1103) relating to the approval of bills in the Territory of Utah; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1104) authorizing the issue of patents to mining claims in certain cases; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1105) to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief of savings institutions having no capital stock and doing business solely for the benefit of depositors," approved June 22, 1874; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SPENCER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1106) to provide for the appointment of a marshal for the district of Alabama; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HITCHCOCK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1107) for the relief of C. H. Frederick, late a lieutenant-colonel in the Ninth Missouri Infantry; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1108) to provide for the sale of the Pawnee and Ottoe Indian lands; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAVIS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1109) making an appropriation for the improvement of the Little Kanawha River, in the State of West Virginia; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. COOPER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1110) for the relief of Andrew J. Duncan, of Nashville, Tennessee; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1111) for the relief of the estate of Thomas Hord, deceased, of Rutherford County, Tennessee; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MITCHELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1112) for the relief of B. P. Patterson, postmaster at La Grande, Oregon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1113) establishing a post-road in the State of Oregon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. INGALLS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1114) for the relief of Mark W. Delahay; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1115) for the relief of Joseph C. Irvin and William Phillips; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1116) for the relief of John S. Friend; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

THE COUSHATTA TROUBLES.

Mr. CLAYTON. I ask the Senate now to take up the resolution offered by myself on the 23d day of December. It is a resolution simply calling for information. I do not think that any Senator can afford to object to the receipt of this information.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas moves to take up the resolution submitted by him on the 23d of December.

Mr. DAVIS. I would like to ask the Senator, as I see this gentleman's name is Merrill, if he is the same man who behaved so outrageously in South Carolina, and afterward in Louisiana, by arresting and hand-cuffing civilians, and who is now under arrest by the military on that charge?

Mr. CLAYTON. I will answer the gentleman——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on taking up the resolution for consideration.

Mr. SHERMAN, (to Mr. CLAYTON.) Let it be taken up first.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas to take up the resolution indicated by him.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested, if not incompatible with the interests of the public service, to lay before the Senate the official reports and communications of Major Lewis Merrill, United States Army, relating to certain disorders in Louisiana known as the Coushatta troubles.

Mr. CLAYTON. Now, I will say that the person mentioned in this resolution, Major Lewis Merrill, is an officer of the United States Army. I have no knowledge of any improper conduct of his, and if the Senator from West Virginia has any knowledge of it, it seems to me it would be well enough for him to call that fact to the attention of the military authorities, so that the officer may be brought to punishment. All I know about Major Merrill—and I have known him for years, both before the war and since—leads me to believe that he is an honorable man and a true soldier, and one of those soldiers who dare to do their duty even in the face of the volume of vituperation and abuse that is always hurled at every soldier and every officer of this Government who dares to do his duty in the Southern States. I know not what popular rumor may attribute to this officer. If the Senator from West Virginia knows, let him give the source of his knowledge, if he thinks that affects this resolution. I have simply asked for this report. It may weigh just as lightly or heavily on the Senator from West Virginia, when he receives it, as he sees proper. He may discard it as meaning nothing. Other men may think that it means something. I have asked for the report of this officer bearing on alleged outrages in Louisiana. I have had difficulty in getting up the resolution. Every time I have moved to take it up, some one from the other side has objected. Now, I say, let us have this information, and afterward you may give such weight to it as you may see fit. I ask now to amend the resolution by striking out the words "known as the Coushatta troubles," so as to make it more general.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution.

Mr. CLAYTON. I move to strike out the words "known as the Coushatta troubles," so as to call for all the information relating to the disorders in Louisiana that that officer's report may contain.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be so modified.

Mr. DAVIS. The question has not yet been answered whether Major Lewis Merrill, as he is here called, is now under arrest for offenses committed upon inoffensive people in Louisiana. I supposed the Senator would have answered the question, but he has thought best to avoid it.

Mr. CLAYTON. I did not think best to avoid it. I did not understand the Senator to ask whether he was under arrest or not, but whether he was the same Lewis Merrill who had committed some offense in South Carolina, of which he seemed to have some knowledge and of which I have no knowledge. So far as the question of his arrest is concerned, I presume if the Senator goes to the War Department he can ascertain that fact for himself and get an answer to that question if he desires it.

Mr. DAVIS. What is the question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. On the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. DAVIS. I understand that this is the same Major Merrill, as he is termed, who is now under arrest, if he has not been tried—and I presume he has not been—for committing outrages upon inoffensive people, hand-cuffing citizens, cutting telegraph wires, and sundry other charges in Louisiana. Now, I should like to have this resolution amended, so as to call upon the Secretary of War, not only for Major Merrill's report, but also for General Emory's report upon the conduct of this same individual.

Mr. MERRIMON. I have a substitute for the resolution, which covers the proposition of the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. DAVIS. I will hear it read.

Mr. MERRIMON. I offer the following as a substitute for the resolution:

That the Secretary of War lay before the Senate the official letters, communications, and reports of General Emory, of the Army, in reference to any suggested disorders in any way connected with the late election in Louisiana.

Mr. CLAYTON. Is that offered as a substitute?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. An amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from West Virginia is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DAVIS. I yield for a moment.

Mr. MERRIMON. Major Merrill was a subordinate under the command of General Emory, and at the time he made the report to which the Senator from Arkansas refers he was then acting, or purporting to act, in pursuance of orders issued by General Emory. It was his duty, according to law and the Army Regulations, to make his reports to General Emory, and through General Emory his reports would come to the office of the Secretary of War. For one, I am perfectly willing to have submitted to us all the reports which were made; but I want no garbled reports; I want no partial information; I want all that was done, all the reports that were made, and if the information is communicated to the Senate which is required by my substitute we shall get every report that Major Merrill legitimately made.

Mr. CLAYTON. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. MERRIMON. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLAYTON. Do you think that if your substitute is adopted to this resolution, the information I have asked for will be obtained?

Mr. MERRIMON. I do, most assuredly.

Mr. CLAYTON. You say it was the duty of Major Merrill to transmit his reports through General Emory?

Mr. MERRIMON. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLAYTON. And of General Emory to transmit them to the Secretary of War?

Mr. MERRIMON. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLAYTON. If that was his duty, it was not the duty of General Emory to retain copies of those reports; and if you call for the reports of General Emory, you may not get this. We know that if we call upon the Secretary of War for this information, he can get it. Now, if it is the intention of the Senator from North Carolina to suppress by his ingenious substitute the information that I have called for, let the responsibility rest upon him and his friends for the suppression of that information. I am perfectly willing that it shall rest there.

Mr. MERRIMON. So am I.

Mr. CLAYTON. I am prepared to vote here for every resolution properly worded calling for information in relation to the troubled condition of affairs in the South. I want it from every source, from the highest to the lowest, and I will never stand in my place offering any objection in any shape to any information coming from official sources touching on the questions which are now before the Senate and before the country; and if the Senator from North Carolina is willing to take the responsibility of preventing the information asked for being sent here, then let him take it.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, I do not care to engage in any empty declamation as to what I desire. I have always said in plain words that I am willing to have all the information that the Senate can be put in possession of. I repeat what I said a moment ago, that this official is a subordinate; he acted, if he acted at all, under the orders of General Emory. It is alleged in the newspapers—I do not know whether it is true or false—that he acted in flagrant violation of those orders, and was in contempt of his superior officer. How that fact is I do not know; but all reports that he was authorized by law and the Army Regulations to make were to be made through General Emory, and it was the duty of General Emory to send those reports to the Secretary of War. If, therefore, the Senator shall ask the Secretary of War to furnish General Emory's reports touching these transactions, we shall get all the orders General Emory made and all the reports made by Major Merrill and every other officer to General Emory touching any transaction with which such officers were charged.

I repeat, I do not want a partial report. If Major Merrill's reports come to the Senate, I want them to come along with the orders issued by General Emory, so that we may see what he was charged to do and how he executed his orders; and if General Emory put him under arrest for any contempt of his superior officer, I want to know that fact. I want the whole truth, and I do not suppose that I shall add anything to the prospect of getting it by engaging in any sort of empty declamation about it here.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, when the Senator from Arkansas offered his resolution prior to the adjournment of Congress for the holiday recess, it was deemed advisable by gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber to have an opportunity to examine the particular text of that resolution and its particular bearing. They have had that opportunity; and now that it is about to be pressed to its passage, a substitute is offered by the Senator from North Carolina, which we scarcely have had an opportunity of hearing or understanding the bearings of or the limits or extent of. It may be that I would cheerfully vote for that substitute resolution, and yet at the same time the Senator knows that if he will let the question be taken on the resolution of the Senator from Arkansas, no one in this Chamber will object to any resolution requiring at the hands of the executive department of the Government full information of all transactions that are occurring or have occurred in the Southern States.

But while we turn our attention to what may be occurring there, we should not be forgetful or unmindful of what is occurring at home. We should not forget that yesterday in the city of Washington a direct recommendation and suggestion was made that the President of the United States should be assassinated. Sir, I should like the Clerk to read from a Washington journal what was said about assassination, and let us see whether the atmosphere of assassination has not extended beyond Louisiana and permeated the halls of the capital.

Mr. THURMAN. Which capital, Don Piatt's Capital or this Capitol? [Laughter.]

Mr. WEST. This capital. We shall hear the Senator from Ohio on the question directly.

The CHIEF CLERK. This article is taken from the Washington Capital of January 10, 1875.

Mr. THURMAN. Piatt's Capital!

The CHIEF CLERK. The article is headed "Assassination."

The humble followers of His Excellency complain that both Grant and Sheridan have received anonymous letters threatening assassination. We can tell these gentlemen that this danger does not come through the post. We fear that it is in the air, and yet more in the hearts of many people. The man who in these trying times spends his wrath in anonymous letters is not to be dreaded, but rather the man who gives no sign in advance of his act.

They should remember that the Government that inaugurates assassination is not in a reasonable condition to complain of violence, and that we have been taught through all ages to regard the death of tyrants as the cause of God. With Charlotte Corday a saint and Brutus a hero in popular estimation, it is not always easy to draw distinctions when deadly passions are aroused. These gentlemen, "all of us," who are urging on oppression and violence should know that the danger is not on one side. It was hoped that Sheridan's infamous conduct would fetch on civil war in Louisiana; it might be that the courted war would break out nearer home, and the men who, sitting safely in their arm-chairs, instigated a civil war, where ignorant negroes and oppressed whites would seize at each other's throats, might find it necessary to protect their own worthless lives in Washington. Of course such a result would be deplorable; but lawless violence is a dangerous game and sometimes ends in the destruction of its instigators.

Mr. WEST. Now, will the Clerk be kind enough also to read an extract from the New York Tribune of Saturday.

The CHIEF CLERK. This is headed "Bayonets and legislation," addressed to the editor of the Tribune:

SIR: Now that Kellogg proposes to decide who shall belong to the Louisiana Legislature, and is backed by the United States Army, might not President Grant better decide who shall belong to the next Congress, and enforce his decisions by five or six regiments of United States troops, commanded by that truthful and just man General Sheridan, and remove all regularly-elected members to make place for the Caseys or Dents? If he insists on fighting it out on this line, some one will play Brutus to his Cæsar without fail, which, by the way, would be a great blessing to the country.

Mr. WEST. Well, Mr. President, if the Senator from Ohio can afford to be facetious on such publications as these, I congratulate him upon his ready humor. Not only in Washington, but in one of the leading journals of the country, in one of the leading journals of the great metropolis of the country, we find a recommendation for assassination, and the assertion that it would be a blessing to this country—published by that journal without one word of condemnation. Where is the atmosphere of assassination now? Is it in the capital of Washington alone? Is it not in the metropolis of your country? Does the Senator from Ohio sanction such publications? I should like him to tell me. He does not reply, Mr. President; but I know he will condemn them. I know he will rise in his seat, perhaps, and say that he denounces such publications and he does not sanction them in the least. Therefore, knowing what he will do, let it go to the country that one of the foremost Senators in this Chamber, one of the Senators standing high in the estimation of the people of the country, denounces any recommendation of assassination. I know he will. Ah! but when a soldier in Louisiana, as well known for his services to the country as the Senator is known, denounces it, all the world rises in arms against the calumny; the bishops of the Catholic Church, the bishops of the Episcopal Church, and all the clergy denounce the thing! Now, let all the clergy in New York and elsewhere rise and say that the Senator from Ohio has denounced assassination all over the country.

Sir, I do not think that such publications as these should be passed by in silence. I do not think that they should be left to the mere circulation of the record that may be perpetuated through the instrumentality of their publication. Let them go to the country upon the record of Congress. Let it be understood that now again the hideous fiend of assassination that raised its head in this capital ten years ago once more comes to the front; that no laws in this country are to be respected unless they are in the interest of a certain class; that those who execute those laws in sacred compliance with their oaths of office are to be stricken down by the hand of assassination! Sir, I think it proper that this notice should be taken, and I think it proper to have brought the attention of the Senate to it.

Now, with respect to this resolution we can get all that we want, and I should like to give notice to my friends over the way that they are making another military mistake. As for the assertion that this Major Lewis Merrill has so disreputably and so dishonorably behaved, that is a matter of history, and it is before the country with respect to his dealings in South Carolina. But they make a mistake, I think, when they say that he is under arrest for any misconduct. His conduct has been the subject of investigation, but so far as I can learn, although the Senator may be better informed than I am, there has been no reprobation visited upon him, because they have not had an opportunity of hearing his defense. His defense will come in good time. It is in bad taste for Senators to rise here, unless they know the fact, to assert that he is under arrest. I ask any Senator if he does know that that officer is under arrest? I ask the Senator from West Virginia does he know it?

Mr. DAVIS. I am specially addressed as to my knowledge whether or not Major Merrill is under arrest. I do not know the fact. I know the papers have stated it a dozen times. Now, I would ask the Senator does he know that Major Merrill is not? He lives in Louisiana, and ought to know better than I.

Mr. WEST. I ought not to know anything better than the Senator from West Virginia; but he stated that the officer was under arrest, and I asked what was his authority for the statement.

Mr. DAVIS. Do you know that he is not?

Mr. WEST. No, sir; I do not know anything about it.

Mr. DAVIS. Then I take it he is.

Mr. WEST. But I asked did you know; that was the question. So far as I know with respect to Major Merrill's course it has been investigated, but there has been no condemnation yet visited upon him. He may be subject to it—I do not know it; but I submit whether it is exactly candid to state that an officer is under arrest unless the Senator who makes the statement knows that it is so.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I ask the indulgence of the Senate for a moment. I am of the opinion, although no man is a safe judge in his own case, that the Lord never made me for an actor, and if He did, I must say I am not in the dramatic mood this morning, and therefore not at all disposed to be one of the dramatis personæ in the little comedy that the Senator from Louisiana has seen fit to present upon the stage this morning.

The Senator wants to know how I can be facetious when assassination is in the air. Well, sir, I never saw Bombastes Furioso performed that I did not laugh, and I probably never shall; and as to facetiousness, if the "Capital," not this Capitol but the "Capital," which has been read from, shall not be facetious next Sunday when the editor has read and considered the speech of the Senator from Louisiana, then Donn Piatt has lost the wit that he has had the reputation of for thirty years. [Laughter.]

As to the New York Tribune, I never saw the article in it. I do not know whether it is a communication or whether it is an editorial, and I do not care. That paper is able to take care of itself. It does not need my assistance; it does not need my advocacy; and I turn over the Senator from Louisiana to that paper itself. But when the Senator asks here, with gravity, whether there is any Senator in this Chamber who justifies assassination, he simply asks a question that is impertinent and an insult. No Senator has a right to ask any such question, and it is impertinence and an insult to ask it. Sir, this is not a country that favors assassination. Assassinations have taken place under high political excitement, or prompted by fanaticism, in every country in the world; but there never was an assassination in America that the whole people did not condemn; and to attempt to create the idea here that assassination is in the air is about the airiest bubble that ever was found in an empty head. [Laughter in the galleries.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Order, order! The galleries are crowded to-day, and the Chair will be under the necessity of enforcing the rules strictly if there be any applause or any disapprobation expressed.

Mr. SCHURZ. Mr. President——

Mr. CLAYTON. Can we not dispose of this question without further debate? I ask the Senator from Missouri to yield.

Mr. SCHURZ. If there is to be no further debate, I have no objection to action on the Senator's resolution.

Mr. CLAYTON. I do not see how there can be.

Mr. SCHURZ. If there is to be further debate, I shall object.

Mr. CLAYTON. Now, let me ask the Senator from North Carolina——

Mr. SCHURZ. It seems to me that the Senator himself——

Mr. CLAYTON. I just want to see if I can have an understanding about the amendment.

Mr. SCHURZ. It seems to me the Senator himself is going to debate the resolution, and therefore I shall have to object.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the unfinished business, may I inquire?

Mr. CLAYTON. I do not propose to debate this resolution. I merely want to say about three words to the Senator from North Carolina, after which I think he and I can agree as to this resolution, and I think there will be no further debate.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask the Senator to allow me to inquire of the Chair what is the unfinished business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that there is no unfinished business; but the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SCHURZ] gave notice on Friday that at one o'clock to-day he would call up the resolution which he then offered. The Senator rose for that purpose, and the Chair recognized the Senator.

Mr. CONKLING. I did not know but that there was unfinished business by which at one o'clock this resolution fell.

Mr. SCHURZ. I move that the resolution I offered on Friday last be taken up for consideration.

Mr. CLAYTON. Did I understand the Senator to say that he objected to the disposition of my resolution at this time?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri moves to postpone the pending resolution, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution offered by him on Friday last.

Mr. SCHURZ. As far as I know there is no resolution pending at the present moment, there being no unfinished business after the expiration of the morning hour.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution of the Senator from Arkansas is now before the Senate, being a Senate resolution, and the Senator from Missouri moves to take up his resolution, which would displace the other, and therefore it involves its postponement.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am prepared to vote to give to the Senator from Missouri an opportunity to speak to-day; but in view of the circumstances connected with the proposition of the Senator from Arkansas, I will not under any circumstances whatever vote to postpone his resolution. It seems to me that in the excited state of the public mind these resolutions of inquiry brought here for debate ought to be acted upon in their order. Now I appeal to Senators on the democratic side of the House what objection can there be to passing this resolution in any form in which it may be presented, and then allowing the Senator from Missouri to call up the resolution he offered on Friday and discuss it as he desires? But it seems to me that to make —I was about to say factious opposition to an ordinary resolution of inquiry, offered by one of the majority of this body, which ought to be adopted in the ordinary course without a single moment's delay, is a very improper course of proceeding.

Mr. CLAYTON. It was offered on the 23d of December.

Mr. SHERMAN. It seems to me that while the minority has rights which we ought all to respect, rights of courtesy, constitutional rights, yet the majority ought to have some rights of courtesy and some rights of propriety. Why not allow this resolution to pass? Add to it if you please as an independent proposition the matter offered by the Senator from North Carolina; add to it if you please the amendment which I am told is about to be offered by my colleague, and pass it; but what is the use of laying aside one resolution about Louisiana and then taking up another out of courtesy to one Senator?

Mr. BAYARD. Let it be amended.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well. We are aware of the excited state of the public mind. We have crowded galleries about us, everybody desiring to listen to the honorable Senator from Missouri, and certainly I desire to hear him and hear him in his own way and on the resolution he has offered; but it seems to me it is the right of one of the majority, who presents a resolution here, to be treated with some little courtesy, and that that resolution, plain and simple in its terms, merely calling for the report of an officer of the Army of the United States, should be adopted at once. Instead of that, all at once the character of this officer is arraigned, as if that made any difference, and the resolution is attempted to be superseded by some other broad drag-net resolution. Why, sir, if the minority have rights, the majority have rights too. It seems to me this resolution offered by the Senator from Arkansas ought to be acted upon, and then we will take up the resolution of the Senator from Missouri and hear with pleasure his remarks. There should be a little courtesy on both sides.

Mr. CLAYTON. That was the very proposition I was about to make to my friend from North Carolina, that if he desires the information he specifies, let him put his as a separate proposition, as an amendment to be added to my resolution, but not as a substitute cutting out my resolution. I will vote for his proposition as a separate amendment, I will vote for any proposition of this kind, and I am sure the majority here will do so. Now, why should we by these means undertake to suppress information which Senators in this body desire to have?

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator has said he will accept any reasonable amendment.

Mr. CLAYTON. I say I will accept any reasonable amendment calling for information, not in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. DAVIS. So understanding the Senator, not wanting to debate this question, and knowing that the Senator from Missouri is entitled to the floor, I ask the Senator to insert "General Emory" previous to "Merrill," because he is the officer in charge, and then let this resolution pass.

Mr. CLAYTON. I am not going to stand on any question of precedence, though I think that is the order of the day. You can have Major Merrill after, or before, or where you please, so that you do not destroy the effect of my resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the postponement.

Mr. DAVIS. According to the suggestion of the Senator, I will ask that the amendment I proposed be read.

Mr. CLAYTON. That is out of order now, I should think.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question before the Senate is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri to postpone the pending resolution and take up the resolution introduced by him.

Mr. SCHURZ. If this resolution can be passed within a few minutes I shall not move to postpone it at all, and I hope it can be disposed of.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion to postpone is withdrawn. The Secretary will read the amendment sent to the Chair by the Senator from West Virginia.

The CHIEF CLERK. Before "Major Lewis Merrill" it is to insert "General Emory, of the United States Army, including the sub-report of;" so as to make the resolution read—

That the Secretary of War be requested, if not incompatible with the interests of the public service, to lay before the Senate the official reports and communications of General Emory, of the United States Army, including the sub-report of Major Lewis Merrill, United States Army, relating to certain disorders in Louisiana.

Mr. MORTON. I hope the Senator from Arkansas will not accept the amendment.

Mr. CLAYTON. I cannot accept that, but I will accept the proposition of my friend from North Carolina, if he will offer it simply as an amendment by way of addition.

Mr. MERRIMON. I am very much astonished to hear that my alleged opposition to this resolution seems to be factious. I offered the substitute in good faith. The substitute does not exclude the information the Senator from Arkansas desires.

Mr. CLAYTON. I think it does.

Mr. MERRIMON. No, sir; it not only embraces that, but it embraces a great deal more. The substitute was offered in the utmost good faith; but in order to accommodate the matter, I offered to withdraw what I presented as a substitute and move it as an additional resolution, and let them go both together.

Mr. DAVIS. Now, I understand, my amendment will be in order.

Mr. CONKLING. Let the amendment be reported.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend the resolution by inserting after the words "communication of" the words "General Emory, of the United States Army, including the sub-report of."

Mr. CONKLING. Is the Senator from West Virginia prepared to tell us that General Emory ever made a report in relation to the particular subject specified in that resolution?

Mr. DAVIS. I understand that there is no particular subject now; that while there was originally, that has been stricken out by the Senator from Arkansas, and it is now just "relating to certain disorders in Louisiana."

Mr. CONKLING. What is the close of the resolution? Will the Secretary be kind enough to read it again?

The SECRETARY. "Relating to certain disorders in Louisiana."

Mr. CONKLING. There is, the Senator from West Virginia will see, in the resolution, by unmistakable words, reference to a particular subject.

Mr. DAVIS. What subject?

Mr. CONKLING. The disturbance upon which Major Merrill made his report. The resolution refers to "certain disorders in Louisiana." As to these certain disorders Major Merrill made a report. Now, unless General Emory has also made a report touching that particular thing, the resolution is turned, I submit to the Senator, I will not say into nonsense, but into a resolution which it would be very difficult for him to explain or define.

Mr. DAVIS. I believe General Emory is commander of that department, or was at that time, and Major Lewis Merrill, as he is termed, was a subordinate in that department; and of course any report from Merrill must come through Emory. There are many other reports of course, but that particular report Emory had, whatever the object of it, and transmitted it, and there are other things connected with it.

Mr. MORTON. I suggest to my friend from West Virginia that, without intending it, his amendment is so framed as probably to exclude the report of Major Merrill sought for by the original resolution. He provides first for calling for the report of General Emory, including the sub-report of Major Merrill. That sub-report refers of course to the same subject upon which General Emory has reported. Now, suppose it turns out that General Emory has made no report in regard to certain important transactions in Louisiana, then the resolution does not call for any sub-report on that subject.

Mr. DAVIS. I would ask the Senator how Major Merrill's report got to the War Department if it did not come through General Emory?

Mr. MORTON. I am not at all interested in explaining that. Let us first adopt the resolution as proposed by the Senator from Arkansas; and if my friend from West Virginia wants to add to that a provision calling for General Emory's report, I will vote for it.

Mr. MERRIMON. I understood the Senator from Arkansas to accept the substitute I offered as an amendment to his resolution.

Mr. CLAYTON. Not as a substitute.

Mr. MERRIMON. But as an amendment by way of addition.

Mr. CONKLING. I regret, Mr. President, that this condition of things has arisen in the Senate this morning. It seems that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SCHURZ] wishes to address the Senate, and so gave notice last week, although I did not happen to hear it at the time, but I heard it from the Chair this morning. During the morning hour the Senator from Arkansas asked the Senate to take up a very brief resolution which it seems he submitted on the 23d day of December last. That resolution calls for one single known document on file in the War Department, and it is a report or communication made by an officer named.

One would suppose that if any resolution could be thought of which would excite no opposition on either side of the Chamber, it would be a resolution asking that the Senate might have the opportunity to inspect a report a part of the public records of the War Department. Thereupon the Senator from North Carolina proposes to supersede the resolution by interposing one which has no sort of reference to this subject and which is entirely to displace and obliterate the purpose of the Senator from Arkansas. The Senator shakes his head, probably upon the ground that if his amendment had been adopted, included among the many things over which he proposes to spread a drag-net, might eventually, when all this copying has been made, be found this one little report for which the Senator from Arkansas inquired. That may be; but I say again his resolution is destructive of the purpose of the Senator from Arkansas, which is to obtain, and obtain promptly, a copy of a single brief document.

The Senator from North Carolina, upon reflection, has said, and I think he was wise and courteous in that, that he would withhold his proposal and offer it as an independent resolution. Now comes my friend from West Virginia, who proposes to do what? To turn this resolution, I submit to him, into mere derision. I ask him to read the resolution. Originally it called for the report of "Major Lewis Merrill, United States Army, relating to certain disorders in Louisiana known as the Coushatta troubles."

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator will recollect that the Senator from Arkansas——

Mr. CONKLING. If my friend will pardon me one moment, I am aware that these latter words have been stricken, out and I am going to call his attention to that. These words have been dropped as mere surplusage; they mean nothing except to add "namely or to wit, such a thing." Inasmuch as Major Merrill has made this one known report relating to that subject, it is not worth while to describe it, and those words have been dropped, and now that they are dropped the resolution means precisely what it meant before. It calls for a known report made by this officer "relating to certain disorders in Louisiana." Does the Senator think he has made reports touching some other disorders in Louisiana? No such thing is suggested, and therefore my friend will see that with the words dropped the resolution means what it meant before. But what does he propose to import into it? He proposes to interpolate words to make it read "reports made by General Emory and by Major Lewis Merrill relating to certain disorders in Louisiana." If General Emory has made no report touching these particular disorders the resolution cannot be answered, and yet he couples them together. The report of General Emory and the report of Major Merrill must both relate to the same thing, namely, "certain disorders in Louisiana." It will not do that one relates to certain disorders and another to certain other disorders; but they must all relate to the same thing. Now, there are no such two reports. There is one report and one officer who made it.

I appeal to my friend from West Virginia—to whom I have not often appealed in vain in a matter which touches his candor or his courtesy—to allow the resolution of the Senator from Arkansas, who for some reason of his own wants a copy of this report, to pass, and if he wants the report of General Emory and if the Senator from North Carolina wants reports from other officers, let him at any time when he does not interfere with the Senator from Missouri offer his resolution, and I do not think he will have any difficulty in having it adopted and having it answered, unless he should happen, as Senators sometimes do, to make the language of his resolution so broad that it calls for what has been sent to us already, what we have in print, and what will impose an unnecessary labor and expense upon the Departments to copy all over again. If he will offer a resolution calling for something not already in our possession, he will have no difficulty in the case of the Senator from West Virginia or the Senator from North Carolina in getting a hearing for his resolution.
